

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

AMERICAN AND ENGLISH RAILROAD CASES.

A complete collection of all the railroad law as decided by the American, English and Canadian courts of last resort.

Elaborate notes to the more important cases. As a means of giving the working lawyer a full collection of all the cases on the subjects treated, together with able and judicious criticism upon the points presented, they are simply invaluable.

AMERICAN AND ENGLISH CORPORATION CASES.

This series presents a full collection of the cases in all the courts of last resort, both in America and England, on the law of private and municipal corporations other than railroad companies.

1.—SCOPE. Among the topics treated of will be the following:

PRIVATE CORPORATIONS.—Agency, Assessments, Building Associations, Dissolution of Corporations, Dividends and Earnings, Ecclesiastical and Religious Corporations, Elections, Mandamus, Officers, Organization, Powers, Stock and Stockholders, Taxation.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.—Assessments, Bonds, Powers, Ordinances, Poor Laws, Streets, Taxes, Intoxicating Liquors, Injuries to Person and Property, etc., etc.

2.—NOTES. The annotations are a special feature, being very full and exhaustive.

These works are issued in monthly Parts, each Part containing not less than 224 pages. Three Parts make a complete volume. When Part 3 is published, the Parts are returned to the publisher by the subscriber, and are bound in best law sheep and returned by mail WITHOUT CHARGE FOR BINDING. The subscription price is $4.50 per volume, including NOTES OF CASES.

THE AMERICAN AND ENGLISH ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF LAW.

UTMOST CARE—(See also REASONABLE CARE, vol. 2, p. 732, n).—See note 1.

UTTER; UTTERING—(See also FORGERY, vol. 8, p. 452; COUNTERFEITING, vol. 4, p. 339).—To utter and publish a counterfeit note is to assert and declare, directly or indirectly, by words or actions, that the note offered is good. It is not necessary that it should be passed in order to complete the offense of uttering.²

VACANCY; VACANT; VACATE—(As to filling vacancies in public offices, see PUBLIC OFFICERS, vol. 19, p. 430).—The verb "to vacate," in its English form, has acquired an active sense through a long period of transition, by popular usage, and in consequence of its early adoption as a technical and legal term. "To leave empty;" "to cease from occupying;" "to annul;" "to make void," undoubtedly express the different meanings in which,

1. Utmost Care.—The term "utmost care," as used to express the care required of a car-driver for the safety of his passengers, was explained by Cole, C. J., in Heucke v. Milwaukee City R. Co., 69 Wis. 401, thus: "'The utmost care and diligence,' 'the highest degree of care and diligence,' are expressions to measure the care and diligence which a prudent man would exert in that business, under like circumstances. The rule required that the car-driver should exercise the utmost care for the safety of the passengers in the car; should be vigilant and careful, to avoid collisions with all vehicles upon the track, especially at crossings. This was no more care than every prudent man would exert for the safety of the passengers, who was carrying on such business. When the charge is considered with reference to the facts disclosed by the evidence, and the particular act of negligence complained of, it will be found unobjectionable." That the term "utmost," in this connection, means reasonable proper care, see Willey v. Allegheny City, 118 Pa. St. 497; 4 Am. St. Rep. 608.

2. Bouv. Law Dict., citing Com. v. Searle, 2 Binn. (Pa.) 339; 4 Am. Dec. 446.

Utter and Publish.—The terms "utter" and "publish," in a statute against counterfeiting and forgery, are synonymous, and, therefore, it has been held that an indictment, charging that the defendant did "utter and publish" a certain forged order, was not bad for duplicity. Johnson v. Com., 90 Ky. 488.

An averment in an action for libel that the defendant "uttered" the libelous matter, was held to sufficiently aver the publication of the words. Benedict v. Westover (Wis. 1878), 7 Cent. L. J. 153.

as a verb, the word has come to be employed. But it does not follow that its derivatives have acquired exclusively equivalent meanings in popular, or legislative, or legal usage. In its original Latin form, the word was invariably used to define the state and condition of some existing thing at some particular point of time. It had no transitive power whatever. It meant "to be empty, void, or vacant;" "to be void of, free from or without, to lack or want a thing." Vacant lands were described as lands that were "uninhabited or uncultivated." The Roman law gave the word precisely the same meaning. And many of the derivatives from the English verb retain the exact meaning of the original Latin word. To be "vacant," in its primary sense, is "to be deprived of contents; empty; not filled." The first definition of "vacancy" is "the quality of being vacant; emptiness." Usage has warranted the employment of these words in an enlarged and broader sense, but the primary and strictly grammatical meaning which they still retain is identical with their exclusive original signification. The result is that the word "vacancy" aptly and fitly describes the condition of an office when it is first created and has been filled by no incumbent. The need to strain and torture terms would lie in the opposite direction.¹

1. Walsh v. Com., 89 Pa. St. 425; 33 Am. Rep. 771. In this case it was held that when a new county is erected, a vacancy happens within the meaning of the constitutional provision that the governor shall fill vacancies.

The word "vacancy," as applied to an office, has no technical meaning. An office is not vacant so long as it is supplied, in the manner provided by the constitution or law, with an incumbent who is legally qualified to exercise the powers and perform the duties which appertain to it; and, conversely, it is vacant in the eye of the law, whenever it is unoccupied by a legally qualified incumbent, who has a lawful right to continue therein until the happening of some future event. Stocking v. State, 7 Ind. 326; Collins v. State, 8 Ind. 344; Akers v. State, 8 Ind. 484; State v. Bemenderfer, 96 Ind. 374; Butler v. State, 20 Ind. 169; People v. Tilton, 37 Cal. 614; State v. Lusk, 18 Mo. 333; Com. v. Hanley, 9 Pa. St. 513.

When an office has been conferred upon one legally eligible, and has been accepted, no vacancy can be said to exist therein until the term of service and right to hold, as fixed by the law, expires, or until the death, resignation, or removal of the person elected or appointed. Johnston v. Wilson, 2 N. H. 202; 9 Am. Dec. 50.

Of course, it is not to be understood that an office cannot become vacant, as respects the appointing power, so long as it remains in the actual physical occupancy of some one who asserts a claim thereto. An office is legally vacant unless the occupant has an unexpired right or title, founded in the constitution or law, precisely as a house is vacant of a lawful tenant, in case the lessee, without any provision authorizing him to hold over, refuses to surrender at the expiration of his term. State v. Harrison, 113 Ind. 439.

Whether a Newly Created Office is Vacant.—In State v. Askew, 48 Ark. 89, Smith, J., said: "The controversy is thus narrowed to the point, whether, upon the creation of an additional circuit, there is a present vacancy in the office of circuit judge. Can a vacancy occur in an office which has never been filled? Vacancy is the state of being empty or unfilled. Vacant lands are unoccupied lands. A vacant house is an untenanted house. A vacant office is an office without an incumbent; and it can make no difference whether the office be a new or an old one. An old office is vacated by death, resignation, or removal. An office newly created becomes ipso facto vacant in its creation." See State v. McMillan, 108 Mo. 153.

In Stocking v. State, 7 Ind. 329,

Definitions.

Stuart, J., said : " We lay no stress on the declaration of the legislature that there was a vacancy in the office of circuit judge of the new circuit. If there was a vacancy, it existed independent of that declaration. If there was no vacancy, that body could not create one by a declaratory enactment. The vacancy flowed as a natural consequence of their doing what they had a right to do—to create a new circuit. There is no technical nor peculiar meaning to the word 'vacant,' as used in the constitution. It means empty, unoccupied; as applied to an office, without an incumbent. There is no basis for the distinction urged, that it applies only to offices vacated by death, resignation, or otherwise. An existing office without an incumbent is vacant, whether it be a new or an old one. A new house is as vacant as one tenanted for years, which was abandoned yesterday. We must take the words in their plain, usual sense."

West Virginia Code 1891, ch. 116, p. 773, relative to petit juries, provides that jury commissioners shall be appointed for the term of four years, which shall commence on the first day of June next after their appointment, and that "vacancies caused by death, resignation, or otherwise, shall be filled for the unexpired term in the same manner as the original appointments." In State v. Scott, 36 W. Va. 704, it was held that, where the act went into effect in May, an appointment on June 10th following, for the unexpired term, commencing June 1st, was authorized, since the word "vacancy" does not necessarily presuppose a former incumbent of the office.

To the same effect, viz., that an existing office without an incumbent is vacant, whether it is a new or an old one, see Rice v. State, 7 Ind. 332; Driskill v. State, 7 Ind. 338; Collins v. State, 8 Ind. 350; State v. Irwin, 5 Nev. 129; State v. Boecker, 56 Mo. 17; State v. Boone County Ct., 50 Mo. 317; Walsh v. Com., 89 Pa. St. 419; 33 Am. Rep. 771; Gormley v. Taylor, 44 Ga. 76; People v. Osborne, 7 Colo. 605.

Contra.—But a contrary decision was reached in Wisconsin. In State v. Messmore, 14 Wis. 177, the court, by Dixon, C. J., said : " But an adjudication of the supreme court of the State of Indiana has been found, where it was decided, under a similar provision of the constitution of that state, that in such case an appointment might be made. Stocking

v. State, 7 Ind. 326. Upon the strength of that decision it has been strenuously insisted by counsel, that the power of making temporary appointments is a part of the elective system provided for by the constitution, and that a vacancy, within the meaning of section nine, exists in such a case, as much as when a judge dies or resigns his office. Unluckily for the views of counsel, the learned judges of Indiana, in their discussion of the question, seem entirely to have passed over the language of the section of their constitution, which authorizes the governor, to fill vacancies by appointment. It is in all material respects like that of our own. They limited their examination to the question, whether there was in any sense a vacancy, and having concluded that there was, they took it for granted that it was such a one as the governor could fill. That there was a vacancy, in the sense in which they applied the word, we are not inclined to dispute. Certainly, 'a new house may be as vacant as one tenanted for years, which was abandoned yesterday.' But aside from the requirement that judges of new circuits shall be elected, the question is not whether there is in any sense a vacancy, but whether it is such a one as the framers of the constitution contemplated should be filled by executive appointment. It seems clear to us that it is not, and that they looked solely to vacancies in existing offices, occasioned by the death, removal, or resignation of a previous incumbent. Their language is: 'Where a vacancy shall happen in the office of judge of the supreme or circuit court, such vacancy shall be filled by an appointment by the governor, which shall continue until a successor is elected and qualified.' The use of the word 'happen,' in this connection, is very significant, and evidently has reference to some casualty not provided for by law, and which could not be remedied by the usual means of an election. The primary principle established by the constitution is, that judges shall be elected, and the power of temporary appointment seems only to have been conferred from necessity, to cure certain defects which are inseparable from the system adopted. In the creation of a new circuit, no such necessity exists. The business of our courts is never such that the public would suffer inconvenience by the delay of an election in such a case. It is not a casualty in any sense of the word, but the deliberate act of a legislative body, which may well and conveniently be provided for by the usual method prescribed by the constitution."

Judgment of Forfeiture.—When a statute declares that if a sheriff shall not renew his bond within a specified time, his office shall immediately expire and become vacant, a failure to renew the bond within the prescribed time does not, per se, vacate his office. He is an officer with a defeasible title, until the judgment of forfeiture is pronounced in due form, and all his acts prior to such judgment are valid as to the public and third persons. Clark v. Ennis, 45 N. J. L. 69.

Temporary Vacancy—Absence through Sickness.—A statute provided that the chief clerk might act when the principal office was "vacant." This was held to apply to a temporary vacancy. Woodworth v. Hall, 1 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 391. The court, by Woodbury, J., said: "It is contended by the defendant that this clause empowers the chief clerk to act as commissioner only when his office is entirely, or de jure, vacant; and not when he is merely absent from sickness, or other necessary cause, constituting a de facto vacancy only, or a want of the commissioner present to discharge the duties arising from some such cause. It is certain that the words here used, looking no farther, appear to countenance the more narrow and limited view of the word 'vacancy;' but if we look to the object of the clause, to other sections of this and the succeeding patent act, to the contemporaneous construction placed upon it, to the long acquiescence under that construction, and the great public as well as private interests which have grown up in conformity to it within the last ten years, a broader meaning to the term seems fortified by the whole spirit of the act, and by the analogies of the case."

Suspension.—That suspension for the time being creates a vacancy, see Steuernville v. Culp, 38 Ohio St. 23.

Failure to Qualify.—In Virginia, it is provided that the failure of a county corporation or district officer to qualify before his term commences, shall create a vacancy. Vaughn v. Johnson, 77 Va. 300.

Failure to Elect.—A "vacancy" has been held to occur in Rhode Island, upon the failure of any candidate to receive a majority of the legal votes cast. In re Representation Vacancy, 15 R. I. 621. And in People v. Crissey, 91 N. Y. 634, it is said: "Although it has been held, in special instances, that the term 'vacancy' relates only to cases where officers have been duly elected, and not to those where there has been a failure to elect (People v. Van Horne, 18 Wend. (N. Y.) 518; Hayden v. Bucklin, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 512), yet that construction cannot apply here, since the legislation, respecting the election of aldermen of Troy, specially defines a failure to elect as one cause of a vacancy."

Expiration of Term.—While the expiration of a term, for which a particular person was elected to an office, does not create any "vacancy" in the office, within the meaning of the statute which provides for filling vacancies by appointment or election, still Wisconsin Rev. Stat., § 248, ch. 120, which declares that "whenever the office of any justice of the peace shall become vacant by resignation, removal, or otherwise," the justice to whom the books and papers of such former justice shall be delivered shall proceed to try the action, etc., must be construed as including the case of one who ceases to be justice by reason of the expiration of his term; and the same construction must be given to the similar provision in Wisconsin Rev. Stat., § 3591. Stamm v. Dixon, 49 Wis. 328.

Incumbent Holding Over.—It has been held that where an incumbent is lawfully holding over until his successor is elected or qualified, there is no vacancy in the office. State v. Brewster, 44 Ohio St. 593; State v. Howe, 25 Ohio St. 596; 18 Am. Rep. 321. Compare Johnson v. Mann, 77 Va. 271.

Appointment by President During Recess of Senate.—United States Const., § 2, art. II., which declares that "the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate," authorizes the President to fill a vacancy which happens during the session of the Senate and continues to exist after the Senate has adjourned.

The filling of a vacancy in the office of a district attorney or marshal, by a circuit justice, under authority of United States Rev. Stat., § 793, does not preclude the President from making an appointment to the same office during the recess of the Senate. In re Farrow, 4 Woods (U. S.) 491.

I. IN GENERAL.—Probably all contracts of fire insurance at the present day, so far as they relate to buildings, contain provisions calculated to prohibit the subject of insurance from becoming vacant. The added danger of fires, both accidental and incendiary, in the case of unoccupied buildings, has become so well recognized as to have passed into a proverb among underwriters and those engaged in the business of insuring.¹ Hence the omnipresence of the "vacancy clause" in modern fire policies, and hence, also, the precise and explicit, not to say verbose, language, with which it is clothed as it appears in the standard policy which has now, for the most part, superseded prior forms of the contract.²

Yet this clause, universal as it has now become, was not always a part of the fire policy. Like most of the other provisions of that instrument, it is the result of a gradual growth; its first appearance, though comparatively late in the history of insurance, than the Term.—Vacancy in an office means the want of an incumbent at the time. It has no reference to duration of time, and the appointment of a person to fill a vacancy, pro tempore, does not invest him with a full term, unless the law so expressly provides. Vacancy in an office is one thing, and term is another. An office may be vacant and filled many times during a term of four years. State v. Johns, 3 Oregon 537.

Vacancy "has been sometimes applied to the office as contradistinguished from the term of service, and at others to the term of office. I understand it as applicable to the office alone." Marcy, J., in People v. Green, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 273. But that the term "vacant" may, under certain circumstances, refer to the term and not the office, see Scott County v. Ring, 29 Minn. 405.

1. This is also a subject of judicial observation. See the remarks of the court in Alston v. Old North State Ins. Co., 80 N. Car. 326; 8 Ins. L. J. 428; Lancy v. Home Ins. Co., 82 Me. 492; White v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 83 Me. 279; Sleeper v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co., 56 N. H. 401; 5 Ins. L. J. 538.

but faintly anticipated its present form; and its ever-changing phraseology has been carefully adjusted to meet the joint demands of underwriting and of litigation.

It is for this reason that the "vacancy clause" and the decisions construing it, can best be understood by studying them from the historical standpoint. Few portions of the fire policy have been the subject of such extensive judicial discussion. But the value and significance of each of these numerous adjudications depend largely upon its date and the form of the clause which it construes. The decisions mark the progressive development of the contract. It will be the aim of this treatise to present them in the order above indicated, to show the proper historical position of each case, and to discuss the law of the subject, both in its present state and—as it can only be studied satisfactorily—in such way as to show its indissoluble relation to the state from which it has grown.

II. FIRST STAGE: VACANCY AND NON-TENANCY NOT MENTIONED.—

The earlier¹ policies of fire insurance appear to have contained no provision regarding the effect of ceasing to use or inhabit the insured premises.² The insurer seems to have rested his claims to exemption for this cause entirely upon general principles, and to have urged that there was an implied obligation on the part of the insured to keep his property tenanted. This view, however, seems at no time to have received judicial sanction. Thus, in an early Louisiana case,³ the defendants in an action on a policy answered "that they were not liable, because, at the time of the fire and long previous thereto, the house had been abandoned and was left open and without a tenant, and that, with ordinary care, attention and supervision, the loss would not have occurred." The truth of the allegation respecting non-tenancy was admitted by the court in its opinion, yet the defense was held insufficient.⁴ Shortly after this, Chief Justice Carter, speaking for the supreme court of New Brunswick, observed: "Can it be said that it is a part of the contract of insurance on a dwelling house, that it must be continually occupied? Surely the assured is to be allowed those rights and privileges which the owner has in the ordinary use of his own dwelling, and surely the right to cease to occupy it must be considered as one of those. He does not alter the nature of the building; it still continues to be what it was originally described to be, a dwelling house, that is, a house fit for dwelling

1. By this is meant earlier in point of fact and phraseology, not necessarily in time. Some of the companies changed the wording of their policies much sooner than others, and adjudications concerning them were not, of course, uniform in time throughout all jurisdictions.

2. An illustration of this is seen in the fact that the earliest text writers on the law of insurance, such as Marshall (1810), Hughes (1833), and Hammond (1840), ignore entirely the subject of non-tenancy.

in."¹ Later, the supreme court of Wisconsin, dealing with the defense of non-occupancy, said: "If there is anything in the by-laws or conditions which prevented the owner from leaving the premises, or for leaving them unoccupied, the answer should have averred it."² There are other dicta from which the same doctrine may be at least inferred,³ and it may be stated as the undisputed law that there can be no forfeiture on the ground of non-tenancy, without some express stipulation to that effect. What will amount to such a stipulation has been the chief subject of a judicial controversy, whose result it is the purpose of this treatise to summarize.

III. SECOND STAGE: USE OF DESCRIPTIVE WORDS RELATING TO TENANCY—1. Description of Present Tenancy.—Apparently the first efforts to frame an effective clause against vacancy, consisted in the employment, either in the policy or in some instrument collateral to it, of language describing how the premises were occupied. For the most part⁴ the words first used related to the tenancy at the time of the insurance. Thus, in an early New York case,⁵ where the policy stated that the insured building was "occupied . . . as a dwelling," it was urged that subsequent non-tenancy was fatal because the description was to be construed as a promissory warranty, but the court held that the policy was not avoided, since the statement was merely "an affirmative stipulation." Somewhat later the supreme court of Massachusetts approved a charge that where a policy simply insured a building as a "dwelling house," and the latter had been left unoccupied before the fire, even though the risk may have been increased by that fact, the owner might still recover if he had made all reasonable would make it the duty of the assured to have his house, if untenanted, guarded by a keeper. It is said by counsel that leaving an untenanted house open is a temptation to incendiaries. But there is no evidence that the house was in that condition on the night of the fire, so that the legal effect of such negligence need not be determined."

4. In one early case (Catlin v. Springfield F. Ins. Co., 1 Sumn. (U. S.) 434), the words used related wholly to the future.

5. In O'Neil v. Buffalo F. Ins. Co., 3 N. Y. 122, the court said: "Assuming that there was a written application by the plaintiff, describing the house as occupied by Goodhue, the description in the policy must be regarded as a warranty of the fact that he was the occupant at the date of the policy, and nothing more. The description imports nothing more. The defendant insists that the description warrants not only that he was the occupant at the date of the policy, but that he was to remain the occupant during the continuance of the risk. But the parties have not thought proper to express themselves to that effect. . . . The defendants, in support of their construction of the contract, refer us to the cases of marine policies. In those cases, if the vessel insured is described as a Swedish, American, or Spanish ship, the description is in most cases held to be a warranty, not only that the vessel is Swedish, American, or Spanish accordingly, but that her documents and papers are in conformity with her nationality, and that she is to remain and efforts to obtain a new tenant.¹ Even before either of the above adjudications, Mr. Justice Story had observed: "Suppose a policy against fire, underwritten on the house of A, in Boston, described as a dwelling house, or as occupied as a dwelling house. Would the policy be void if the house should cease for a time to have a tenant? Such a doctrine has never, to my knowledge, been asserted; nor should I deem it maintainable."² And it was said a few years later, in an insurance case before the English king's bench, that "a misdescription, it should seem, takes place only where the representation is false at the time of making."³ The doctrine of these early cases has been amply confirmed by later adjudications,⁴ and has even been carried to the extent of holding that a description of the premises in the policy⁵ or applica-be navigated in that character as long as the risk continues. A marine policy is a commercial contract, and it is construed according to the import of the words as they are understood among merchants. (Marsh. 347.) Without the proper documents and papers the ship insured would have no national character, and the possession of such papers is, therefore, a part of what is warranted; and the continuance of that character is manifestly material to the risk, and, indeed, the main object of the warranty; and for that reason it is held to be implied for the purpose of carrying out the clear intention of the parties. If a fact be in plain terms expressly warranted, its materiality to the risk is of no importance; it becomes a condition precedent, although entirely immaterial. But where a circumstance is sought to be included by implication in the warranty, it can never be supposed that the parties intended to include it, unless it be manifestly material to the risk."

tion,¹ as a "dwelling house" merely, is not a warranty that it is then occupied as such, and that, in the absence of concealment, vacancy of the building when insured will not avoid the policy. So the subsequent vacancy of a building described in the policy as "occupied all the year around" is cured, "if the occupation is resumed so long before the fire that the temporary absence of an occupant plainly appears to have had no connection with the loss."² In *New Hampshire*³ it has even been held that a statement in an application that the insured building "is occupied by tenants, including a cabinet-maker tenant in the third story," is merely a representation, and that the policy is not void though the third story was vacant at the time. And in Iowa a statement in the policy that the insured building is "occupied as stores on first floor," was regarded as complied with if any room on that floor was so occupied.⁴ Generally, however, if the descriptive words are "occupied as a dwelling," it seems that non-occupancy at the time of issuing the policy is fatal.⁵

3. In Boardman v. New Hampshire Mut. F. Ins. Co., 20 N. H. 551; 2 Bennett F. Ins. Cas. 548, the court said: "We conclude, therefore, that the words in which the application describes the premises as 'occupied by tenants, including a cabinet-maker tenant in the third story,' were merely representation, and not express warranty; and that the plaintiff is bound by them no further than they were material. They were material if they were such as may be supposed to have had a bearing upon the contract, and to have influenced the defendant in adjusting its terms; and a misrepresentation of any fact that is not material, does not, as has been said, avoid the contract. Whether the misrepresentation was or was not material is a question for the jury."

4. In Carter v. Humboldt F. Ins. Co., 17 Iowa 456, the court distinguishes Wall v. East River Mut. Ins. Co., 7 N. Y. 372, and says: "The language refers to the first floor as a whole, and not to the rooms or apartments into which it was divided. It does not say that these several apartments are thus used, but the first floor is thus occupied. And, while we cannot concur in the argument of the plaintiff, that the word 'occupied' means the same as 'constructed'; nor yet fully in the position that the clause under consideration is descriptive merely of the object or purpose to which the first floor was to be devoted, we, nevertheless, think it was intended more to describe the manner of its intended occupancy and use, than as a warranty that each room was so used at the time. Thus it was contemplated that stores, in their ordinary signification, were kept (or to be kept) there, rather than billiard saloons, liquor shops, carpenter shops, or other establishments of a like character. And this view is strengthened by the fact that the building was a large one; that it was unfinished; the larger portion (all above the first floor) was to remain unoccupied during the continuance of the policy; that was intended for a hotel, while the lower or first floor was designed for stores. Its purpose and object was clearly shown in the manner of its construction, and while, according to the strict letter of this warranty, some occupancy of the first floor was necessary, we do not believe that it means that all the subdivisions were occupied. The first floor was not unoccupied. And yet such was its condition, according to appellee's argument, in the light of the requirements of this policy."

5. Premises Described as Occupied.—

2. Description as to Future Tenancy.—The next modification of the vacancy clause consisted in employing words relating to the future tenancy of the premises. The new phraseology, with an important limitation, was construed by Judge Story as early as 1833.¹ The clause there read: "At present occupied as a dwelling house, but to be occupied hereafter as a tavern, and privileged as such." Upon the strength of the phrase here printed in italics, it was held that the clause was not "a warranty of the assured that it should be at all times, during the risk, occupied as a tavern, but a license or privilege granted by the company that it might be so occupied."² Similarly, in Connecticut,³ the insured's answer in the survey that the building was "to be occupied by tenant," was regarded merely as the reservation of a privilege, though the policy provided that the survey should be deemed a warranty. In the same year as the latter, a case came before the supreme

In Alexander v. Germania F. Ins. Co., 66 N. Y. 464; 23 Am. Rep. 76, reversing 2 Hun (N. Y.) 655, the court said: "By the terms of the policy the defendant insured the plaintiff against loss, etc., 'on his two story extension frame, shingle-roof building, occupied as a dwelling, situate,' etc. This was clearly a warranty that the building was, at the time of the insurance, occupied as a dwelling. The description and location of the building were fully set forth. The statement that it was occupied as a dwelling was not necessary for its identification, and could have been inserted for no other purpose than as a statement of a fact relating to the risk." See, to the same effect, Wall v. East River Mut. Ins. Co., 7 N. Y. 372; Stout v. City F. Ins. Co., 12 Iowa 371; 79 Am. Dec. 539; 4 Bennett F. Ins. Cas. 556; Boyd v. Vanderbilt Ins. Curry, 13 Bush (Ky.) 312; 26 Am. Rep. 194; 6 Ins. L. J. 733. The authority of this last case, however, is somewhat shaken by Germania L. Ins. Co. v. Rudwig, 80 Ky. 223; 11 Ins. L. J. 603. Compare Prudhomme v. Salamander F. Ins. Co., 27 La. Ann. 695, where the building, though described as a store, was in fact a hotel, and the policy was held to be avoided under a clause declaring risks on "taverns" to be extra hazardous.

S.) 434, the learned judge further observed: "The construction would be, not that the words restrained, but that they enlarged, the general words of the policy. Let me put another case. Suppose a policy against fire, underwritten on the house of A, in Boston, described as a dwelling house, or as occupied as a dwelling house. Would the policy be void if the house should cease for a time to have a tenant? Such a doctrine has never, to my knowledge, been asserted; nor should I deem it maintainable."

Dec. 581, the court said: "The object of the inquiry was to ascertain the kind and character of the business carried on in the buildings, in order to enable the insurer to calculate the degree of hazard to which those buildings would be exposed. Hence the inquiry 'how'—that is, in what manner, not by whom—are the several stories occupied. And the first clause of the answer 'unoccupied,' is directly and completely responsive to the question. Nothing more need have court of Maine,¹ where the application contained the phrase "will be occupied by a tenant." The court, taking the suggestion from an early marine case,² distinguished between the representation of an expectancy, which it held this phrase to be, and that of an existing fact, holding that the former was not even in the nature of a warranty. In Massachusetts, the rule was broadly stated that there could be no forfeiture for failure to fulfill an express promise of occupancy, even though an increase of risk resulted, unless fraud were proved.³ It may then be regarded as settled that, under such phrases as the above, no matter how seemingly strong, the policy will not be avoided for non-tenancy, if it is possible to construe them as representations.⁴ A clause by which there is "warranted a family to live in said house throughout the year," was held by the supreme court of Massachusetts to require "literal and exact fulfillment," and not to be complied with because, for a time, the building was used merely as the lodging place of two workmen;⁵ but the federal circuit court sitting in New Hampshire sustained a finding upon the same facts, to the effect that a family was living in the house.⁶

IV. THIRD STAGE: "INCREASE OF RISK" PROHIBITED.—The use of language merely stating the present or proposed occupancy of the premises having thus proved, for the most part, insufficient, the insurer next sought to guard against non-occupancy by a general clause prohibiting any increase in the risk. But the courts have almost unanimously held that non-tenancy does not per se increase the risk or hazard, and that, under such a provision alone, the policy is not avoided for that cause,⁷ for whether or not the been said, or was said, by way of answer to that interrogatory. But as the plaintiff had already advertised the premises to let, it was natural, if not necessary, that he should notify the defendants of the fact, and accordingly he added 'but to be occupied by a tenant,' intending thereby to reserve to himself the right, not to incur an obligation, to put a tenant into the vacant buildings. And so we think the defendant ought to have understood it."

Per Se.—One of the earliest authorities on this point is Foy v. Aetna F. Ins. Co., 3 Allen (N. B.) 29; 3 Bennett F. Ins. Cas. 695. From the opinion the following extracts are taken: "If it be said that the ceasing to occupy a dwelling house amounts to some degree of negligence, in withdrawing the care and protection which, it may be supposed, would arise from the presence of a family constantly living on the premises, still negligence, unless it be very gross, so as almost to amount to willful misconduct or fraud, is one of the ordinary risks against which the policy of insurance is intended to protect. Shaw v. Robberds, 6 Ad. & El. 79. The great majority of fires arise from risk has been increased is generally¹ a question of fact for the jury,² and it has even been held that the testimony of expert underwriters is not admissible concerning it,³ though this is not negligence, and if the doctrine contended for were carried to its full extent in this point of view (and it is not easy to see where we are to stop), the protection of an insurance would become, in insurance parlance, extra hazardous. See 1 Phil. Insurance, ch. XIII, § 2, p. 576, and § 7, p. 633. . . .

If insurance offices intend to rely on any general doctrine of risk on an unoccupied house being greater than one which is occupied, they must provide for it by some special condition, which will give the assured fair notice on the subject. But if they rely on the very general terms of the 4th condition of this policy, they must at all events give evidence that, under the circumstances and situation of the premises in each particular case, the probability of destruction by fire was greater when the premises were unoccupied. The general opinion of an insurance agent will not be sufficient; the fact must be made out as existing in the particular circumstances of the individual case." See also Gilliat v. Pawtucket Mut. F. Ins. Co., 8 R. I. 282; 91 Am. Dec. 229; 5 Bennett F. Ins. Cas. 90; Gould v. British America Assur. Co., 27 U. C. Q. B. 473; Joyce v. Maine Ins. Co., 45 Me. 168; 71 Am. Dec. 536; *Residence F. Ins. the universal rule.¹ At any rate, they may state whether underwriters generally (though not in a particular instance) would charge a higher premium for untenanted buildings.² It has also been held that they may testify to relative degrees of hazard of different uses.³

In Maine, it is provided by statute that no breach of the conditions of the policy shall be fatal, "unless the risk was thereby materially increased,"⁴ and this provision applies in full force to the "vacancy clause."⁵ But increase of risk is presumed from the mere fact of vacancy, even in that state.⁶

V. FOURTH STAGE: VACANCY AND NON-TENANCY PROHIBITED IN EXPRESS TERMS—1. In General.—A new stage in the evolution of the vacancy clause is reached when it assumes, for the first time,

1. "The authorities are not so harmonious as to whether it is a question to be determined by the testimony of experts, though the weight of authority is in favor of the admission of such testimony to guide the jury as to the materiality of circumstances affecting the risk, especially when the determination of the question calls for a degree of knowledge not likely to be possessed by an ordinary jury. Leitch v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co., 66 N. Y. 108; M'Lanahan v. Universal Ins. Co., 1 Pet. (U. S.) 188; Jefferson Ins. Co. v. Cotheal, 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 72; 22 Am. Dec. 567. In the case last cited it was held that the testimony of experts was not receivable, but the decision went upon the ground that the circumstances were such that the jury were as competent as any expert to determine whether there was any increase of risk in that case, and that it was so obvious that there was no increase of risk, that they would have been justified in finding against the testimony of any number of experts. It must depend somewhat upon the facts in each case, whether the testimony of experts is necessary, and whether it should be controlling. The jury in some cases, at least, should be at liberty to exercise their own judgment upon all the facts, and upon the

the form of a specific prohibition of non-tenancy. Up to this period the insurer had relied for protection upon general provisions, or upon rights alleged to be implied from the contract or some collateral instrument. Experience, however, had now shown that the courts, for the most part, would not sustain defenses founded upon the construction which these provisions had been intended by the insurer to bear. It became necessary, therefore, to use language which would no longer be uncertain, and the history of this fourth stage is largely the record of a search for, and experiment in, such phraseology. Theretofore the question had been whether the contract actually prohibited non-tenancy. Now the principal subject of controversy became one as to whether there was a vacancy within the meaning of the phrases employed to prevent it.

2. Phrases Employed—a. "IF THE PREMISES BECOME UNOCCUPIED."—The word "unoccupied" appears to have been used in the prohibitory clause earlier than any other.¹ Under this form of the clause it has been held that "some practical use of the building must have been made;" in the case of a trip hammer shop insured with the machinery therein, "it is not sufficient to constitute occupancy that the tools remained in the shop, and that the plaintiff's son went through the shop almost every day to look around and see if things were right."² So a dwelling house and barn are "unoccupied," if the former is used by the insured and his servants for the sole purpose of taking meals there while working upon an adjacent farm, and the barn is a mere storage room.³ And a dwelling house "becomes unoccupied" when the insured goes elsewhere to reside, though furniture is left in the house and a man placed in charge with instructions to sleep there.⁴ But a building insured as a "ten tenement frame

In the first case the policy contained the words "if the premises shall be vacant," etc., and also the clause "buildings unoccupied are not covered by this policy." It is the latter clause which the court in its opinion construes.

The remarks of Miller, J., in Williams v. North German Ins. Co., 24 Fed. Rep. 625, seem hardly reconcilable with this line of cases. Speaking there of a grain elevator, the learned judge says: "As to the occupancy of the building, if I was a juror I should say that the property was occupied; that the elevator remained there, with its machinery, sometimes used and sometimes not used, as it had been for years. The cessation from use simply meant that no steam was up and that nobody went there to work; but men were around there all the time, and Williams went there frequently—had his papers there; and I think that I, as a juror, notwithstanding some part of the time they were not using the elevator, would find it was not vacant."

4. In Cook v. Continental Ins. Co., 70 Mo. 610; 35 Am. Rep. 438; 9 Ins. L. J. 887, the court said: "When this policy was issued, the plaintiff kept what witnesses called a 'Ladies' Boarding House,' and had eight girls with her. After she left the premises, there was no one living in it. She lived in Kansas City, and Southwick was, by her, instructed to sleep in the house, but he block" is not "unoccupied" so long as two of the apartments therein are used as residences,¹ though it has been held that a policy covering a house and outbuildings, and containing this clause, is void if the house becomes unoccupied for a time,² and one insuring "eight double tenement houses" is forfeited as to each single house by its non-tenancy.³ In Indiana, a provision that the policy shall cease and be of no force if the building "become unoccupied," does not avoid the policy on that ground, but merely suspends its operation during non-tenancy and is not did not sleep in it after Wednesday night next preceding the Saturday night of the fire. His sleeping there at night was not an occupation of the house within the meaning of the policy. He did not occupy the house during the day. It is true that there is more danger from incendiaries at night than in the day time, but dwelling houses unoccupied during the day are in more danger from that class than when occupied, and the abandonment of the premises by plaintiff diminished the security against the destruction of the house by fire. It will be observed that the condition avoids the policy if the premises become unoccupied, without regard to the period of time that they remain unoccupied, therein differing from the cases cited; and giving it a liberal construction, while the temporary absence of the entire family for a day, or a few days, might not avoid the policy, yet, if the family occupying the house abandon it, as in this case, for another residence, requesting a person to sleep there until it should be rented, and such person leaves the place several days before the fire occurs and remains away until it is consumed by fire, with what propriety can it be said that it was 'occupied' when burned? If the absence of plaintiff had been for a visit, and not to change her residence, the case might (we do not say would) be different. 'Occupation of a dwelling house is living in it.' 'A mere supervision over it is not sufficient.' It was plaintiff's business, under the policy, to see that the house was occupied. If she had put a tenant in possession under a lease for a month, or a year, and four days previous to the fire the tenant had vacated the premises and taken another house, her agreement with that tenant would not have availed her in a suit with the insurance company. So her instructions to Southwick, admitting that the observance of them by him would have saved the policy, cannot avail her, if, with or without her consent, he did vacate the premises several days before they were burned." Compare Abrahams v. Agricultural Mut. Assur. Assoc., 40 U. C. Q. B. 175, where the tenant moved before the insured expected.

1. In Harrington v. Fitchburg Mut. F. Ins. Co., 124 Mass. 126; 7 Ins. L. J. 618, the court, by Lord, J., said: "The phrase 'tenement block' gives but slight indication of what portions of the block the tenements consist, whether a single room, a floor, or flat, or suite of rooms. It imports only of necessity that the building is designed for the accommodation of various families. The phrase in the policy, 'whenever a building insured shall be unoccupied,' cannot mean that the absence of an occupant of a single apartment of a tenement house, while other apartments are occupied, shall render the building an unoccupied building. The cases cited by the defendant do not in any manner sustain its position. Neither in Keith v. Quincy Ins. Co., 10 Allen (Mass.) 228, nor in Ashworth v. Builders' Mut. F. Ins. Co., 112 Mass. 422; 17 Am. Rep. 117, was there an occupancy, within the meaning of that phrase, of the whole, or of any part, of the building insured; and it would be doing violence to language to say that a tenement block, insured as a single building, is an unoccupied building, with two of the tenements in actual use and occupation as residences; and, while it is not within the words, it is not within the mischief which the clause is designed to protect the insurer against." Compare the dictum of Green, J., in *Sonneborn v. applicable in any event to a temporary vacancy incident to a change of tenants.¹ In Texas, it seems that the non-occupancy must be for an unreasonable time in order to avoid the policy under this clause;² and in Tennessee, it is a sufficient excuse that vacancy was occasioned by an epidemic.³ A variance of the foregoing form of the clause, by forbidding the premises to be left unoccupied, does not appear to have resulted in a different construction. Under it the policy is likewise avoided if the building is merely in charge of one who boards at a neighbors,⁴ or who simply leaves his effects in the house and visits it occasionally.⁵ A similar interpretation has been given to the phrase "unoccupied and so remain,"⁶ though it was held in Illinois that a policy with this clause, insuring a summer residence, was not avoided by the fact that the insured spent the winter months mainly elsewhere, if she and her husband returned and used the premises at least once a week.⁷ Where the policy declared that the building should not "cease to be occupied," an instruction excepting vacancy incident to the exchange of tenants was held erroneous.⁸

The right to exact a forfeiture under the clause has generally been regarded as waived (though the policies required a written indorsement of consent), where the insurer's agent knew that the premises were unoccupied but continued to treat the contract as in force, as, for example, by requiring further proofs of loss,⁹ demanding the additional premiums charged for vacant buildings,¹⁰ or assenting orally to the vacancy.¹¹ In Kentucky, however, it has been held that disclosure of expected absence from the premises will not enable the insured to escape the consequences of this clause.¹²

b. "VACATED BY THE REMOVAL OF OWNER OR OCCUPANT."—Another of the earliest of these specific phrases to be used was one which merely forbade non-occupancy by particular persons. Thus, one of such clauses imposed forfeiture "when the occupant personally vacates the premises," and this was enforced where it was not expressly shown that the risk had thereby been increased,¹ and also where notice of vacancy was given to an agent not authorized to receive it.² So a provision forbidding the premises to "become vacated by the removal of owner or occupant," without consent, has been generally enforced,³ even though furniture had been left in the building, and the last occupant had a general intention of returning,⁴ though the insured was ignorant of the vacancy at the time it began, and at once sought to procure another tenant upon learning of it,⁵ and though the local agent knew at the time he issued the policy,⁶ or

The parties expressly stipulated in the policy, or in the above condition annexed to the policy and made a part of it, that if the insured premises should become vacant, immediate notice of that circumstance should be given to the company. If this were not done it avoided the policy. Such is the manifest agreement of the parties, and they must be bound by it."

In this case the tenant left the premises in July, settling for the rent, however, until the next spring, and intending to return then, or, if business should be dull, earlier. The fire occurred in October. Smith, J., in delivering the opinion, said: "The contract is to have a reasonable interpretation according to the ordinary acceptance of the language used. It is apparent the insurers intended to guard against the increased risk which inevitably affects buildings where no one is living or carrying on any business. An unoccupied building invites a shelter to wanderers and evil disposed persons. No one interested is present to watch or care for the property, or to seasonably extinguish the flames in case of fire; and for various reasons that might be enumerated, an unoccupied building is more exposed to destruction, to say nothing of the inducement a dishonest owner would have to turn it, if unprofitable, into money, when insured, by becoming a party to its destruction by fire. If, then, the motive is to have some one present, occupying and dwelling in the buildings, and interested to preserve the roof that shelters his family, or holds his household goods, that object would plainly be defeated by holding that he and his family may depart with all their possessions, save, perhaps, a few articles not needed for present use, and still the premises be considered occupied. It is true that often a person may vacate his home with his family, and a portion or all of his possessions, for a temporary purpose, and yet his residence or home be considered, for the purpose of voting or being taxed, to be in the place thus temporarily abandoned. But in law, whether a person has temporarily or permanently abandoned his home, is altogether a different question from the one whether buildings are vacant when abandoned even for a temporary purpose. I cannot say that I have any doubt that these buildings were vacant at the time they were burned, in the sense in which that term was used in the policy."

6. Newmarket Sav. Bank v. Royal Ins. Co., 150 Mass. 374. Here there had been indorsed on the policy the words "Permission to remain vacant thirty days without prejudice," and above these were stamped in print the words "Occupied for dwelling purposes only." The court regarded these phrases as negating the presumption of waiver, and constituting an exception to the general provisions of the policy to operate for thirty days and no longer. Compare Wheeler v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (decided by the Kansas City court of appeals, May 27, 1893), 2 Mo. Legal News 496.

But the New York court of appeals, in construing this same clause, regarded the use of the words, "by the removal of owner or occupant," as significant, holding "that they refer to a permanent removal and entire abandonment of the house as a place of residence," and that the trial court should have submitted to the jury evidence that the insured, though absent from the premises "for a considerable period," left his goods there, and intended in time to return.³ And an agent who has implied power to waive the condition, may consent to vacancy, even after removal.⁴

cate," etc., and a breach of it was held to prevent recovery by the mortgagee, to whom the loss was payable.

1. Walsh v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 73 N. Y. 5; 7 Ins. L. J. 423. In this case the local agent was notified on the day the premises were vacated, consented to it, and made a memorandum of the fact in his register, informing the insured that nothing further was necessary. The policy, however, required a written indorsement of consent, and the court held that the insured's failure to obtain it avoided his policy, saying: "The company could itself dispense with this condition by oral consent as well as by writing (First Baptist Church v. Brooklyn F. Ins. Co., 19 N. Y. 305); and Carpenter, unless specially restricted, would have possessed, in this respect, the power of the principal. But the policy contains the provision that no agent of the company shall be deemed to have waived any of the terms and conditions of the policy, unless such waiver is indorsed on the policy in writing. This is a plain limitation upon the power of agents, and can mean nothing less than that agents shall not have the power to waive conditions except in one mode, viz., by an indorsement on the policy. The plaintiff is presumed to have known what the contract contained, and the proof tends to the conclusion that this provision was brought to his notice. He saw fit, however, to accept the assurance of the agent that an entry in the register was sufficient. It is difficult to see how, upon the law of contracts and agency, the plaintiff can recover. The entry in the register was not an indorsement on the policy. The oral consent was an act in excess of the known authority of the agent. The provision was designed to protect the company against collusion and fraud, and the dangers and uncertainty of oral testimony. The case seems to be a hard one for the plaintiff, but courts cannot make contracts for parties, nor can they dispense with their provisions."

2. In Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Davenport, 37 Mich. 608; 7 Ins. L. J. 228, the court said: "We are also of opinion that the plaintiffs below showed no right to sue upon the contract. The parties to this policy were Headley and the company. Van Buren v. St. Joseph County Village F. Ins. Co., 28 Mich. 404; Clay F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Huron Salt, etc., Mfg. Co., 31 Mich. 346. The policy was to insure his interest and not that of the mortgagees, and any money paid to them would inure to his benefit. They hold no assignment of the policy and sue as original parties."

3. Cummins v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 67 N. Y. 260; 23 Am. Rep. 111, reversing 5 Hun (N. Y.) 554. The doctrine of the case seems to be directly opposed to Sleeper v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co., 56 N. H. 401, as the facts were very similar. The two cases were decided the same year, but apparently each independent of the other.

4. Wheeler v. Watertown F. Ins. Co., 131 Mass. 1, where the court thus discusses the power of the agents to waive the condition: "The evidence warranted a finding that the agent had authority to permit the policy to continue in force after the house became vacant. His commission as agent authorized him to issue policies, make surveys, consent to the assignment of policies, receive premiums, and 'attend to all other duties and business of the agency.' The policy provides that if, without the written consent of the company first obtained, the dwelling house becomes vacant by removal of the occupant, the policy shall become void. This provision anticipates as probable, a state of facts which will make it necessary, for the protection of

Fourth Stage: VACANCY AND NON-TENANCY. Prohibited, etc.

The words "owner or occupant" are held to preclude the application of the clause to buildings not intended for human habitation.¹

The "immediate notice," required by this clause, has been held to mean "notice within a reasonable time in view of the circumstances and position of the parties."² Indorsement of such notice on the policy is not essential unless required,³ and a provision therefor has been construed as referring, not to consent, but to the fact of notice.⁴ A notice stating that the household goods will not be removed, will not prevent forfeiture, if, in fact, they are substantially all carried away.⁵ And notice of vacancy

the insured, that the written consent of the company to the continuance of the policy, after the house became vacant, should be given. The agent who issued the policy would be the person to act for the company in the premises, and it would be one of the duties, and a part of the business of his agency, to attend to the matter, and give or refuse the consent of the company as circumstances should seem to him to warrant. The fact that the consent was not indorsed till after the removal of the tenant had occurred, is of no importance. It was within the power of the company, and of its agent in its behalf, to waive the condition, so far as it applied to the short period between the removal of the tenant and the indorsement of the consent. Otherwise, the provision would be of little value to the assured, in many instances, because he would be likely to learn that the house was vacant without having received notice that his tenant was about to leave it." See also Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Kinnier, 28 Gratt. (Va.) 88; 6 Ins. L. J. 497.

1. In Kimball v. Monarch Ins. Co., 70 Iowa 513, where the insurance covered a hog-house, the court said: "This condition is not against non-user of the dwelling, but against vacation 'by the removal of the owner or occupant.' It certainly does not intend to bind the assured to personal occupancy of the building, for it was not of a character that would permit it. It surely was intended to express nothing more than that, if the owner or occupant of the whole premises removed away, the policy should be void. It was intended to secure the attention and watchfulness of the owner and occupant to protect it from fire. The owner of the premises continued to reside thereon, but the hog-house was not used for some time prior to its destruction. The cases cited by counsel involve conditions against vacancy found in policies covering dwellings and other buildings capable of being occupied by the owner or tenants. This clearly appears from the statements of counsel, and the citations from the cases made by him in his argument."

2. Strunk v. Firemen's Ins. Co., (Pa. 1894), 28 Atl. Rep. 779; 23 Ins. L. J. 475. In this case the premises were vacated on April 4th, the insured on that day requesting her husband to give the notice. He notified the supposed agent two days afterward, and at the request of the latter another insurance agent wrote to the home office of the defendant, the letter reaching there on the 9th. The court said: "What would be reasonable time when the parties live in the same city or town, or have means of ready communication, might be very unreasonable if applied to the parties to this suit, one of whom lived on a farm six miles from a post office, twelve miles from a railroad, and thirteen miles from the town in which the agent of the company who had placed the insurance, and to whom she would naturally look for instruction, resided."

and consent thereto, during the original term of a policy, are not binding upon a renewal thereof.¹

c. "VACANT;" "VACATED."—Where the designation of persons causing the non-occupancy was omitted, the insurer has been less successful in defending than with the foregoing clause. A provision that the building should not become vacant was not enforced, where the agent retained the policy and informed the insured that vacancy "would not matter."² And a clause imposing forfeiture "if the premises shall be vacated," does not apply where personalty and fixtures alone are insured,³ or where there is a mere temporary absence of the occupant,⁴ or a vacancy incident to the change of tenants,⁵ or to the purposes for which the building is used.⁶ So a house and barn, insured under one policy for

3. Carr v. Roger Williams Ins. Co., 60 N. H. 513; 13 Ins. L. J. 443, where the court, after stating the rule that forfeiture conditions were to be construed most strongly against the insurer, said: "Neither the insured nor the plaintiff owned the building or had any interest therein except as a lessee, and the policy did not cover it. The insurance was upon 'the machinery, shafting, belting, tools, and fixtures contained in a two-story frame building and additions to same, known as the Kearsarge Paper Mill.' The mention of the building is merely descriptive of the location of the property. The property being movable, it was important to state its location to distinguish it from other property of the same kind. The description would not necessarily have been different if the property had been stored. The conditions, the breach of which the defendants claim avoids the policies, have no application to the facts of these cases. They relate to the building and nothing else. The term 'premises' does not include, and is never used to designate, personal property. It is used, both in law and in common speech, to indicate lands and tenements. Robinson v. Mercer County Mut. F. Ins. Co., 27 N. J. L. 134; Howard F., etc., Ins. Co. v. Cornick, 24 Ill. 455. The connection in which the term is used indicates no intention to use it in any but its natural and ordinary sense. But to defeat the plain-tiff's recovery, we are compelled to find that there was such an intention, and to give to the word a strained and unusual signification. We have found no case in which it is even hinted that the word 'premises' is ever used in connection with personal property only. If the insured had owned the building, and the policy had covered the building as well as the machinery, it might with propriety be claimed that the condition relating to occupancy was applicable to both building and machinery and other property described in the policies; but the fact that the title to real and personal property is in different hands, coupled with the further fact that we are compelled to give to the word 'premises' an unusual and unnatural meaning, sustains the view that these conditions have no application to this case. And when we consider that the policies cover personal property and nothing else, because the insured had no insurable interest in the real estate, the inference fairly to be drawn is, that at least one of the parties to the contract did not understand that they were making a contract whereby they were bound to keep their machinery in motion if they would have it insured." But compare Reid v. Lancaster F. Ins. Co., 90 N. Y. 382, where the term "premises" appears to have been applied to a ship.

a gross premium, do not "become vacant" if the barn continues to be put to its ordinary use.¹

d. "VACANT AND UNOCCUPIED."—The linking together, by the copulative conjunction, of the two words, each of which had formed the principal member of previous clauses, was the next change in phraseology. The cases construing this language are not numerous,² because it was retained by few insurers for more than a brief period. At first the conjoint term does not appear to have been given a different construction from that placed upon either word alone. Indeed, it has been expressly said that "the terms 'vacancy' and 'non-occupancy,' are used interchangeably, and as equivalent in meaning."³ In most of the early cases, also, the clause was enforced quite as literally as former ones had been. Its language was held to avoid the policy where tenant removed, though he left furniture in the house and retained the key,⁴ though the insured did not know of the vacancy until a few days before the fire, but was required to give notice thereof,⁵ and

4. In American Ins. Co. v. Padfield, 78 Ill. 167; 5 Bennett F. Ins. Cas. 764, the court said: "The evidence uncontestedly shows that no person was residing in this house, or had been for about two months prior to, or at the time of, the fire. The tenant in possession at the time the insurance was effected, testified that he had removed from the house that length of time before, and notified the assured of the fact, who requested him to lease it to some one else, but afterward countermanded the directions, and it had remained unoccupied until it was burnt. He says he did not consider that he had anything more to do with the house; that he was not occupying it or paying rent for it; he only had the key to deliver to Anderson when he came back from Missouri; that there was a table, a crib, and a straw tick in it, in the house when it burnt. A number of persons testified that the house was vacant. We think there cannot be the slightest room to doubt that the house was vacant and unoccupied when the fire occurred, and had been for two months previously. A fair and reasonable construction of the language 'vacant and unoccupied,' is, that it should be without an occupant—without any person living in it. This is the popular meaning of the language, as appears from the evidence. Several witnesses, knowing that no one was residing in it, testified that it was vacant; and so would the great majority, if not all persons, say the same thing. The language is not used in a technical, but in a popular sense. If the house had been situated when insured as it was when it was burned, and the assured had answered that it was occupied by a tenant, would anyone doubt that such representation was false?"

5. "It is made an essential condition of the contract that the property should not be exposed to the perils of an unoccupied tenement without the fact being communicated to the insurer and the consent of the company obtained and indorsed by an entry on the policy. This is a just and reasonable precaution against an increased risk without an increased premium, and a substantial and important element of the contract. The danger to unoccupied buildings is certainly greater in the absence of anyone to protect them, or to extinguish the fire at the beginning, or to detect and punish the incendiary; and this is quite manifest from the facts of the present case. It may be that the attempt would not have been made if a vigilant and careful person had been present, interested in the preservation of his own property as well, or if made, would not have

though the building was insured as a schoolhouse, but was afterwards for a time occupied as a dwelling, and then left untenanted.¹ The phrase "vacated . . . and unoccupied" was held to apply to a vessel drawn upon the shore and emptied of its contents, but occasionally visited by workmen who came to make repairs.² This condition, in its usual form, was said to be "not in any way or manner dependent upon the diligence of the assured to keep the building occupied,"³ and when coupled with a clause forbidding increase of risk "by any other means within the control of the assured," it was held to require the latter to show that he could not have prevented vacancy.⁴

There were, of course, other early cases in which the insurers were not successful in escaping liability by virtue of this clause. Indeed, probably the earliest decision directly construing it⁵ was one in which the provision was held to be ineffectual, though non-tenancy appears to have been conceded; but this was founded upon a statute of Maine providing that certain stipulated grounds of forfeiture should not apply if there had been no material increase of the risk.⁶ The temporary suspension of a saw-mill⁷ been successful. And if this was not so, and it is an essential condition of the insurance that if the premises become vacant, the consent of the company must be obtained in the manner specified, or the policy become void. By this condition the plaintiffs must abide, and the consequences of their neglect must rest upon themselves. This proposition seems to be too plain for discussion." Smith, C. J., in Alston v. Old North State Ins. Co., 80 N. Car. 326; 8 Ins. L. J. 428. Compare the following language in Moore v. Phoenix F. Ins. Co., 64 N. H. 140; 10 Am. St. Rep. 384: "It does not alter the case that the plaintiff did not know of the vacancy and non-occupancy until the time of reoccupation. Reasonable care required that he should have known of the tenant's removal, and it was his duty to see that the terms of the contract were carried out."

1. In American Ins. Co. v. Foster, 92 Ill. 334; 34 Am. Rep. 134; 9 Ins. L. J. 268, the court said: "It is, however, contended that as the building was insured as a schoolhouse, and the company knew it was to be so used, it may be inferred that it was intended to be vacant and unoccupied as common public schoolhouses usually are in vacation; that all know that the common schoolhouses of the country are not continuously occupied, and it must be inferred that occupancy of that character was intended. If such had been the intention of the parties they would, no doubt, have so written the condition. And the reading of the language repels such inference. The language requires a continuous and uninterrupted occupancy, at least of the character usual to houses occupied for schools. It may be and probably is true that there being no person in the building of nights and Saturdays and Sundays would not amount to a breach of the condition and avoid the policy, as such is the manner of occupying schoolhouses. But the most strained construction cannot go beyond that, so as to hold that it need not be occupied as a school or residence for several months. To so hold would be a perversion of the language the parties have employed to express their meaning." and a cotton factory,¹ the latter meanwhile being frequented by employés and watchmen, has been held not to avoid the policy under this clause. Where the premises were prohibited from becoming "vacant or unoccupied for more than thirty days," this was construed to mean continuous non-tenancy,² and issuance of the policy by the agent with full knowledge that it was, and would for a time remain, unoccupied, was held to waive the provision.³ Finally, the rule was announced in *New York*⁴ that the words "vacant" and "unoccupied" were not synonymous, but that the former was much the stronger term, meaning "empty,"⁵ and that unless different from its meaning when applied to a saw-mill. The condition against vacancy, although designed mainly for cases where the building insured is used as a habitation, is, however, found in the policy, and effect is to be given to it. But it is to be construed in view of the situation and character of the property insured, and the contingencies affecting its use, to which this and other property of like character, similarly situated, is subject. The description in the policy shows that the defendant knew that the mill was operated by water power, and as it was a saw-mill, the insurer must be presumed to have known that saw-mills are, or may be, used as well for custom work as for sawing the logs of the owner; and as machinery was used for the operation of the mill, the fact that it was liable to break down and need repairs, must also have been within the contemplation of the parties when the policy was issued. The interruptions of the business and the discontinuance of the active use of the saw-mill, by reason of low water, diminished custom, or derangement of the machinery, if held to be a violation of the condition, and to create a vacancy and non-occupation of the building within the true meaning of the condition, would greatly impair the value of the contract as a contract of indemnity, and the result would be, that the contract would be deemed forfeited by the happening of events which might reasonably have been anticipated, and which were among the common incidents of the business carried on, on the insured premises.

Earl, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in the former case, said: "We should have had a different question for consideration if the condition had been that the policy should become void if the house should become 'vacant or unoccupied,' or simply 'unoccupied.' Here we have the two words joined together, 'vacant and unoccupied;' and what do they mean? . . . A dwelling house is unoccupied when no one lives therein, but is not then necessarily vacant. A house filled with furniture throughout cannot be said to be 'vacant,' the primary and ordinary meaning of which is 'empty.' To avoid the policy, the premises must not only be unoccupied but also vacant. Force should be given to both words. This is not a casual contract drawn in haste, in which language has been carelessly used; but it is a form of contract used by the defendant in its business, probably adopted with great deliberation, every word of which, as we may suppose, has been carefully weighed. It was not intended that mere non-occupancy should avoid the policy; if it had been, it cannot be supposed that the word 'vacant' would have been superadded." See also Limburg v. German F. Ins. Co. (Iowa, 1894), 57 N. W. Rep. 626; 23 Ins. L. J. 321. Contra, Moore v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 64 N. H. 140; 10 Am. St. Rep. 384; Dohlantry v. Blue Mounds F., etc., Ins. Co., 83 Wis. 181.

5. In May on Insurance (3d ed.), § 249a, it is said that vacant means "empty of all but air." This, however, is somewhat stronger language than that used in Herrman v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 81 N. Y. 184; 37 Am. Rep. 488, which is the only one cited in support of the text. And in Dohlantry v.

a building was both untenanted by human beings and devoid of contents, the clause would not apply.¹ This construction, of course, made the clause less effective than it had been when containing but one of the words alone (especially less so than the single word "unoccupied"), and led to a disuse of the copulative conjunction "and" in framing the vacancy clause.

e. "VACANT OR UNOCCUPIED."—The construction given by the New York courts, to the phrase last discussed, made it necessary once more to change the language of the vacancy clause. The new departure consisted merely in the substitution of the disjunctive for the copulative conjunction, and though this phraseology has been in use for a comparatively brief period, it seems to have been already more often before the courts than any single form of the clause.

(1) When the Clause Is Valid and Enforcible.—Where the Blue Mounds F., etc., Ins. Co., 83 Wis. 181, the court, by Lyon, J., said: "We are satisfied that the term 'vacant,' as employed in the policy in suit, is the equivalent of 'unoccupied.' It is conceded that the latter term signifies only that the house is uninhabited. If the construction contended for by counsel for plaintiffs was to prevail, the by-law must be construed to mean that, although the company will not insure an unoccupied, that is, an uninhabited, dwelling house, yet if an insured dwelling house becomes and remains unoccupied or uninhabited after the policy is issued, no matter for how long a time, still the policy remains valid, unless the house becomes absolutely vacant for thirty days—that is to say, unless, in the language of some of the cases, it is empty of everything but air. If such is the meaning of the by-law, we should not expect to find a rule against insuring unoccupied dwelling houses. We think the construction contended for is contrary to the language and the plain intent and meaning of the by-law." See, to the same effect, Moore v. Phoenix F. Ins. Co., 64 N. H. 140; 10 Am. St. Rep. 384.

1. It should be observed, however, that, although the language used in the first part of the opinion in the case of Herrman v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 81 N. Y. 184; 37 Am. Rep. 488, would seem to justify it, still, as applied to the facts before the court, it did not hold that actual emptiness was necessary before a breach of the clause could occur, for the opinion proceeds: "It is not necessary to hold that a house with a few articles of furniture in it, from which the owner or tenant has removed, with no definite intention of returning, might not be regarded as vacant, or found to be so by a jury. It is sufficient to hold that a house thoroughly furnished, from which the owner has removed for a season, intending to return again and resume possession, is not, in any proper sense, a vacant house."

In the later case of Herrman v. Adriatic F. Ins. Co., 85 N. Y. 162; 39 Am. Rep. 644, the distinction between the two words is perhaps more clearly shown. Folger, J., there says: "There are doubtless conditions of a dwelling house, or other like structure, when either word applied to it, or both words applied to it, will express a like state of it. There are, however, states of it when that will not be the case. It is so because the different things that are receptive of the epithets of vacant and unoccupied are different in their capability and susceptibility of being filled or occupied. Some cannot have one of those terms applicable to them, without the other at the same time being also applicable. Some, from the nature of the use which goes with the occupation of them, may not be vacant, and yet they will, in any just use of the term as applicable to them, be unoccupied. A dwelling house is chiefly designed for the abode of mankind. For the comfort of the dwellers in it, many kinds of chattel property are gathered in it. So that, in the use of it, it is a place of deposit of things inanimate and a place of resort and tarrying of beings animate. With those animate far away from it, but with those inanimate still in it, it would not be vacant, for it would not be empty and void. And as a possible case, with all inanipremises are actually unoccupied in violation of this clause, it is, of course, immaterial that the risk was not thereby increased.¹ Often, however, the clause is followed by others expressly forbidding increase of risk "by any means, whatever, within the control of the assured;" but this latter phrase modifies only the clauses immediately preceding it, and does not apply to the words "vacant or unoccupied."² If the building is in that condition, whether or not it became so by means without the assured's control, the policy is forfeited. The requisites of occupancy, as the term is used in this phrase, are not substantially different from those above noticed in discussing that form of the prohibitory clause mate things taken out, but with those animate still remaining in it, it would not be unoccupied, for it would still be used for shelter and repose. And it is because, in our experience of the purpose and use of a dwelling house, we have come to associate our notion of the occupation of it with the habitual presence and continued abode of human beings within it, that that word applied to a dwelling always raises that conception in the mind. Sometimes, indeed, the use of the word 'vacant,' as applied to a dwelling, carries the notion that there is no dweller therein; and we should not be sure always to get or convey the idea of an empty house by the words 'vacant dwelling' applied to it. But when the phrase 'vacant or unoccupied' is applied to a dwelling house, plainly there is a purpose—an attempt to give a different statement of the condition thereof; by the first word, as an empty house, by the second word, as one in which there is not habitually the presence of human beings."

1. Galveston Ins. Co. v. Long, 51 Tex. 89; East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Kempner (Tex. 1894), 27 N. W. Rep. 122.

Perhaps, however, the language used by the supreme court of Illinois in Traders' Ins. Co. v. Race, 142 Ill. 338, must be regarded as modifying this apparently axiomatic statement, at least so far as it applies to suits in equity. That was a bill to foreclose a trust deed, to which, and the debt secured thereby, the insurance company claimed to be subrogated by virtue of a violation of the clause forbidding the premises to "become vacant or unoccupied." In the opinion above referred to, which was on rehearing, the court said: "Since appellants seek relief in a court of equity rather than in a court of law, where appellee would be entitled to have the questions of fact passed upon by a jury, the evidence to be considered, and the relief that shall thereupon be granted, must be such as are within the principles applied in courts of equity. One of those principles is, a court of equity will never enforce either a penalty or a forfeiture. 2 Story Eq. Jur., § 1319; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur., §§ 459, 460. And so it must follow here that, to entitle appellants to the relief they claim, they must prove, not merely that the premises were vacant or unoccupied at or before the time the fire occurred which destroyed the insured property, but that such vacancy or unoccupancy contributed, in some degree, to the causing of that fire or the prevention of its extinguishment; for, if the causation and the control of the fire were unaffected by the fact of vacancy or unoccupancy, to allow appellants to avoid liability, and recover what they have paid on account of the insurance, by a foreclosure of this mortgage, would, in effect, be to enforce a forfeiture—decree a recovery on a mere technical legal breach of a contract. The evidence wholly fails to show that the property would not have been destroyed precisely as it was, if a family had been residing in the house at the time."

2. Dennison v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 52 Iowa 457; Moriarty v. Home Ins. Co., 53 Minn. 549. In the case last cited Chief Justice Gilfillan, delivering the opinion, said: "The dwelling having become vacant, by a tenant leaving without notice, before the fire, the court below charged the jury that, if it became vacant by means not within his control, then plaintiff could recover. It raises the question whether the words, 'by any means whatever within the control of the assured,' qualify the words 'or become vacant or unoccupied.' It requires a very forced and unnatural construction to give the words that containing only the descriptive words "unoccupied."¹ These requisites necessarily vary, however, according to the character of the structure insured,² for the same degree of strictness could hardly be exacted in the case of buildings not designed for human tenancy as is required of dwellings. Since the latter form probably the most important as well as numerous class of insured buildings, it will be proper to examine first the tests of occupancy as applied to them.

"For a dwelling house to be in a state of occupation, there must be in it the presence of human beings as at their customary place of abode, not absolutely and uninterruptedly continuous, but that must be the place of usual return and habitual stoppage."³ It is not sufficient, therefore, that furniture,⁴ effect—a construction which would not occur to anyone reading the policy for the purpose of determining whether he would accept it. The part of the policy quoted specifies several cases or conditions, each following a disjunctive to show that it is a condition by itself. They are divided into two groups, each followed by words qualifying each case in the group. In the first group are the case of increase of risk by the manner of use or occupation, and the case of becoming vacant or unoccupied, and the qualifying words applicable to those cases are "without notice to or consent of this company in writing," those words completing the condition. In the second group are increase of risk first, by the erection or occupation of neighboring buildings; second, by any means whatever within the control of the assured. Then follow the words qualifying the cases in this group—"without the assent of this company indorsed hereon." It would be a forced and unnatural reading to jump the words 'or by any means whatever,' etc., over the words 'without notice,' etc., following the first group, and read them into each case in that group, and, if that could be done, in order to make sense it would be necessary to leave out a word. Try it thus: 'Become vacant or unoccupied, or by any means whatever within the control of the assured.' Strike out the word 'or' before the word 'by,' and there is some meaning, but leave that word in, and there is no sense to the words following it. A very slight change in the phraseology of conditions of this character in policies, will materially change the meaning."

"It occurs to us that these words must also be construed in view of the uses and purposes for which the building is adapted; that is, as to whether it is so built and arranged as to be used as a dwelling house, or a store building, or a schoolhouse, or a structure fitted and adapted for use for some other purpose." tools,¹ or other chattels,² are left in the building, or that it is occasionally visited and inspected by some one,³ or is used temporarily as a place of abode,⁴ or that unsuccessful efforts are made to procure an occupant.⁵ Corresponding tests have been applied to structures other than dwellings. A store building is "unoccupied," within the meaning of this clause, when the tenant has removed, although he has left a counter and permitted another party to store liquor there.⁶ So a structure insured as a "morocco factory" is not "occupied" after the tenant removes and business therein is suspended, though the machinery and fixtures remain and a watchman residing next door is in charge, and a key is in the possession of the insured's agent who visits the premises frequently.⁷

To prevent a policy from being avoided for vacancy or unoccupancy in such a case, the use and occupancy must be of such a character as ordinarily pertains to a building adapted for such purposes. A mere storage of property therein, which does not involve the care and watchfulness which the policy holder owes to the insurer, will not suffice to constitute occupancy."

Fourth Stage: VACANCY AND NON-TENANCY. Prohibited, etc.

(2) When the Clause Is Not Enforced—(a) Temporary Absence.—Notwithstanding the array of decisions in which the validity of this clause, forbidding the premises to be “vacant or unoccupied,” has been sustained, there are many others in which its provisions have not been so applied as to effect a forfeiture of the insurance. For the most part, however, these authorities fall within certain recognized and well defined exceptions to the conceded rule that the clause itself is valid and enforceable. Among the most important of these exceptions is the doctrine that the mere temporary absence of the occupant, animo revertendi, will not render the premises “vacant or unoccupied.” It has been well said that the insured “is not to become a prisoner on the property, . . . nor to be charged with laches when, in the pursuit of his business, health or pleasure, he temporarily leaves the property which still remains his home.”¹ Hence, the departure of an occupant for one night, during which the house was burned, is not fatal, though he was only sleeping there and taking his meals elsewhere.² So the absence of a family for twelve days to visit a sick relative, is not a vacation of their dwelling, especially where it is left in charge of one who visits it daily.³ And it was held in Illinois that the clause was not violated where the occupants, their effects having been removed, had departed from the premises, all save one finally, and that one visited them again only for the

1. Springfield F., etc., Ins. Co. v. McLimans, 28 Neb. 850. In this case it is further said: “A party, by effecting insurance upon his dwelling, does not thereby impliedly agree that he will remain on guard to watch for the possible outbreak of a fire. He insures his property as a precaution against possible loss. If he is indebted, his duty to his creditors requires this; and if not in debt, his duty to his family may induce him to procure the insurance. . . . The necessity of most persons for temporary absences, on business or family convenience, is known to everyone, and must have been in the contemplation of the insurer when the policy was issued.” Compare O'Brien v. Commercial F. Ins. Co., 38 N. Y. Super. Ct. 517 (construing the phrase “vacant and unoccupied”); Canada Landed Credit Co. v. Canada Agricultural Ins. Co., 17 Grant's Ch. (Ont.) 418.

2. In Laselle v. Hoboken F. Ins. Co., 43 N. J. L. 468, Beasley, C. J. in delivering the opinion of the court, said: “It was insisted that this was a vacancy within the meaning of the condition in question. If this be so, then the party insured, if the only occupant of the premises, could not put his foot off such premises without leaving his buildings in an uninsured condition. Such an interpretation of the clause is quite unreasonable. A dwelling house does not become vacant or unoccupied, in the usual acceptance of such terms, when a tenant leaves it, in the ordinary course of things, for a few hours. A furnished abode would not be called a vacant or unoccupied house on account of a temporary absence of the tenant. When there is a cessation to use it as a dwelling, then it is properly styled a vacant house. It is, in the utmost degree, improbable that it was the understanding of these contracting parties that this property was to lose its insurance the moment and as often as the occupant left it to visit a neighbor or to attend to business.” See also *Shackleton v. purpose of surrendering possession to a lessee, and was absent when the loss occurred.¹

(b) Vacancy Incident to the Purpose for Which the Building Is Used—(1) TENEMENT HOUSES.—Another important qualification affecting the enforceability of this clause, is the doctrine that it does not apply where non-tenancy occurs only in the usual course of, and incidental to, the business to which the insured structure is devoted. Thus, in the case of a tenement house, it seems, by the great weight² of authority, that no breach of the condition accrues merely on account of a vacancy incident to a change of tenants.³ In the language of a recent opinion: "It may fairly be presumed, nothing appearing to the contrary, that the parties to the contract of insurance contemplated that the tenant was liable to leave the premises, and that more or less time might elapse before the owner could procure another tenant to occupy them, and hence, that the parties did not understand that the house should be considered vacant, and the policy forfeited, or suspended, according to its terms, immediately upon the tenant's leaving it."⁴ This statement is prefaced by language restricting its language to buildings expressly described as tenement houses,⁵ and not to dwellings occupied by the insured, yet the same rule has been applied to structures of which this was not true.⁶ And although in its inception this doctrine was doubtless intended to obtain only

But one authority is cited in discussing this branch of the case, and Justices Walker and Scholfeld dissent, saying: "We do not agree either in the reasoning or conclusion of this opinion. Unless the contract of the parties is affected by fraud or mistake, it should be enforced as written—and where it is thus affected, the remedy is in equity." The view of the majority of the court may perhaps be harmonized with other adjudications, however, on the ground that the vacancy which certainly did exist, was one incidental to the change of tenants. where a prospective tenant was actually preparing to move in,¹ it has been extended farther in some decisions and held to apply where there had been a prolonged vacancy, and the insured was doing no more than "endeavoring to obtain a tenant,"² and even where no steps whatever appear to have been taken towards re-occupancy.³

(2) OTHER BUILDINGS.—The general doctrine, that temporary, incidental vacancy is not fatal, applies also to other buildings than tenements. A policy which describes the subject of insurance as occupied for the purposes of a "saddlery and printing office," is not avoided by vacancy for "only such time as was reasonably necessary for the outgoing tenant to remove his goods, and the incoming tenant to place his in the building."⁴ It has been held that a shingle mill does not "become vacant or unoccupied" or "cease to be operated," by a suspension for six weeks for want of running material.⁵ And the New York supreme court has recently decided that the provision of the clause did not apply to a church building, owned and insured by a priest as his individual property, and near which he resided, though no religious services had been held there for more than a year.⁶ What appears to be

5. Mills and Factories.—In City Planning, etc., Mill Co. v. Merchants', etc., Mut. F. Ins. Co., 72 Mich. 654, the court said: "The stoppage of the mill was occasioned solely by the want of logs to manufacture. The logs were expected daily, and their not being received was not the fault of plaintiff. It was a mere temporary suspension, which, in the first place, was supposed would only last a few days, and after that from day to day. This clause cannot mean that a stoppage of this kind for a day, or even a week, for want of running material, an event quite likely to occur once or more in any season, would be considered 'ceasing to operate.' The policy speaks of premises becoming vacant or unoccupied 'or, if a mill or manufactory, it shall cease to be operated.' This must mean something more than a temporary suspension. It must mean a closing with the intention of ceasing operation, not a shutting down for a few days or weeks, because of the happening of events incident to the conducting of a mill in that locality and which might be reasonably expected, such as the want of logs because of low water, which caused the suspension in this case." See, to the same effect (but construing "vacant or unoccupied"), Whitney v. Black River Ins. Co., 72 N. Y. 117; 28 Am. Rep. 116; Brighton Mfg. Co. v. Reading F. Ins. Co., 33 Fed. Rep. 232; American F. Ins. Co. v. Brighton Cotton Mfg. Co., 125 Ill. 131; 17 Ins. L. J. 749; Lebanon Mut. Ins. Co. v. Leathers (Pa. 1887), 8 Atl. Rep. 424, construing "vacated." But compare Halpin v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 118 N. Y. 165, reversing 42 Hun (N. Y.) 655.

6. In Caraher v. Royal Ins. Co., 63 Hun (N. Y.) 82, the court said: "The referee found, as matter of fact, that the building did not become vacant an extreme application of the principle was made by the Michigan court where a barn, insured upon oral application, was used at the time only for the storage of tools and produce, and this use was known to the company's agent ; but even these contents had been removed before the fire, yet the building was held not to be vacant or unoccupied.¹

(e) Vacancy Preparatory to Occupation.—Closely allied to the qualification last above discussed, is another in pursuance of which the courts have generally² held that no forfeiture occurs where the premises are being actually prepared for some definite occupant. Thus a policy on a dwelling in process of construction is not avoided because the structure is burned before being tenanted.³ And a building designated and insured as a store is not "vacant or unoccupied" while being placed in proper condition for a new tenant.⁴ So, generally, a building is sufficiently occupied, within the meaning of this clause, if it is being fitted for human habitation.⁵

(a) Partial Non-Tenancy.—Still another form of non-occupancy, which the courts generally hold to be excusable, is that which is partial as regards either space or time. The question in respect or unoccupied. Mr. Caraher, from the time he purchased the property, held therein public religious service until October, 1888. Soon after that time another pastor was appointed for the congregation, and it worshipped at another place. No religious service was held in the church after October, 1888. There is evidence tending to show that Mr. Caraher quit holding services on account of ill health, and that this disability continued until after the fire ; that during all the time service was not held, and down to the fire, the church was in the care of the sexton, who had been such for several years, and that he took substantially the same care of it that he did when service was held. Mr. Caraher continued all the time to reside in the dwelling in the same yard, and within fifteen feet of the church ; and he testifies that he went frequently into the church ; that the ornaments and vestments used in the service of the church remained there down to the fire, and that at the time of the fire, there was everything in the church necessary for services. It appears that some months before the fire the gas-meter was taken out of the church by the gas company. The question seems to be whether, within the contemplation of the contract, the building became unoccupied in October, 1888, by reason of the cessation therein of church services. There was no warranty that church services should continue to be held there. The fact that the insurance was to Caraher as individual owner, rather rebuts the idea that the religious corporation and society that had previously owned and occupied were expected to continue to occupy for an indefinite period. A condition of this kind is to be construed in view of the situation and character of the property insured, and in view of contingencies as to its use within the reasonable contemplation of the parties."

to space has often arisen in construing blanket policies covering either an apartment building or more than one structure, and the decided weight of authority is to the effect that the vacancy of one of the parts,¹ or one of such insured buildings,² would not effect a forfeiture of the policy. It was held, however, where sixteen houses were insured in one policy, that the non-occupancy of eight avoided the insurance as to them,³ and there are decisions to the effect that blanket insurance upon a house and outbuildings may be forfeited by vacating the latter.⁴ It is likewise true that Co., 5 Ins. L. J. 134; 2 Cent. L. J. 478. In the case last cited, however, the chief "preparation" seems to have been efforts to obtain a new tenant.

1. Vacancy of Part Not Fatal.—Bryan v. Peabody Ins. Co., 8 W. Va. 605; Burlington Ins. Co. v. Brockway, 138 Ill. 644.

In Bryan v. Peabody Ins. Co., 8 W. Va. 605, the policy covered "a two-story frame building standing on leased ground." The court held that the vacancy of the second story did not avoid the policy, and said that the provision forbidding the building to be vacant or unoccupied "must be construed to mean and apply to the whole or entire premises as to its becoming vacant or unoccupied, and not merely to a part thereof. Had the company intended otherwise, it is reasonable to suppose it would have so declared. It would not have contented itself with the general and comprehensive expression 'above mentioned premises,' but would have manifested its meaning and intention in common and plain language, such as 'above mentioned premises or any part thereof.'"

2. Vacating One of Several Buildings.—McQueeny v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 52 Ark. 257; 20 Am. St. Rep. 179 (containing a full review of the authorities); Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Walsh, 54 Ill. 164; 5 Bennett F. Ins. Cas. 318; Worley v. State Ins. Co. (Iowa, 1894), 59 N. W. Rep. 16; Kimball v. Monarch Ins. Co., 70 Iowa 513; Garver v. Hawkeye Ins. Co., 69 Iowa 202; Harrington v. Fitchburg Mut. F. Ins. Co., 124 Mass. 126; 7 Ins. L. J. 618. Most of these, however, construe other phrases than "vacant or unoccupied."

3. In Connecticut F. Ins. Co. v. Tilley, 88 Va. 1024; 21 Ins. L. J. 558, the court reasons as follows: "In this case the insurance was on sixteen tenement houses at $187.50 a piece, aggregating $3,000 on the whole. The policy provides that 'if the premises become unoccupied,' etc., as already stated. What was meant by this? Was it that if one house which was insured should become and remain vacant, in violation of the condition, that then the whole insurance on the sixteen houses should be forfeited; or that if all the houses, on the other hand, except one, should become and remain unoccupied, in violation of the policy, then the policy was not to be forfeited; the circuit court, by its action in instructing the jury and refusing to set aside the verdict, held the latter, because, as we have already stated, eight of the said tenements were so vacant, eight occupied. But we think neither of these propositions is a reasonable construction of the policy. These houses were separate and distinct, with lanes running between, that is, the eight double houses. They are not insured as one house, but as sixteen different houses, which they might have been, and still contiguous, and a separate value is placed on each, for what purpose? Obviously to distribute the insurance among them. The case cited by the plaintiff in error of Merrill v. Agricultural Ins. Co. (73 N. Y. 464; 29 Am. Rep. 184), is very much in point, and the reasoning is satisfactory. Chief Justice Folger, in that case, said: 'It is plain, from the fact of a separate valuation having been put by the parties upon the different subjects of the insurance, that they looked upon them as distinct matters of contract. The effect of the separate valuation was to make them so.'

In the former case, the chancellor, says, in delivering the opinion of the court: "By the literal reading of the condition which is relied upon as a defense to the plaintiff's suit, it is apparent that it applies to all the sub-occupancy need not, as regards time, be entire. Partial occupancy, such as the use of the building for sleeping purposes only, has often been held sufficient.¹

(c) Waiver.—The vacancy clause, like other provisions of the insurance contract, may, of course, be waived, and various are the acts of omission and commissions from which that result will follow. The most common ground for implying a waiver is the fact that the insurer has notice that the subject of insurance does not conform to the requirements of the clause. The issuance of a policy to insure a building known by both parties to be unoccupied, has been construed as a waiver of any breach at the time,² especially where there is another provision contradicting that against non-occupancy,³ or where there was no jects of the insurance, and brings them all within its force and effect; and from the nature of the contract, whether it be divisible or not, we are constrained to infer that the existence of the condition had a potent influence in securing the assumption of the entire risk; for it is a matter of common knowledge that a farm, with its dwelling and outbuildings, constitutes a single establishment, generally remote from other habitations, and that the protection of the whole must, in a great measure, depend upon the occupants of the building. Almost without exception, the outbuildings of a farm are clustered about a place of abode, and for that reason are deemed to be more secure than the occasional outlying barn or crib, which, because of its isolation, becomes the bane of its apprehensive owner. It seems to be impossible not to assume, in this case, that the proximity of the outbuildings to the dwelling influenced the insurer to enter into the contract or contracts under the protection of the condition here questioned. It is natural and reasonable that it should be held to have intended that the continuance of the insurance, upon all the subjects thereof, was to depend upon the occupation of the dwelling. I fail to perceive anything, either in the language of the condition or in its reasonable application, that should lead to the determination that compliance with its terms was not requisite to the validity of the policy as to each item of property insured."

Co., 53 Wis. 143; Aurora F., etc., Ins. Co. v. Kranich, 36 Mich. 289; Short v. Home Ins. Co., 90 N. Y. 16; 43 Am. Rep. 138. In the case last cited the court says: "It was a question of fact for the jury to determine, whether the defendant's agent knew the condition of the premises, or regarded it as of any consequence whether the premises were occupied or otherwise, and made the insurance, without any reference whatever to the subject of occupation. If he did so, then the condition as to the future vacancy or non-occupation was nugatory and may be regarded as waived. A contrary rule would be imputing a fraudulent intent to the defendant when the policy was delivered, not to give a valid and binding policy, although receiving pay for such a one, and although plaintiff should labor under the impression that he had one. Such an imputation can only be avoided upon the theory that this condition was overlooked, and the defendant forgot or neglected to express the fact in the policy, or that it waived the condition or held itself estopped from setting it up. (See VanSchoick v. Niagara F. Ins. Co., 68 N. Y. 434; Woodruff v. Imperial F. Ins. Co., 83 N. Y. 140.)"

3. In Alkan v. New Hampshire Ins. Co., 53 Wis. 136, the court observes: "The policy contains a printed stipulation or condition that it shall be void if the premises shall become vacant of application,¹ or in the case of structures other than dwellings, where the use continued the same as when first insured.² There are, however, many modifications of this doctrine. It has been held not to apply where, though the building was vacant when insured, it remained so in spite of promised occupancy.³ Knowledge of non-occupancy is not to be imputed to the insurer from the mere fact of issuing a policy on a building in that condition,⁴ nor is a waiver of the clause effected by knowledge alone of the subsequent vacancy of a building occupied when insured,⁵ nor by a demand for proofs of loss after obtaining such knowledge,⁶ nor by an offer to compromise.⁷ An agent's construction of the vacancy clause has been held to bind the company, though prejudicial to it.⁸

VACATION—(See also JUDGE, vol. 12, p. 14; TERM, vol. 25, p. 949).—The term "vacation" is applied to that period of time between the end of one term and the beginning of another, and unoccupied. The premises were unoccupied when the policy issued, and during much of the term for which they were insured, and also at the time they were burned. But, under the circumstances of the case, we do not think the policy was thereby rendered void. The insured property consisted of distillery buildings and machinery. Presumably, the property was available for no other use; yet the policy prohibits that use of the property, and, but for the carpenter's risk which the defendant granted, would have compelled the assured to let his property stand idle or forfeit his insurance. In other words, it would have compelled him to leave the property practically unoccupied during the life of the policy. With such a provision in the policy, it seems to us that the company cannot be heard to allege a forfeiture of the contract because the premises were unoccupied."

1. Such Time as the Court Is Not Actually in Session.—In Thompson v. Benepce, 67 Iowa 80, Seevers, J., said: "There cannot be, we think, a fixed and definite meaning given to the word 'vacation.' That it ordinarily means the time between terms is undoubtedly true. See Bouv. Law Dict. But whether this meaning should be given to the word in any particular instance, depends upon the subject-matter and the necessity which exists that some other meaning should be adopted. When the subject-matter is considered, as well as the usual purposes for which an injunction is sought as a protection against wrong or the invasion of legal rights, we think the word 'vacation,' as used in the statute, should be construed to mean such time as the court is not actually in session." And in this case the word, as used in a statute authorizing judges to grant injunctions in "vacation," was so construed. See also INJUNCTIONS, vol. 10, p. 1007.

But in Brayman v. Whitcomb, 134 Mass. 525, the contrary was held, where a statute authorized the clerk of court to take a recognizance in vacation. The court said: "In the statute, the word 'vacation' is used in contradistinction to 'term time,' indicating an intention to use it in its legal sense. The English legal year was divided into four terms of different lengths, separated by the vacations, which were the seasons of the court festivals or fasts, or were deemed necessary on account of the avocations of rural business. And in this country courts have their terms and vacations. Bronson v. Schulten, 104 U. S. 415. The legal definition of the word 'vacation' is that period of time between the end of one term and the beginning of another. Bouv. Law Dict. We are to consider the legislature, when dealing with subjects relating to courts and legal process, as speaking technically, unless from the statute itself it appears that they made use of words in a more popular sense. Merchants' Bank v. Cook, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 411. The intervals of time between the actual sessions of court, when conducting the business of a term, cannot be called vacations, and, as there was a present existing term of the superior court, no authority existed to take the recognizance in question."

And so in State v. Derkum, 27 Mo. App. 629, the court construed the word "vacation" as having reference "to the vacation between courts—between a term and the next term thereafter," and to adjournments for more than a day.

Where a circuit court adjourned over for thirty-two days, it was held that the period intervening, in which the court did not sit and transact business, was to be regarded as a "vacation," within the meaning of that word in Illinois Practice Act, section 66, authorizing judgments by confession in "vacation." But the word is not to be understood as embracing all the time the court is not actually in session, or as embracing adjournments from day to day. Conkling v. Ridgely, 112 Ill. 36; 54 Am. Rep. 204. In this case the court said: "No doubt an application of the strict common-law definition which we find of the term 'vacation,' to wit, 'a vacation is all the time between the end of one term and the beginning of another' (6 Jacobs' Law Dict. 323), would make the time of the entering of this judgment not to be in vacation. . . . The inquiry is, whether we must adopt this as the meaning of the word 'vacation,' in the construction of the 66th section of the Practice Act, authorizing the confession of judgments in vacation. We think that under this act the term 'vacation' may well be given a different meaning from what it had at common law, as above given. Under the earlier organization of courts in England, 'terms' of the courts were four periods in each year. They commenced on fixed days, and had a fixed time of termination, and they aggregated ninety-one days. The vacations embraced all the days in the year not included in the 'terms.' Any such a period of recess of a court of more than a month's duration, as we find in this case, was unknown in that system. . . . We would not be understood as holding that, under this act, vacation means all the time the court is not in actual

VADIUM MORTUUM—(See also MORTGAGES, vol. 15, p. 725; PLEDGE AND COLLATERAL SECURITY, vol. 18, p. 590).—A mortgage or dead pledge. It is a security given by the borrower of a sum of money, by which he grants to the lender an estate in fee, on condition that if the money be not repaid at the time appointed, the estate so put in pledge shall continue to the lender as dead, or gone from the mortgagor.¹

VADIUM VIVUM—(See also ANTICHRESIS, vol. 1, p. 610; MORTGAGES, vol. 15, p. 725).—A species of security by which the borrower of a sum of money made over his estate to the lender, until he had received that sum out of the issues and profits of the land. It was so called because neither the money nor the lands were lost, and were not left in dead pledge. It was termed a living pledge, for the profits of the land were constantly paying off the debt.² The ancient vadium vivum differs from the modern Welsh mortgage principally in this, that in the latter the issues and profits were not applied to the discharge of the principal, but only to the interest upon the debt.³ One form of Welsh mortgage, however, required the rents and profits to be applied to the principal as well as the interest.⁴

I. DEFINITION.—Vagrancy is the state or condition of a vagrant. The terms "vagrant," "vagabond," and "tramp" have practically the same signification; that is, a person, who, being able to work, refuses to do so, but lives idly, or roams from place to place, begging, or living without labor or visible means of support.⁵

session, or that it embraces the time of adjournment from day to day; but we are clearly of opinion that, where there is the adjournment of court for any such period of time as is found in the present case, the true construction of this 66th section of the Practice Act requires that the broader definition which we find of the term 'vacation' should be adopted, and that the time of recess should be considered as in vacation, for the purpose of admitting the taking of judgments by confession."

5. In Johnson v. State, 28 Tex. App. 562, it was held, where a statute prohibited the keeping of a house "as a common resort for prostitutes or vagrants," and the indictment charged the defendant with keeping a house "as a common resort for prostitutes and vagabonds," that the words "vagrant" and "vagabond" were not equivalent or convertible terms, and that the court should have stricken out the word "vagabond" from the indictment as surplusage, and confined the proof to the charge that the house was kept as a common resort for prostitutes.

II. STATUTES.—Statutes have dealt with the subject of vagrancy,¹ treating it as a misdemeanor, and conferring jurisdiction upon justices of the peace and police magistrates,² who are authorized to convict summarily and inflict the punishment prescribed by law.³ Proceedings of this character, however, being in derogation of the night and sleeps on the day, and haunts customable taverns and ale-houses and routs about, and no man wot from whence they come nor whither they go." 4 Bl. Com. 169.

In an old English case it is said that before a hawker, peddler, or the like, can be deemed a vagrant, he must be wandering abroad and out of his own parish. Anonymous, 11 Mod. 3.

Tramps.—The Pennsylvania act of April 30, 1879, entitled "An Act to Define and Punish Tramps," does not repeal the act of May, 1876, entitled "An Act to Punish and Define Vagrants." Cumberland County v. Boyd, 113 Pa. St. 52.

1. In 1 Bish. Crim. L. (8th ed.), § 515, it is said: "Men may ordinarily dispose of their time as they will. And it is not clear that the ancient common law of England took notice of mere idleness and vagrancy as criminal; indeed, one case lays it down that a vagrant, as such, is not indictable. But we find, from early times, statutes authorizing summary proceedings against idlers, vagabonds, and rogues; to be regarded, perhaps, by us as regulations concerning paupers, not, therefore, belonging to our common law. Generally, in our state, vagrancy has been legislated against to such an extent as to leave it unimportant what is the anterior or common law on the subject."

Where there is no statutory definition of vagrancy, it must be considered as such vagabondage as fairly comes within the common-law meaning of the word. In re Jordan, 90 Mich. 3.

The common council of a city cannot enlarge the term "vagrancy," or include in it anything that is not vagrancy under the statute. Where the offense is not defined by statute, it can only reach such cases of vagabondage as come fairly within the common-law meaning of the word, which was possibly designed to protect the public from expense, quite as much as from disorder. Sarah Way's Case, 41 Mich. 299.

2. Wolcott v. Bachman, 3 Wyoming 335; People v. Phillips, Edm. Sel. Cas. (N. Y.) 386; State v. Glenn, 54 Md. 572, and other cases cited throughout this article. See also JUSTICE OF THE PEACE, vol. 12, p. 391.

In Wisconsin, where tramps are liable to a more severe punishment than vagrants, and the statute provides for the trial of the former by the county, circuit, or municipal courts, if proceedings have been commenced against a person as a vagrant, before a justice of the peace, it is in his discretion whether he will proceed with the trial, or bind the accused over to answer to the court having jurisdiction of the greater offense. Johnson v. Waukesha County, 64 Wis. 281.

Arrest Without a Warrant.—In Illinois, to justify a police officer in arresting a person without a warrant, for the violation of an ordinance declaring all persons vagrants who, not having visible means to maintain themselves, are found without employment, loitering or rambling about, or staying in drinking saloons, etc., there must be made to appear a want of visible means of support, as well as the other facts. Shanley v. Wells, 71 Ill. 78.

3. Punishment.—The modes of punishing vagrants in the several states differ widely, and the reader is referred to the statutes themselves.

A statute which punishes vagrancy by fine and imprisonment, and security for good behavior, is repealed by one which provides that, upon conviction, the court may fine or imprison, or both, or sentence the party to the workhouse. State v. Custer, 65 N. C. R. 339.

The New York Crim. Code, § 892, providing for the commitment to the county jail of those vagrants who are improper persons to be sent to the poorhouse, does not repeal by implication the Laws of 1846, ch. 77, § 10, nor other statutes, for particular counties, to confine them in other places. People v. Baker, 10 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 210.

A justice of the peace of the city or county of Philadelphia, may commit any vagrant to jail at hard labor for one month, after legal conviction before him, Com. v. Holloway, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 516; but he cannot commit him common law, must be strictly confined to the statute.¹ The statutes concerning vagrancy, coming as they do within the scope of the police power of the several states, are, as a rule, constitutional.²

until trial and conviction. Com. v. Kehoe, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 516.

Appeal.—One convicted of a first offense of vagrancy before a justice, under the Mississippi Code, 1892, § 1323, has the right to appeal from such judgment. Jones v. State, 70 Miss. 398.

1. In People v. Phillips, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. (N. Y.) 386, it was said that proceedings under statutes of this nature must be as near as possible according to the course of trials before juries at common law; the party accused must be summoned; there must be a specific charge against him; and he must have time and opportunity to be heard in his defense. Compare Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 426. And see People v. Forbes, 4 Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 611.

Support of Family Under New Jersey Statute.—The due and proper effect of an order, made under the supplement to the vagrant act, upon the defendant, to pay a certain sum for the support of his family for the space of one year, is not to absolve him from all liability under the vagrant act to maintain his wife after the expiration of a year from the date of the first order, and the first order cannot be set up as a bar to subsequent proceedings. Clifford v. Overseer of the Poor, 37 N. J. L. 152.

2. Thus, in People v. Forbes, 4 Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 611; 11 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 52, Sutherland, J., said: "His [the vagrant's] individual liberty must yield to the public necessity or the public good; but nothing but public necessity or the public good can justify these statutes and the summary conviction without a jury, in derogation of the common law authorized by them. They are constitutional, but should be construed strictly, and executed carefully in favor of the liberty of the citizen." See State v. Maxcy, 1 McMull. (S. Car.) 501.

A statute which declares that two or more overseers of the poor of any town or city may, by a writing under their hands, commit to the work-house "all persons able of body to work, and not having estate or means otherwise to maintain themselves, who refuse or neglect so to do, and all such as live a dissolute, vagrant life . . ." without trial, is unconstitutional, as violating the fourteenth amendment of the federal constitution. Portland v. Bangor, 65 Me. 120; 20 Am. Rep. 681.

Massachusetts Stat. 1882, ch. 181, § 3, which authorizes a district court to commit a child to the custody of the overseers of the poor of a city, upon finding that such child was, through the neglect of its parent, growing up without education and in circumstances exposing it to lead an idle and dissolute life, is constitutional. Farnham v. Pierce, 141 Mass. 203; 55 Am. Rep. 452. See also, as to the validity of such statutes under a state constitution, Prescott v. State, 19 Ohio St. 184; 2 Am. Rep. 388; Cincinnati House of Refuge v. Ryan, 37 Ohio St. 197; and as to confining in industrial schools children found begging in public and having no parental care, McLean County v. Humphrey, 104 Ill. 378; Ferrier's Petition, 103 Ill. 367; 43 Am. Rep. 10; Roth v. House of Refuge, 31 Md. 329; Milwaukee Industrial School v. Milwaukee County, 40 Wis. 328; 22 Am. Rep. 702.

In Illinois, it was held that the state had no power to imprison a child who had committed no crime, on the mere allegation that he was "destitute of proper parental care and is growing up in mendicancy, ignorance, idleness, and vice." People v. Turner, 55 Ill. 280; 8 Am. Rep. 645.

The first section of the New York act of April 12th, 1853, prescribing and authorizing a general form for a record of conviction in case of vagrancy, was not unconstitutional. Morris v. People, 1 Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 441. Nor in Louisiana was the act of 1855, authorizing recorders of the city of New Orleans to try vagrants without a jury, or indictment, or information. State v. Noble, 20 La. Ann. 325.

In State v. Glenn, 54 Md. 572, the opinion of Alvey, J., is a full and instructive review of the law concerning the trial and commitment of vagrants. Among other points, it is held that the Maryland Act of 1878, ch. 415, § 10, conferring jurisdiction upon justices of the peace to try, convict, and commit to the house of correction vagrant and habitually disorderly persons, is constitutional.

The ordinance of the city of St. Louis, in regard to vagrancy, is not unconstitutional; but, to convict under it, the association with the persons of bad repute named must be shown to have been for the purpose of promoting some breach of the law. St. Louis v. Lee, 8 Mo. App. 599.

III. THE OFFENSE.—Usually, the statutes relating to vagrancy do not define it further than to designate the acts which, under the statute, constitute vagrancy.¹

Involuntary Servitude.—Missouri Rev. Stats., § 8849, authorizing a vagrant, though not accused or convicted of any crime, to be hired out to the highest bidder for a period of six months, has been held to contravene both the state and federal constitutions, declaring against "slavery or involuntary servitude, except in punishment of crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted." Thompson v. Bunton (Mo. 1893), 22 S. W. Rep. 863.

1. For example, see New York Code Civ. Proc., § 887; California Pen. Code, § 647.

Where the statute does not define "vagrancy," and resort must be had to the common-law definition, which is "a person who goes about begging and refusing to work," a charge that the accused slept one night in the barn of the complainant and for the eight days preceding went about from place to place without any visible means of support, states no offense. There must be something more than a mere going about from place to place without visible means of support, and the mere fact of sleeping in a barn one night, is not sufficient with the going about to constitute vagrancy. In re Jordan, 90 Mich. 3.

In Monck v. Hilton, 2 Ex. Div. 268, it was held that an exhibition of "spiritualistic phenomena" was within the statute 5 Geo. IV, ch. 83, § 4, making punishable, as a "rogue and vagabond," persons "using any subtle craft, means or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and impose on any of his majesty's subjects."

An incorrigible son who disobeys the lawful commands of his mother, and absents himself from home without her consent, cannot be deemed a vagrant. Matter of Conroy, 54 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 432. Nor is a common prostitute a vagrant within the New York act of Jan. 23, 1833, because she is an idle person merely; to be such she must have no lawful means of support. People v. Forbes, 4 Park. Cr.

Rep. (N. Y.) 611. So, a minor, although she be a lewd woman, cannot be convicted of vagrancy if she be supported by her parents. Taylor v. State, 59 Ala. 19.

But evidence that, for a certain period prior to the trial, the defendant was an idle person without visible means of support, living without lawful employment in a house of ill-fame, and doing nothing but walking on the street with other girls from such house, will authorize a conviction of vagrancy under Massachusetts Stat. of 1866, ch. 235, §§ 1, 3; Com. v. Carter, 108 Mass. 17.

A licensed cabman loitering about the entrance of a hotel in the attempt to solicit passengers, is not a loose, idle, or disorderly person or vagrant, especially where such loitering does not obstruct or incommode the passers by, or the guests of the hotel. Smith v. Reg., Q. B., 4 Mont. L. R. 325.

Again, the mere testimony of several witnesses, that a man "looked as if he were able to work" but was idle and had no property to live on, was held not to be sufficient to support a verdict that he was guilty of vagrancy, the statute making ability to work a necessary fact to be averred and proved. Walters v. State, 52 Ga. 574.

But where the evidence showed that for two years the defendant had been able to work, but had not worked, and that he had no property to support him, a judgment of guilty was sustained. Price v. State, 67 Ga. 723.

In Hicks v. State, 76 Ga. 326, the appellant had been indicted for vagrancy on and before the 1st day of March. The evidence against him consisted of the testimony of two witnesses that he was a licensed preacher, but had no church, and received no pay except voluntary contributions, and that for two months and a half they did not see the accused work. It was also stated that he had been of good standing in the Baptist Church. It was held that this was insufficient to support a conviction.

When it was shown that a girl under the age of sixteen was found improperly exposed and neglected, and wandering in a park without proper guardianship, and in the company of a reputed prostitute, but that she was not destitute of means of support, having a comfortable home, and did not know the reputed character of her companion, such facts did not warrant her arrest, since it was not alleged that she was so exposed or neglected by her parents, and the charge that she was wandering in the park without proper guardianship, did not bring her within the description of children "not having any home or other place of abode or proper guardianship," as these words are used in the New York Pen. Code, § 291, and the fact that she was found in the company of a reputed prostitute did not, under the circumstances, bring her within the description of those "frequenting or being in the company of reputed thieves or prostitutes" as used in the same section. People v. House of the Good Shepherd, 44 Hun (N. Y.) 526.

Where it was shown that two children, under the age of fourteen, were found at a late hour engaged in begging under the pretext of peddling, and were in the company of prostitutes, frequenting concert saloons, dance houses, and places of entertainment where spirituous liquors were sold, it was not necessary to show that they were wandering abroad and begging, as it would have been, if they had been arrested under the provisions of § 887 of the New York Code of Crim. Proc., which provides that "any child between the ages of five and fourteen, having insufficient bodily health and mental capacity to attend public schools, found wandering in the streets of any city or incorporated village a truant without lawful occupation, shall be deemed a vagrant;" but the complaint being made under § 291 of the Penal Code, the fact that they were begging or receiving alms, or frequenting the company of prostitutes or reputed thieves, was sufficient to make them vagrants. Matter of Moses, 13 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 189; 66 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 296.

In Com. v. McVeagy, 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 248, it was held that where a child under fourteen years of age is adjudged a vagrant, the circumstances of the case ought to be urgent, unequivocal, and decisive.

Desertion of Wife or Family.—The mere refusal of a man to live with his wife, or a failure to support her, does not constitute vagrancy, but there must be something more. Boulo v. State, 49 Ala. 22. And so in Dwyer v. Durer, 26 Mo. App. 647, it was held that the vagrancy of a husband which will entitle the wife to a divorce is failure to support his whole family and not one member thereof.

The provision of the English vagrant act, making it an act of vagrancy in a parent to desert a child, applies to legitimate and not to illegitimate children. Reg. v. Maude, 2 Dowl. N. S. 58; 11 L. J. M. C. 120.

But a wife who has been deserted by her husband, and having no means of maintaining her children, leaves them, so that they become chargeable to the parish, cannot be convicted under the vagrancy act. Peters v. Cowie, 2 Q. B. Div. 131; 36 L. T. N. S. 107.

Promise to Leave the City.—Under a city ordinance of St. Louis, a man was arrested as a vagrant and confined in the calaboose; but he was liberated upon his promise to leave the city within a stipulated time, which promise he did not fulfill, and his rearrest was ordered. It was held that the breach of his promise did not constitute legal ground for his rearrest, and it was necessary to show that he was guilty of the violation of the city ordinance, or that he was a vagrant within the purview of the same. State v. Roberts, 15 Mo. 28.

1. A complaint, under the Massachusetts statute, sets forth the time of committing the offense with sufficient precision, which alleges that the defendant, "on the 29th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1861, on divers other days and times between that day and the 29th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1862, at said Boston, was and is an idle and disorderly person, and at said Boston, on said days and times, has neglected all lawful business and habitually misspent his time by frequenting houses of ill-fame, gaming houses and tippling shops." Com. v. Sullivan, 5 Allen (Mass.) 511.

Again, where the complaint charged that the defendant, "on the 1st day of January, 1886, at M., and from thence continually to the 6th day of June, 1887, was an idle person, etc.," it was done or omitted which are alleged to constitute the offense.¹ It is sufficient, of course, if the offense be charged substantially in the language of the statute,² but a charge that a person is "a vagrant within the meaning of the law" is insufficient.³

held not necessary to prove that the defendant was guilty of the charge of vagrancy on the 1st day of January, 1886, or that he was guilty of the offense continually from that time to June the 6th, 1887, but that if he were guilty of the offense during some substantial portion of the time it was sufficient, and the word "continually" was unnecessary, and could be rejected as surplusage. Com. v. Lord, 147 Mass. 399. Compare Com. v. Kerrissey, 141 Mass. 110.

1. Walton v. State, 12 Tex. App. 117. Compare Hunt v. State, 9 Tex. App. 404.

Under the North Carolina vagrancy act of 1866, the indictment must charge specifically that the defendant is able to work and neglects to do so, and in case he is charged with endeavoring to support himself by unlawful means, such unlawful means must be described in the indictment. State v. Custer, 65 N. Car. 339.

Under the Georgia code, which recognizes several distinct classes of vagrants, among which are "all professional gamblers living in idleness," if the written accusation fails to charge the defendant with being a vagrant because he is a professional gambler living in idleness, it is error to allow testimony showing such fact. Allen v. State, 51 Ga. 264.

An affidavit charging that "J. C., an able-bodied male person, who has arrived at years of discretion, was then and there unlawfully found loitering and idling in, and about, the saloon of F., and the saloon of W., which said saloons were then and there tippling houses, . . . without being there engaged in some useful employment," is a sufficient charge of vagrancy, in a prosecution before a justice under the Indiana act of 1877 (Acts 1877 Spec. Sess., p. 80). State v. Cummins, 78 Ind. 251.

The allegation in a complaint, that a person is "an idle, ungovernable boy and an habitual truant," describes no offense under any statute. Lewiston v. Fairfield, 47 Me. 481.

A complaint that a person is "an idle and disorderly person, and on said days and times has neglected all lawful business and habitually misspent her time, by frequenting houses of ill-fame, gaming houses and tippling shops," is sufficient, and there need be no averment that the defendant was under any necessity or duty of laboring or supporting herself or following any vocation or business. Com. v. Brown, 141 Mass. 78; or that she refused opportunities to work which were offered her, Com. v. Doherty, 137 Mass. 245; it is sufficient if she did not seek such opportunities, Com. v. Hart, 137 Mass. 247, n.

2. Brown v. State, 2 Lea (Tenn.) 158; Com. v. Brown, 141 Mass. 78. And see Com. v. Doherty, 137 Mass. 245; Com. v. Hart, 137 Mass. 247, n.; Grattan v. State, 71 Ala. 344; Danner v. State, 54 Ala. 127; 25 Am. Rep. 662.

A complaint alleging that the affiant believes that the defendant, "having no visible means of support, or being dependent on his living, lives without employment," is sufficient under the Alabama Code, § 4047, and it is unnecessary to aver in addition that he is unable to work. Traylor v. State (Ala. 1894), 14 So. Rep. 634, overruling Boulo v. State, 49 Ala. 22.

Thus, in Ex p. McCarthy, 72 Cal. 384, the complaint set out that A, on and from the 26th day of April to the 26th day of May, 1887, at the city and county of San Francisco, committed a misdemeanor, and, during said period, "willfully and unlawfully was, has been and during said time continued to be, and still is, an idle and dissolute person, who wanders and roams, and has, during said time, wandered and roamed about the streets of said city and county, at late and unusual hours of the night." The California Pen. Code, § 647, enumerates in several groups certain acts which shall constitute vagrancy, and he or she who is guilty of the acts thus enumerated in any one of these groups, is liable to the penalty of the statute. The complaint charging all of the acts specified in any one of these groups, as in this case, is sufficient, and the fact that it states in addition some of the acts specified in other and independent groups, does not invalidate it. Compare People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 508.

3. Walton v. State, 12 Tex. App. 117.

2. The Commitment.—It is not necessary that the commitment should state all the particulars necessary to make out the offense. The offense is being a vagrant, and it is sufficient if the commitment states that the person was charged with vagrancy, and convicted upon competent proof.¹ But if it does assume to set out all the particulars upon which the prisoner was convicted, it must state such facts as to establish a clear case of vagrancy.²

1. Gray's Case, 11 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 56; 4 Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 616. In this case the offense of which the prisoner was convicted was stated as follows, viz.: "Who stands charged before me with being a vagrant, viz., an idle person, who, not having visible means to support him, and is an habitual drunkard." This was sufficient, since it showed that the prisoner was convicted of being a vagrant. See Matter of Moses, 66 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 296.

"The sole inquiry is, whether the justice making the commitment had jurisdiction of the offense recited and of the party accused; and whether the judgment or sentence recited in the commitment be such as the justice was authorized by law to render or impose. . . . That conviction must be presumed to be lawful and proper until the contrary is made to appear." Alvey, J., in State v. Glenn, 54 Md. 572.

2. Thus, where a commitment stated that the prisoner was convicted of "being a vagrant, in this, that she is a common prostitute and idle person," it was held that such commitment was void, and the prisoner entitled to discharge, since proof that she was a common prostitute and idle person was not enough to sustain a charge of vagrancy, but proof that she was without any lawful employment whereby to maintain herself was also necessary. Forbe's Case, 11 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 52; People v. House of the Good Shepherd, 44 Hun (N. Y.) 526; supra, this title, What Constitutes.

In People v. Mount Magdalen School (Supreme Ct.), 7 N. Y. Supp. 737, the action arose out of a question as to the validity of a warrant of commitment of a child on a charge of "being a disorderly person." The Penal Code, § 291, originally provided for the arrest of a child coming within any of the descriptions therein mentioned, "as a vagrant, disorderly or destitute child," but in 1886 by amendment these words were omitted. Being a disorderly child is not one of the causes enumerated in the section, and, therefore, a commitment on such charge was illegal. In the same case it was held that another magistrate is not authorized, two years after the first commitment, and after a writ of habeas corpus issued, to commit the child for a different offense named in the section, because such first commitment was defective, unless the child is brought before him and a new examination had or legal evidence taken of what occurred at the former examination. Such action is not warranted by the provision of said section that "whenever any commitment of a child shall be adjudged or found defective, a new commitment may be made or directed by the court or magistrate, as the welfare of the child may require."

Record.—Prerequisite to commitment, a record of the proceeding must, in some states, be made up by the magistrate and filed in the office of the county clerk, and trespass will lie against a magistrate who commits without doing so. People v. Phillips, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. (N. Y.) 386. And see People v. Forbes, 4 Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 611.

The filing of such record may now be in the office of the clerk of general sessions under Acts 1882, ch. 110. Matter of Waters, 66 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 173.

But a failure to file the record of a conviction of vagrancy will not entitle the prisoner to his discharge, because such failure is amendable, and it is expressly provided by New York City Consolidation Act, § 1601, to be no ground for a discharge. Matter of Dorfmann, 21 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 296.

In the Matter of Moses, 13 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 196, the court said: "It is the duty of the magistrate to observe with great care the provisions of the several statutes in such cases, and to see that their records are properly made and the certificate of conviction duly filed, and that their warrants of commitments are in due form."

Conclusiveness.—Where a child is committed to the overseers of the poor by the district court, upon finding that, by reason of the neglect of its parent, the child is growing up without education or salutary control, under the Massachusetts Stat. of 1882, ch. 181, § 3, such commitment is not conclusive upon the parent as an adjudication on his right to the custody of the child; and, upon showing that the cause stated for the commitment no longer exists, and that he is competent and fit to have the care of the child, and that its welfare will permit of its removal to the parent's custody, he may obtain such custody. Farnham v. Pierce, 141 Mass. 203; 55 Am. Rep. 452.

3. Notice to Parent or Guardian.—Where a child is to be committed for vagrancy under the New York statute, which, in one section, includes children, under certain circumstances, in the list of those who are vagrants, it is necessary, in order to ascertain whether the circumstances are usual or unusual, to give notice of the proceeding to the parent, guardian, or custodian of such child, if there be one.¹

Costs.—The costs by justices of the peace, for commitments under the vagrant act, are proper charges against the county. Cumberland County v. Boyd, 113 Pa. St. 52.

1. In re Maloney, 4 N. Y. Supp. 428; 51 Hun (N. Y.) 372; People v. New York Catholic Protectory, 101 N. Y. 195.

In People v. New York Catholic Protectory, 106 N. Y. 604, it was held that under the provisions of this statute, as amended by the Laws of 1886, ch. 31, where both parents were living, the notice must be to, or the appearance by, the father. But in Carpenter v. People (N. Y. 1890), 25 N. E. Rep. 1044, reversing 11 N. Y. Supp. 852, it was held that under Laws 1888, ch. 145, § 6, amending section 295 of the Penal Code, notice to, or the presence of, either parent at the examination was sufficient.

In People v. Catholic Protectory, 61 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 445, it was held that children found picking rags on the streets of the city of New York might be committed to the Catholic Protectory, without any notice to parent or guardian; but in this case the children were committed under Laws of 1877, ch. 428, as amended by Laws of 1881, ch. 496, which contains no provision for notice to parents.

In Ohio, it seems that there is no provision for the notification of parent or guardian. Cincinnati House of Refuge v. Ryan, 37 Ohio St. 197.

2. Thus, in a prosecution for vagrancy under the Alabama Code, § 4218, the wife of the defendant is not a competent witness. Merriwether v. State, 81 Ala. 74.

Evidence of the use of profane language is competent, upon the trial of a complaint charging one with being an idle and disorderly person, although the use of such language is punishable as a distinct offense. Com. v. Murray, 14 Gray (Mass.) 397.

But evidence that one is "a professional gambler, living in idleness," unless specifically charged in the written complaint of vagrancy, is not admissible, under the Georgia Code, § 4560, which enumerates five classes of vagrants. Allen v. State, 51 Ga. 264.

3. An assignment or contract is not "vague" merely because it is indefinite or uncertain. "Vague," in this connection, means that which is incapable of being ascertained when the instrument comes to be enforced. Language has been used with regard to assignments of, and contracts relating to, future property, which tends to confuse the idea of vagueness in the contract itself, with that sort of necessary uncertainty which, at the time when the contract is made, is more or less involved in the idea of futurity. "Vagueness" is a misleading term. A contract may be too vague in itself to be understood; and on that ground it is enforceable neither at law nor in equity. But in the case of a contract to assign future property when the money has been paid, if, when at the time of the contract coming to be enforced, the property has fallen into the possession of the assignor, and is of such a character and is sufficiently ascertained to admit of the contract being enforced in equity, there is no necessary vagueness. Bowen, L. J., in Re Clarke, Coombe v. Carter, 36 Ch. Div. 348. See also Tailby v. Official Receiver, 13 App. Cas. 523.

1. Webster's Dict., followed in Sharpleigh v. Surdam, 1 Flipp. (U. S.) 489. This case turned upon the meaning of the term as used in a statute providing that the validity of a tax sale should be questioned in but three ways. The court said: "'Validity' has a well understood technical, as well as popular, acceptance, and must receive such meaning in the courts if its use in the statute does not suggest a different one. In the general nomenclature of the law, no word is so frequently used to signify legal sufficiency, in contradistinction to mere regularity, as this one. We say a deed is regular, but invalid for want of power in the attorney or officer. When a lawyer says he concedes the regularity of a sale, but objects to its validity, it is known the conditions are questioned upon which the power to make it depended. Elementary books, in treating of questions of both business and official agency, employ it as a compendious word, as always including every incident of complete legality. Regularity, on the other hand, never does so. An official sale, an order, judgment or decree may be regular. The whole practice, in reference to its entry, may be correct, but still invalid for reasons going behind the regularity of its forms. But, when we say a judgment, decree, or sale is valid, it fully excludes the idea that it is void for any reason."

The "validity of a statute of the United States," as the term is used in the Act of March 3, 1885, ch. 355, § 2, 23 Stat. 443, "regulating appeals from the supreme court of the District of Columbia to the supreme court of the United States," refers only to the power of Congress to enact the particular statute drawn in question, and not a judicial construction of it which does not question that power. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Hopkins, 130 U. S. 210.

Validity Equivalent to Legality.—As to when the term "validity" has been held equivalent to "legality," in reference to an act of donation, see Larrendon's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 957.

2. Valuable Thing—Valuable Security.—(See also FALSE PRETENSES, vol. 7, p. 710).—The New Jersey statute against false pretenses is directed against the obtaining of any "valuable thing" through such pretenses. In State v. Thatcher, 35 N. J. L. 452, the court distinguishes the words "valuable thing" from "valuable security," used in the English statute, thus: "Our legislators, who framed our act in view of the early English statute, were not content with the language there used, but, with the design of amplifying its operation, employed the words 'money, wares, merchandise, or other valuable thing.' Our statute having been passed prior to 7 and 8 George IV., and our law-makers having adopted more comprehensive terms than that act contains, no argument can be drawn from the fact that the English Parliament, by subsequent enactment, declared it indictable to obtain by false pretense the signature of any person to a written instrument. 'Valuable thing' is more comprehensive than 'valuable security.' Every valuable security is a valuable thing, but many valuable things are not valuable securities. Meretangible things were not alone meant, for the words prior to valuable thing described them. The legislature intended to denounce as a crime the obtaining, by deceit, of every valuable thing of a personal nature. 'Other valuable thing' includes everything of value. That it embraces the promissory note of a third person, is settled in State v. Tomlin, 29 N. J. L. 13." And in this same case of State v. Thatcher, 35 N. J. L. 452, it was held to include the prosecutor's own note or contract of suretyship.

Valuable Article.—Ice has been held a "valuable article," within a statute providing that any person removing, without a license, "any trees, stone, timber, or other valuable article," shall be guilty of a trespass. State v. Pottmeyer, 33 Ind. 402; 5 Am. Rep. 224.

VALUABLE CONSIDERATION—(See also CONTRACT, vol. 3, p. 831; DEEDS, vol. 5, p. 435; FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES, vol. 8, p. 759; FRAUDULENT SALES, vol. 8, pp. 806, 843, 849, 860; NATURAL LOVE AND AFFECTION, vol. 16, p. 234; SALES, vol. 21, p. 463; VALUE RECEIVED).—The distinction between a good and a valuable consideration is that the former consists of blood, or natural love and affection, as when a man grants an estate to a near relation from motives of generosity, prudence, or natural duty, and the latter consists of such a consideration as money, marriage which is to follow, or the like, which the law esteems an equivalent given for the grant.¹

Valuable Papers.—A Tennessee statute provided that to give validity to a paper (not witnessed) as a will, it must be found among the "valuable papers" of the deceased. In Reagan v. Stanley, 11 Lea (Tenn.) 323, the trial judge found in favor of the will, and the decision was affirmed on appeal. The court said: "Valuable papers, within the meaning of the statute, are not papers having a money value, but only such as 'are kept and considered worthy of being taken care of by the particular person.'" Marr v. Marr, 2 Head (Tenn.) 306. Entries of daily transactions, whether on separate sheets of paper or in book form, preserved by the writer, and which the proof shows he directed his servant to deliver to the person selected by him to manage his estate after his death, would be valuable papers. If the testamentary papers in controversy had been written on separate sheets of paper, and deposited by the writer within the leaves of the book in which his diary was kept, it would scarcely be contended that they would not be found among his valuable papers. For a stronger reason they must be so considered if actually written in the book itself and as parts of its entries. Moreover, the proof shows that this book was in the hands of the deceased on the night before his death, and was found with other manuscript books of account, in which the deceased kept his accounts as treasurer of the town of La Grange, and of certain secret lodges. These books were all lying upon a shelf of the washstand, within a step of the bed of the deceased, and where he seems to have been in the habit of keeping them.

On the second day before his death, he had called his servant's attention to this book, and directed her to hand it to Dr. Pulliam in the event of his own death, which his diary shows he was daily anticipating. The proof is sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial judge on the contested point."

The deposit must have been made by the testator, or with his consent, among his papers which he regarded as valuable and desired to preserve, or in the hands of another for safe keeping, with the intent that it should operate as his will. Hooper v. McQuary, 5 Coldw. (Tenn.) 129. In this case the court said: "No better definition of the meaning of the words 'valuable papers' can, perhaps, be given, than that they consist of such as are regarded by the testator as worthy of preservation; in his estimation of some value. It is not confined to deeds for lands or slaves, obligations for money, or certificates for stock. Any others, which are kept and considered worthy of being taken care of by the particular person, must be regarded as embraced in that description. This requirement is only intended as an indication, on the part of the writer, that it is his intention to preserve and perpetuate the paper in question, as a disposition of his property; that he regards it as valuable." See also Marr v. Marr, 2 Head (Tenn.) 303.

1. 2 Bl. Com. 297; Black's Law Dict., p. 1210.

In Tillinghast v. Banks, 14 Ga. 649, Starnes, J., quoting Story on Promissory Notes, § 186, said: "A valuable consideration consists in some right, interest, profit, or benefit, accruing to the party who makes the contract; or some forbearance, detriment, loss, responsibility or act, labor or service, on the other side."

VALUATION—(See also VALUE).—See note 1.

VALUE.—The word “value,” when applied without qualification to property of any description, necessarily means the price which it will command in the market.²

Marriage as a Consideration.—See MARRIAGE SETTLEMENTS, vol. 14, p. 554.

1. In Sergeant v. Dwyer, 44 Minn. 309, the plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement in reference to the purchase of a stock of merchandise; soiled and damaged goods were to be taken at a “valuation.” In regard to the use of the term “valuation,” in this connection, the court said: “The remaining question, and the only one of importance, in the case, is as to the construction which must be put on the words ‘at valuation,’ as used in regard to the soiled and damaged articles. It is not a case where the parties have omitted to fix and mention the value or price of the property sold and purchased, but one in which it was expressly agreed that one kind or class of goods should be taken and received at their valuation. It is the intention of the parties, when using the word ‘valuation,’ which we are called upon to discover, and this from an examination of the entire paper. They had specified definite means for determining the purchase price of all goods in fair condition, and as to the balance, it must be held that they intended to sell and buy at real value and actual worth. The word used is susceptible of the same meaning as ‘value,’ and hence, we should adopt such meaning for it, thus giving validity to the writing, and rendering it just what the parties undoubtedly intended it should be—a completed contract for the sale and purchase of the merchandise. Therefore, the value of the soiled and damaged goods would have to be ascertained and determined as any other fact in issue, and for this purpose the best evidence attainable was admissible.”

Fair Valuation.—Where, in answer to a tax suit, the defense was fraud in the assessment, and it was alleged that in a certain statement furnished the assessor (but which was informal), the property was “set down as of the value of $6,000 per mile, which was a fair valuation thereof, and so known and believed by the assessor,” it was held that this amounted to an allegation that

$6,000 per mile was a just and fair value, and, consequently, that an assessment of $15,000 per mile was excessive. State v. Central Pac. R. Co., 7 Nev. 99. Here the court said: “Is the allegation equivalent to an allegation that $6,000 was the fair value of the road; that is, would there have been any substantial difference in the allegation had the word ‘value’ been used instead of ‘valuation?’ Evidently not. The word valuation as here employed signifies value. Valuation is defined as the price set upon anything—the estimated or rated worth of anything; value. The words, as defined, seem to be synonymous. Value is generally but an estimate of the worth of a thing; there is not an exact standard whereby it can always be determined, and valuation, when used in its passive signification, as in this allegation, means the estimated value or worth placed on the thing.”

2. Fox v. Phelps, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 399. This case was upon the provision of a will that the property should be “valued.”

Market Value.—See MARKET VALUE, vol. 14, p. 467, where there is a numerous collection of cases.

Exchangeable Value.—See EXCHANGE, vol. 7, p. 116.

Forgery.—The word “value,” as used in the Ohio Code of Criminal Procedure, § 93, which provides, “that in an indictment for falsely making, altering, forging, printing, photographing, uttering, disposing of, or putting off any instrument, it shall be sufficient to set forth the purport and value thereof,” is not used in the sense of the “worth of the instrument in money,” but in the sense “of the effect which the instrument is intended to accomplish,” and hence, is the synonym of “effect” or “import.” Chidester v. State, 25 Ohio St. 438. See FORGERY, vol. 8, p. 478.

Distinguished from Income.—“There is a distinction between ‘value’ and ‘income,’ when taken separately and alone. Property may have an annual value without any income.” Miller, J., in Troy Iron, etc., Factory v. Corning, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 247.

Fair Cash Value—Actual Cash Value.

—In estimating the damage to property destroyed by fire, in an action against an insurance company, it was held that "actual cash value" of property and "fair cash value" were synonymous. Birmingham Fire Ins. Co. v. Pulver, 126 Ill. 337; 9 Am. St. Rep. 598.

Eminent Domain.—Minnesota Laws 1857, § 13, ch. 1 (Ex. Sess.), in providing for the appraisal of the "value" of lands taken by the M. & P. R. Co., for right of way, employs the word "value" as embracing not only the value of the strip of land taken, as an isolated parcel of land, but such additional value as attaches to it by reason of its connection with adjacent land of the same owner. Scott v. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., 21 Minn. 322. See generally EMINENT DOMAIN, vol. 6, p. 563.

The word "value" is itself a relative term, and in ascertaining what is the value of the land it is extremely common, indeed it is inevitable, to go into a great number of circumstances, by which that which is proper compensation to be paid for the transfer of one man's property to another may be ascertained. Com'rs v. Glasgow, etc., R. Co., 57 L. T. 571.

Thing of Value—Larceny—Burglary.

—A dog is a "thing of value" and may be stolen, and burglary may be committed by breaking and entering with intent to steal a dog. State v. Yates, 37 Alb. L. J. 232. In that case the court said: "As to the meaning of the words 'any thing,' there is no trouble. But as to the meaning of the word 'value' the matter is not so plain. Much labor and learning have been expended upon the question of the meaning of the word 'value.' 'Value' is defined by Bouvier as: '(1) The utility of an object. (2) The worth of an object in purchasing other goods.' These definitions are pretty evidently obtained by Bouvier from Adam Smith. 'The word "value," it is to be observed, has two different meanings, and sometimes expresses the utility of some particular object, and sometimes the power of purchasing other goods which the possession of that object conveys. The one may be called value in use; the other value in exchange.' Wealth of Nations, ch. 4. By these definitions value has two meanings. But later learned writers, straining for the last analysis, reject one of these. Value is the relation of two services.

The idea of value entered into the world for the first time when a man said to his brother, "Do this for me and I will do that for you." They had come to an agreement. Then we could say the two services were worth each other.' Harmonies of Political Economy, Bastiat. 'Value is the exchange power which one commodity or service has in relation to another.' Science of Wealth. Walker. Tested by the definitions of these philosophers, a dog has or may have a value. Tested by the common sense of men, and even by the common law, can there be any question that dogs come within the meaning of the phrase 'any thing of value?' By the common law dogs were property, and 'although it was not a crime to steal a dog, yet it was such an invasion of property as might amount to a civil injury, and be redressed by a civil action.' The above case was decided by the court of common pleas in Ohio under the Revised Larceny Act of the state, which, in describing property that may be stolen, uses the words "anything of value," the earlier act, under which it was held in State v. Lymus, 26 Ohio St. 400; 20 Am. Rep. 772, that a dog cannot be stolen, having used the words "goods and chattels" merely.

An indictment, under the West Virginia Code, ch. 145, § 14, which charges the accused with the larceny of "one gelding horse of the price of $100," instead of one gelding horse of the "value" of $100, according to the words of the statute, is sufficient. The word "price," as used here, is equivalent to the word "value," used in that statute. The court said: "In 3 Chit. Crim. Law, pp. 977, 979, 980, 981, precedents for indictments for the larceny of live animals are given, in which the word 'price' is used instead of the word 'value'; and in form No. 8, warrant for horse stealing, given in Mayo's Guide, the word 'price' is used for 'value.' All the lexicographers, both law and general, so far as I have been able to discover, in certain instances, give the words 'value' and 'price' as convertible and synonymous. In the sense used in the indictment before us, I think these words, if not synonymous, are certainly the equivalent of each other." State v. Sparks, 30 W. Va. 102. See, generally, LARCENY, vol. 12, pp. 781, 786; BURGLARY, vol. 2, p. 695.

Gaming.—Chips and checks, redeemable in money, are "things of value"

VALUE RECEIVED—(See also BILLS AND NOTES, vol. 2, p. 339).—A phrase usually employed in a bill of exchange or promissory note, to denote that a consideration has been given for it.¹

within the statute of gaming. Porter v. State, 51 Ga. 300.

"Value"—"Cost Price."—A referee, after finding that the defendant had agreed to pay the cost price of certain articles, found what their "value" was according to a certain exhibit not set forth in the record. It was held that all reasonable intendments must be made in support of the finding and judgment, and that, in the absence of a demand for a more specific finding, it might be properly assumed that he used the word "value" to signify "cost price." Neib v. Hinderer, 42 Mich. 451. See also State v. Sparks, 30 W. Va. 101.

Taxation, "Full Cash Value."—A statute provided that property was to be assessed at its full cash value. In Ballerino v. Mason, 83 Cal. 449, the court said: "The words 'actual value for agricultural purposes' are not equivalent to 'full cash value.' This is evident, for the reason that the value of property for the purposes named may be, and often is, less than its value for other purposes, and less than it would be taken for in payment of a just debt from a solvent debtor. The averment as to the value of plaintiff's property was, therefore, insufficient to sustain the contention."

The phrases "salable value," "actual value," "cash value," and others used in the directions to assessing officers, all mean the same thing, and are designed to effect the same purpose. Burroughs on Taxation, p. 227, § 99. But it is a matter of common observation that, in the valuation of real estate, this rule is habitually disregarded. Cummings v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 162.

Article of Great Intrinsic Value.—A family portrait is not an "article of great intrinsic or representative value," within the exemption clause of a carrier's receipt, when coupled with "specie, drafts, and bankbills," although it "represents" the owner's deceased father, and is the only one extant. Green v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 128 Mass. 221; 35 Am. Rep. 370.

The "intrinsic value" of a thing is its true, inherent, essential value, not dependent upon accident, place, or person, but the same everywhere and to everyone. Bank of the State v. Ford, 5 Ired. (N. Car.) 698, where it was held that bank notes have no intrinsic value.

Replevin.—"Value consists in the estimate, or opinion of those influencing the market, attachable to certain intrinsic qualities belonging to the article to be valued. The opinion of such persons can only be presented, in most cases, by hearsay." Washington Ice Co. v. Webster, 68 Me. 463. This was an action of replevin, the question being to determine the value of the property (ice) taken.

1. Value Received.—The words "value received," when used in an instrument, do not necessarily import a consideration in money. A promise to pay in the future may be shown to have been the consideration. Osgood v. Bringolf, 32 Iowa 265.

Prima Facie Import a Valuable Consideration.—The words "for value received," forming a part of the contract of assignment, must be held to furnish sufficient evidence, prima facie at least, of a consideration for the assignment. Brooks v. Page, 1 D. Ch. (Vt.) 340; Whitney v. Stearns, 16 Me. 304; Parish v. Stone, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 198; 25 Am. Dec. 378; Thrall v. Newell, 19 Vt. 206; 47 Am. Dec. 682.

In Mandeville v. Welch, 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 282, Story, J., said: "Upon the first point, we are of opinion that the law was correctly laid down by the court below. The argument of the defendant's counsel admits, that, where a bill imports on its face to be for 'value received,' it is prima facie evidence of that fact between the original parties; but it is stated that it is not evidence of the fact against third persons. We know of no such distinction. In all cases where the bill can be used as evidence, either against the parties or against third persons, the same legal presumption arises of its having been given for value received, as exists in relation to a deed expressed to be given for a valuable consideration."

"Value received" imparts a valid consideration for a bill or note. See BILLS AND NOTES, vol. 2, p. 339; Lap- ham v. Barrett, 1 Vt. 247; Averett v.

3. When Objection to Be Made, 61.

I. DEFINITION.—A variance is a difference, inconsistency, or variation between the evidence adduced, and the allegation in pleading in support of which the evidence is offered, or between the intimation of the cause of action given in a writ and the cause as shown in the declaration.¹

Whether Necessary.—The words "value received" are a sufficient expression of the consideration for an undertaking to pay the debt of another, if indeed it be at all necessary that the consideration should be expressed in writing. McMorris v. Herndon, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 56.

A bill of exchange is good without the words "for value received," and in declaring thereon, it is not necessary to allege or prove a consideration.

Hubble v. Fogartie, 3 Rich. (S. Car.) 413; 45 Am. Dec. 775.

The words are not necessary in a bill or note. Coursin v. Ledlie, 31 Pa. St. 508; Grant v. Da Costa, 3 M. & S. 352; Hatch v. Thayer, 11 Ad. & El. 708; 39 E. C. L. 207; Claxton v. 1. 2 Abb. Law Dict.

A discrepancy or disagreement between two instruments or two steps in the same cause, which ought, by law, to be entirely consonant. Thus, if the evidence adduced by the plaintiff does not agree with the allegations of his declaration, it is a variance; and so if the statement of the cause of action in the declaration does not coincide with that given in the writ. Black's Law Dict.

A disagreement or difference between two parts of the same legal proceeding which ought to agree together. Variances are between the writ and the declaration, and between the declaration or bill in equity, and the evidence. Bouv. Law Dict.

A discrepancy: (a) Between pleadings and proof, as where a complaint mentions a wrong date, or the facts prove to be different from what was alleged. (b) Between the form of the writ or process by which the action was commenced and the form of the declaration or complaint. Formerly, when variances were deemed more important than now, variance was often defined as a fatal discrepancy or disagreement, etc.; but in civil cases such variances between pleading and proof as do not actually mislead the adverse party are now disregarded as immaterial, and many others are amendable. Under what is known in the United States as Code Practice, variance is used to designate a discrepancy in some particulars only, and is amendable if it has not misled, while a failure of proof as to the entire scope and meaning of an allegation is not regarded as a mere variance, but fatal. Cent. Dict.

II. AT COMMON LAW.—The doctrine of variance at the common law was carried to extremes. The question whether the variance was material or immaterial to the opposite side, was not considered. An immaterial variance was as fatal as a material one.¹

Departure.—Care must be taken to distinguish "variance" from "departure." In pleading, departure "is said to be when the second plea containeth matter not pursuant to the party's former plea, and which fortifieth not the same, and thereupon it is called 'decessus,' because he departeth from his former plea." Co. Litt. 304 a. Thus, if the plaintiff suing as the executor of A B alleges in his declaration that the cause of action accrued to A B in his lifetime, and in his replication alleges that it accrued to him as executor after A B's death, this is a departure. Departure was forbidden by the rules of the common-law pleading and is so still by the modern practice. Rap. & L. Law Dict. See also Hickman v. Walker, Willes 27; Stephen on Pleading 410; 2 Wm. Saunders, 84n; Bouv. Law Dict.

1. Common-Law Doctrine.—Perhaps no portion of the old forms of judicial procedure in England was more fraught with injustice to suitors, than the abrogated doctrine of variances. The British Parliament, in the preamble to their enactment on the subject, expressed themselves in very strong terms of the practice that had been so long obtained in the common-law courts. They speak of a "failure of justice" having taken place in those courts, in cases wherein the variance was "not material to the merits," and by which "the opposite party could not have been prejudiced." Some notable instances of this failure of justice may be readily found by a reference to the head of variances in any of the treatises on pleading and evidence. In Jones v. Mars, 2 Camp. 305, Lord Ellenborough was puzzled to decide whether the letter s too much, at the end of a word, did not constitute a variance; and in Bayley on Bills 310, it is laid down, that it is no variance in setting out a bill, according to its tenor, to put "Messrs." A, B, and C, without the r, instead of "Messrs.," with it.

The learned editor of Yelverton's Reports (p. 195b), after stating the doctrine that averments which, though unnecessary, describe a constituent part of the plaintiff's title, must be proved as made, or the plaintiff will fail on the ground of a variance, and that this doctrine is confined to records and contracts, proceeds: "From an expression of Buller, J., in this case (Gwinnet v. Phillips, 3 T. R. 645), and another of Marshall, C. J., in 3 Cranch 209, it might be inferred that it is confined to records and written contracts. But though the instances, in which this rule has been applied, may all have been of that description, yet no good reason is perceived for a distinction in this respect, between contracts written and unwritten. A variance in other cases is equally fatal in describing either." See, on this subject, Bristow v. Wright, Doug. 667; Peppin v. Solomons, 5 T. R. 496; Turner v. Eyles, 3 B. & P. 456; Winn v. White, 2 W. Bl. 842; Savage v. Smith, 2 W. Bl. 1102; Rex v. Pippet, 1 T. R. 125; Williamson v. Allison, 2 East 452; Wigley v. Jones, 5 East 440; Purcell v. MacNamara, 9 East 160; Rhind v. Wilkinson, 2 Taunt. 237; Jerome v. Whitney, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 321; Wilson v. Codman, 3 Cranch (U. S.) 193; U. S. v. Porter, 3 Day (Conn.) 283. It may be collected from the above authorities, that whenever a contract is described, a variance will be equally fatal, whether the action be upon the contract itself, or upon some collateral matter, or in form ex delicto. 1 Chit. Pl. 307; Ditchburn v. Spracklin, 5 Esp. 31.

So much injustice resulted from this broad construction of variance that the English Parliament, and the several legislative bodies of the United States, have passed laws on the subject, whereby the old doctrine has been very much curtailed; such, for instance, are the laws permitting amendments when the opposite party is not injured or taken by surprise.

1. Modern English Practice.—A party may now, in almost every case, avoid the consequences of a variance between the allegation in the pleadings and the state of facts proved, by amendment of the record. The power was given by Lord Tenderden's act (9 Geo. IV., ch. 15), in regard to variances between matters in writing or in print, produced in evidence, and the recital thereof upon the record; and it was afterward extended (Stat. 3 and 4 Wm. IV., ch. 42, § 23) to all other matters, in the judgment of the court or judge not material to the merits of the case, upon such terms as to costs and postponement as the court or judge may deem reasonable. Hanbury v. Ella, 1 Ad. & El. 61; 28 E. C. L. 39; Parry v. Fairhurst, 2 C. M. & R. 196; Doe v. Edwards, 6 C. & P. 208; 25 E. C. L. 359; Hemming v. Parry, 6 C. & P. 580; 25 E. C. L. 550; Mash v. Densham, 1 M. & R. 442; Cox v. Painter, 1 Nev. & P. 581; Doe v. Long, 9 C. & P. 773; 38 E. C. L. 331; Whitwill v. Scheer, 8 Ad. & El. 301; 35 E. C. L. 395; *Carmarthen v. For amendment in criminal cases, see Act 9, Geo. IV., ch. 15; 11 & 12 Vict. ch. 46, § 4; 14 & 15 Vict., ch. 100, § 1.

In Tildesley v. Harper, 10 Ch. Div. 393, Bramwell, L. J., said: "My practice has always been to give leave to amend unless I have been satisfied that the party applying has been acting malâ fide, or, by his blunder, has done some injury to the other side which cannot be compensated by costs or otherwise."

In Clarapade v. Commercial Union

Assoc., 32 W. R. 262, Brett, M. R., said: "However negligent or careless may have been the first omission, however late the proposed amendment, it should be allowed if it can be made without injustice to the other side, and there is none if they can be compensated by costs." "At the trial of a cause, a material variance between the allegations in the pleadings and the state of the facts proved is a fatal objection, and decides the suit in favor of the objecting party; and a variance is often (it might have been said too often) considered in this technical sense as material, though to common sense it may appear to be very trifling and though it may be wholly irrelevant to the merits of the case. But let it be constantly remembered, that the intention of the legislature in passing the 3 & 4 Wm. IV., ch. 42, §§ 23, 24, expressly was to annul the disastrous consequences of such technicalities, and to empower, and indeed, require, the judges to amend in all cases where it did not appear that the opponent had been misled by the variance and prejudiced, not by being deprived of a technical objection, but in the just and meritorious conduct of his action or defense. If this principle be kept in view and acted upon, few indeed will be the variances that will not be amended by the judge who tries the case, or by the court above, when he reserves any difficult point, etc. The inclination should ever be to permit an amendment; because, if erroneously refused, there will be no

IV. UNDER CODES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE—1. In General.—There are embraced in the codes of civil procedure three sections which distinguish the discrepancies between the allegata and probata into three classes: namely, Material Variances, Immaterial Variances, and Failure of Proof.

The provisions which are set out in succeeding sections of this article, clearly indicate the difference in effect between the variances just mentioned. In the case of a material variance, the court may allow an amendment on such terms as it may deem just. Where the variance is immaterial, there being no injury whatever done to the adverse party, costs are not imposed in allowing an amendment. If there is a failure of proof, there is no room for amendment, and dismissal of the action is the proper course.¹ These are beneficent provisions and should be, as they generally are, liberally construed and carried out. They were designed to correct a great evil and wrong in the old system; namely, the turning of a party out of court upon slight and non-essential mistakes in pleadings, or variances between the pleadings and the proof.

The power of the court to allow amendments under the codes is very great. The real limitation to it seems to be that the amendment shall not change substantially the claim or defense.² To illustrate: If the plaintiffs in an action for conversion sue as tenants in common, and the proof shows that they are surviving partners, the trial court may allow them to amend by inserting an allegation correctly describing the right and character in which they sue.³ But where the plaintiff claims to recover for fraud and deceit, he cannot, on the trial, change the nature of his action and recover on contract.⁴ And the power of a referee to allow amendments is subject to the same restrictions as that of a judge at the trial.⁵ redress, when, if mistakenly granted, the party prejudiced has an express power of appeal. By uniformly acting on this principle, the aspersion so frequently cast upon the administration of justice will be effectually removed, and it may in time be forgotten that a judge once judicially declared that he would nonsuit a plaintiff for an error in half a letter." Heard's Stephen's Pleading, p. CXXVII.

1. See, infra, this title, Material Variance; Immaterial Variance; Failure of Proof.

2. Power as to Amendments Under Codes.—Carpenter v. Huffstaller, 87 N. Car. 273; Grant v. Burgwyn, 88 N. Car. 95; Kron v. Smith, 96 N. Car. 389; Whitcomb v. Hungerford, 42 Barb. (N. Y.) 177; Egert v. Wicker, 10 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 193; Neudecker

v. Kohlberg, 81 N. Y. 296; Hackett v. Bank of California, 57 Cal. 335. While the code is liberal in disregarding technical defects and omissions in pleadings, and in allowing amendments, it does not permit a cause of action to be changed, either because the plaintiff fails to prove the facts necessary to sustain it, or because he has mistaken his remedy and the force and effect of the allegations of his complaint. Barnes v. Quigley, 59 N. Y. 265.

3. Reeder v. Sayre, 70 N. Y. 180; 26 Am. Rep. 567.

4. Barnes v. Quigley, 59 N. Y. 265.

5. Dougherty v. Vallotton, 38 N. Y. Super. Ct. 455. In this case it was further held that the exercise of this power is so far within the discretion of the referee, that, although it may be reviewed on appeal, the court will not

An application for leave to amend a pleading, on the trial, is always addressed to the discretion of the court, and, if denied, is not the subject of appeal or review.¹ But where the refusal of the judge to allow an amendment is placed on the ground of want of power, it may be reviewed.²

2. Kinds of Variance.—a. MATERIAL VARIANCE.—The usual provision in regard to material variances is this: "No variance between the allegation in a pleading and the proof shall be deemed material, unless it shall have actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice,³ in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits.⁴ Whenever it shall be alleged that a party has been so misled, the fact shall be proved to the satisfaction of the court, and in what respect he has been misled, and thereupon the court may order the pleading to be amended upon such terms as shall be just."⁵

The words "or defense," in the above provision, are not found in some of the codes, but they are supplied by the courts, as they are clearly necessary to complete the sense, since there can be no reason why a defendant, who has been misled, shall not have the like liberty of amending as the plaintiff.⁶

To constitute a variance between the allegations and the proofs, the difference must be as to the substantial elements of the case, and not as to the legal conclusions from the facts drawn by the pleader.⁷ Ordinarily, the fact that the party has been

Variance in Justices' Courts.—Some of the codes provide that in justices' courts a variance between the proof on the trial and the allegations in a pleading shall be disregarded as immaterial, unless the court is satisfied that the adverse party has been misled to his prejudice thereby. See New York Code Civ. Proc., § 2943; Washington Code, § 1738; Montana Comp. Stat. 1887, § 777.

4. Proof by the defendants that they knew the plaintiff held the note produced at the trial; that they had given no other note of that date and amount, and no note of that amount payable generally, does not tend to show that they were misled by the variance, no defense upon the merits being pretended. Chapman v. Carolin, 3 Bosw. (N. Y.) 456.

5. Effect of Want of Proof of Prejudice.—Without proof to the satisfaction of the court that the adverse party has been so misled, the variance will be deemed immaterial and treated accordingly. Place v. Minster, 65 N. Y. 89; Catlin v. Gunter, 11 N. Y. 368, reversing 1 Duer (N. Y.) 253; Sussdorff v. Schmidt, 55 N. Y. 319; Fowler v. Martin, 1 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 377; *Dunn v. misled to his prejudice by a variance must be made to appear by affidavit.¹ And if he fails to file his affidavit setting forth in what respect he has been misled, the objection is not available to him in the appellate court.² Proof of necessary prejudice to the opposite party may, however, in some cases, appear on the face of the pleadings themselves.³

There is found in some of the codes a provision that where the plaintiff, in an action to recover the possession of personal property, on a claim of being the owner thereof, shall fail to establish on trial such ownership, but shall prove that he is entitled to the possession thereof by virtue of a special property therein, he shall not thereby be defeated of his action, but shall be permitted to amend his complaint on reasonable terms, and be entitled to judgment according to the proof in the case.⁴

b. IMMATERIAL VARIANCE.—In reference to immaterial variances, it is provided that where the variance is not material, as prescribed in the preceding section, the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence, or may order an immediate amendment without costs.⁵ Generally speaking, mere misnomers, slight errors in amounts, and in the description of property, are immaterial, and are to be disregarded or amended without

In Silsby v. Aldridge, 1 Wash. 117, an action for certain personal property, the plaintiffs alleged ownership, and produced a chattel mortgage of the property in question, given to them by third persons to secure a debt not yet due, containing the usual provisions against removal and disposition. The property had never been in the plaintiffs' possession, but had been delivered to the defendant by the mortgagors a short time before the action. It was held that there was a fatal variance, not to be cured by amendment under the section of the code above mentioned. To the same effect is Kerron v. North Pac. Lumbering, etc., Mfg. Co., 1 Wash. 241.

5. Immaterial Variance.—Disregarding the variance is tantamount to an amendment of the complaint. Coleman

v. Playsted, 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 26. And where the amendment could have been made on the trial, the appellate court will treat it as having been made, or allow the amendment nunc pro tunc. *Hamilton v. Where an issue not presented by the pleadings is fully litigated on the trial, the complaint may be amended at any time to conform to the facts, or the variance may be wholly disregarded. Flanders v. Cottrell, 36 Wis. 564; Weston v. McMillan, 42 Wis. 567; Russell v. Loomis, 43 Wis. 545.

In New York, this power to amend and conform the pleadings to the proof is not confined to the court at trial nor at special term, but may be exercised by the court at general term, or by the court of appeals. *Dougherty v. terms.¹ And a variance as to dates will, as a rule, be considered immaterial, unless the dates are of the gist of the action.²

Where the petition alleges an express agreement, and the evidence shows an implied one only, the variance is immaterial.³ And that the draft was signed by "John Q. Jackson." The proof showed that it was signed, "John Q. Jackson, agent." The court, in holding this variance to be immaterial, said: "The variance goes merely to the identity of the paper or document which it is alleged the defendants undertook to carry. The draft alleged, and the draft proved, are identical in legal effect; and they were also circumstantially identical, except in the matter of the word 'agent.' We cannot consider that the absence of that particle in the allegations and its presence in the proof, could have affected any substantial rights of the defendants."

In a suit on a judgment of another state, the judgment was described as having been rendered for $19.30 costs, whereas the judgment offered in evidence was for $18.30 costs. The variance was deemed immaterial. Carpenter v. Ritchie (Wash. 1891), 28 Pac. Rep. 380.

Where a subscription to a railroad was described in the complaint as a contract to pay $100.00, and the contract produced at the trial and given in evidence was an agreement to pay $1.00, it was held that the variance was immaterial, and the supreme court would consider the complaint as amended so as to conform to the proof. Lucas v. Smith, 42 Ind. 103.

In State Ins. Co. v. Schreck, 27 Neb. 527; 20 Am. St. Rep. 696, the policy of insurance described the real estate upon which the insured property was situated as the "N. E. quarter of sec. 2, tp. 30, range 16, County of Holt, State of Nebraska." The evidence showed that the property was on the northwest quarter of the section named at the time of insurance, and had so remained until the loss, the mistake being in the policy. It was held that the variance was immaterial, and it was unnecessary to reform the policy before the trial.

In Roe v. Cutter, 4 Wash. 611, the complaint alleged the conversion of a city warrant, "A. 896," drawn on a certain fund, for a certain amount. The evidence showed that the defendant never had such a warrant, but that he did receive from the plaintiff a warrant drawn on the same fund, and for the same amount, but numbered "893." The variance was considered immaterial.

In Newstadt v. Adams, 5 Duer (N. Y.) 43, the petition averred a delivery to carriers at 59 Broadway. The proof was of a delivery at an office in Canal Street. The variance was considered immaterial.

2. Variance in Dates.—Beach v. Tooker, 10 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 297; U. S. v. LeBaron, 4 Wall. (U. S.) 642.

In Willer v. Bergenthal, 50 Wis. 474, the complaint alleged that the petition for a lien was filed July 6, 1878, and within six months after the last charge for work and materials. The proof was that such last charge was made November 27, 1877, and the petition filed May 6, 1878. The variance was held to be immaterial.

Where the complaint showed an agreement for extension of time from April 7th "until next spring," and the evidence was that the agreement was for an extension for one year, the variance was considered immaterial. Banta v. Martin, 38 Ohio St. 534.

3. Alleging Express Agreement—Proving Implied One.—Smith v. Lippincott, 49 Barb. (N. Y.) 398; affirmed on appeal, see 6 Alb. L. J. 199.

Where the allegations were that certain work and services were to be performed at an agreed compensation, and the proof was that they were to be at what they were reasonably worth, the variance was considered immaterial. Sussdorff v. Schmidt, 55 N. Y. 319; Scott v. Lillenthal, 9 Bosw. (N. Y.) 224.

In Giffert v. West, 33 Wis. 617, the complaint averred an express warranty, which was not proven, but the facts put in evidence, without objection, showed an implied warranty to the same effect. It was held that the variance should be disregarded, or an immediate amendment allowed.

where the complaint is based upon an implied promise to repay money paid out by the plaintiff for the defendant's benefit, and the proof shows an express promise to repay, the variance is immaterial.¹

Where the copy of the note spread on the pleadings contained trifling departures from the original, as in abbreviations, and in stating the amount in words as well as in figures, the variance was adjudged immaterial.²

Where the averment is of a sale in writing, and the proof shows a sale by parol, the variance is immaterial.³

A variance between the complaint and proofs in the degree of force used in expelling the plaintiff from the defendant's cars, is immaterial.⁴

Where the plaintiff declared upon an unconditional contract, and proved a conditional one, the conditions, however, playing no part in the pending suit, the variance was held to be immaterial.⁵ And similarly, where it was shown that before the action was instituted the conditions were fulfilled.⁶

In an action for causing, by wrongful act, the death of a person, where the allegations were that the defendants owned, as tenants in common, the entire block in front of which the accident occurred, and the proof was that they owned it in distinct parcels in severalty, the variance was held to be immaterial.⁷

Where, in an action for conversion, it was averred that the property belonged to the plaintiff, and the evidence showed that it was consigned to him as a factor, he being chargeable with its

In Farrell v. Palmer, 36 Cal. 187, the plaintiff declared on an express promise barred by the Statute of Limitations. He proved an acknowledgment from which a promise would be implied. The variance was adjudged immaterial.

In Ludlow v. Dole, 62 N. Y. 617, affirming 1 Hun (N. Y.) 715, the complaint was on a quantum meruit. The proof showed a specific contract fixing the price. The variance was held to be immaterial. See also Fells v. Vestvali, 2 Keyes (N. Y.) 152.

2. Corcoran v. Doll, 32 Cal. 83.

Where the note upon which the action was founded was described in the complaint as payable "three months after date," and that produced at the trial, although corresponding in all other particulars with that set forth in the complaint, was payable four months after date, the variance was held to be immaterial. Trowbridge v. Didier, 4 Duer (N. Y.) 448.

Where a note which, by its terms, is payable eight months after date, is described in the complaint correctly, except that the time when it is payable is not stated, so that, in effect, it is stated to be payable generally and absolutely, the variance is immaterial. Chapman v. Carolin, 3 Bosw. (N. Y.) 456.

6. Hart v. Hudson, 6 Duer (N. Y.) 294. In this case it was said by the court, speaking by Duer, J., that, at any rate, when the evidence showing the variance has been received upon the trial without objection, the referee ought to disregard it, leaving to the court, in the exercise of the discretion given it by the code, to amend the complaint by conforming the allegations thereof to the proof.

Where, on the trial, the defendant's counsel alleged that there was a variance, but made no answer when asked by the judge if he had been misled thereby, it was ruled that if there was a variance, it must, under the circumstances, be considered immaterial.²

Other examples of immaterial variances will be found in the notes.³

1. Gorum v. Carey, 1 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 285.

2. Morgan v. First Nat. Bank, 93 N. Car. 352.

3. Where, in an action upon a contract, the complaint alleged that the plaintiff refused to enter into the contract unless one of the defendants should indorse such contract and become responsible for its performance, and upon the trial it appeared that the agreement was that the defendant should join in and sign the same, it was held that the variance was immaterial and should have been disregarded. Hauck v. Craighead, 4 Hun (N. Y.) 561.

In Nash v. Towne, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 689, the averment was "a cash consideration in hand paid," and the proof was that the consideration was a sight draft which was paid. This was held to be an amendable variance.

In an action on a fire insurance policy, the complaint alleged a written application made and signed by the assured, in which certain material false representations were made, and that these thereby became warranties. The jury found that the questions were asked and answered as stated in the written application, but that the assured did not sign it; and the evidence of that fact was admitted and submitted to the jury without objection, and the finding was not excepted to. It was held that the variance was immaterial, and the answer might be treated as amended according to the evidence and finding. Ryan v. Springfield F., etc., Ins. Co., 46 Wis. 671.

In pleading usury, the transaction should be correctly set out in substance, but where, on the trial, the evidence tends to prove a usurious agreement differing from the one alleged in the answer, in several particulars, but not in its entire scope and meaning, and the plaintiff is not misled thereby, the variance will be deemed immaterial. Clayes v. Hooker, 4 (Hun N. Y.) 231.

In Cody v. Bemis, 40 Wis. 666, the complaint alleged that the plaintiff paid the defendant for a certain chattel, and the proof was that a third person, his debtor, delivered goods for the plaintiff to the defendant to the amount of the price of the chattel, for which the defendant gave the plaintiff credit. It was held that this, if a variance at all, was one which could not mislead the defendant, and for which the judgment should not be reversed.

In an action of slander, where a contract is referred to in the petition, simply by way of preliminary inducement, the contract is not rendered inadmissible in evidence on account of a technical variance between the instrument and the allegations of the petition, where the effect of such variance is not to surprise or mislead to his prejudice the adverse party. Clements v. Maloney, 55 Mo. 352.

In Barnett v. Ward, 36 Ohio St. 107; 38 Am. Rep. 561, the defendant, in an action of slander, was charged with saying that the plaintiff "slept with" a man not her husband. The proof showed the statement to have been that such person "was in bed" with her. The variance was adjudged immaterial, the court observing: "In the present case, it not only was not shown that the defendant below was misled to his prejudice by the supposed variance, but that he was so misled was not even suggested. Indeed, it is not easily seen how he could have been misled by a variance so slight. The words proved, as well as those in which the charge was laid, imputed to the plaintiff below a want of chastity. The words proved were slightly variant from those alleged, but they were clearly of the same import and meaning. That the defendant below could have been misled by a difference in phraseology, apparently so immaterial, is hardly to be believed."

In an action by a servant, for injuries received through the negligence of the master, the complaint alleged that the

c. FAILURE OF PROOF.—The codes provide that “where the allegation to which the proof is directed, is unproved, not in some particular or particulars only, but in its entire scope and meaning, it is not a case of variance, but a failure of proof.”

In cases of failure of proof, there can be no amendment; dismissal of the action is the proper course.¹

When the plaintiff proves a contract essentially different from the one declared on, there is a failure of proof, and the defendant is entitled to a nonsuit.² Thus, if an action is brought upon an account stated, and the proof fails to show such an account, though it may indicate a liability on a special contract, or for plaintiff left his work to go to the water closet and was injured while on the way; the proof showed that he was on his way to his work, but had not at the time begun work for the day. The variance was considered immaterial. Sayward v. Carlson, 1 Wash. 29.

It is not a variance to aver a sale and delivery and prove a sale and readiness to deliver. Carter v. Carter, 101 Ind. 450.

Sutton*, 24 Ohio St. 333.

1. Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Bunnell, 61 Ind. 183.

2. Failure of Proof.—In Johnson v. Moss, 45 Cal. 515, the contract, as set out in the complaint, did not require the defendant to give to the plaintiff any written guaranty that he would not reestablish a ferry, that being a question in the case; and the plaintiff proved, by his own testimony, that he bought the right of way of the defendant's ferry, and that the defendant was to give him a written guaranty that “there should be no more ferry there.” The court held that there was proved a contract essentially different from the one declared on, and a motion for a nonsuit should be granted.

In Boardman v. Griffin, 52 Ind. 101, it was said that parties to an action must recover, if at all, upon the allegations of the pleadings therein; and when the trial is by the court, it may not, any more than a jury, go outside of the case made by the pleadings and find for a party upon facts different in their general scope and meaning from those pleaded. It would be folly to require the plaintiff to state his cause of action had the defendant to disclose his grounds of defense, if, on the trial, either fraud, there is a failure of proof.¹ And where suit was brought on a contract alleged to have been made with a person since deceased, and for the benefit of his estate, but the evidence showed that he was not a party to the contract in its origin, and had never acquired an interest in it by assignment, this was held to be a failure of proof.²

Where the note declared on does not mention any place of payment, and that offered in evidence is made payable at a certain bank, the variance is fatal.³

A failure of proof also occurs where the plaintiffs sue in their separate capacities, and prove a contract with the partnership of which they are members.⁴

In an action for negligence, it is not proper for the plaintiff to allege in his complaint one thing as the proximate cause of his injury, and upon the trial prove another as the proximate cause.⁵

In an action on an account for work and labor performed, the plaintiff may not recover on facts showing a guaranty by the defendant that other parties would pay for the work.⁶

If, however, the proof sustains a cause of action which can be found in the complaint, it is sufficient, although the language used in stating it may be inappropriate and lacking in precision and technical accuracy.⁷ And a failure of proof, or a variance between the allegations and proof, as to such provisions of the contract as are not essential to a recovery, will not defeat the plaintiff's action.⁸

or both might abandon such grounds and recover upon others which are substantially different from those alleged.

A right to recover on a complaint alleging negligence in the use of defective machinery, cannot be supported by proof of negligence in employing unskillful men to operate the machinery. Long v. Doxey, 50 Ind. 385.

Where the petition alleged that the plaintiff was injured through the negligence of the defendant, in having and using defective machinery, and in running and managing its railroad and cars, and the proof was that the injury was occasioned by a broken frog, there was held to be a failure of proof.

In Parker v. Rensselaer, etc., R. Co., 16 Barb. (N. Y.) 315, the plaintiff alleged that the injury to his property was occasioned by the neglect of the defendant to construct "cattle guards," and the proof was that it was due to the omission to build "fences." This was considered a failure of proof.

In Miller v. Kendig, 55 Iowa 177, it was said, by way of illustration, that if one should sue for goods sold at an alleged contract price, and the evidence should show that the contract price was less than alleged, and a verdict should be rendered accordingly, there would evidently not be such failure of proof as would justify setting aside the verdict. The claim would not be unproved in its general meaning—the

The most familiar applications of the rule first stated above, in regard to failure of proof, are that if the complaint alleges a cause of action ex delicto, and the proof establishes a breach of contract, express or implied,¹ or if a cause of action ex contractu be alleged, and one ex delicto be proved,² no recovery can be had, and the action must be dismissed. And on a complaint demanding only equitable relief, there can be no recovery as for a conversion.³ Where, however, the averments of the petition are sufficiently sustained by the evidence, if a cause of action ex contractu be otherwise set forth, it is not enough to authorize a nonsuit that the petition contains an averment suited to an action ex delicto.⁴

claim in its general meaning being for the price of the goods sold.

4. Veeder v. Cooley, 2 Hun (N. Y.) 74.

5. In Beck v. Ferrara, 19 Mo. 30, the petition stated that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff for stall No. 20 in the North Market, which was purchased by the plaintiff from a third party for the defendant, at his special instance and request. The proof was that the plaintiff bought the stall for himself and subsequently sold it to the defendant. This was held to be a failure of proof.

Where the petition alleged that the defendant, by means of fraud, obtained the goods of the plaintiff and converted them to his own use, and the only evidence in support of the allegation showed the defendant to be a bona fide purchaser from one in possession of the goods, but without title, there was held to be a failure of proof. Dean v. Yates, 22 Ohio St. 388.

In People v. Cushman, 1 Hun (N. Y.) 73, in proceedings instituted by the respondent, under the Landlord and Tenant Act, to have the relator removed from a certain portion of a pier in New York, described in the complaint by metes and bounds, and at the trial there was no proof of any lease of the particular premises described, this was held to be a fatal variance.

Averment of Ownership in Fee—Proof of Equitable Ownership.—Where the petition avers that the plaintiffs are the owners in fee of the land, and the proof is that they are the equitable owners, and, as such, have the right to have the deed from the trustees set aside, for a failure to comply with the conditions of the power, there is a failure of proof. Rowe v. Beckett, 30 Ind. 161; 95 Am. Dec. 676.

In Christian College v. Hendley, 49 Cal. 347, there was an allegation of a promise to pay money to a corporation, and the promise proved was made to a committee to be thereafter selected by a church. This was held to be a failure of proof.

Where the complaint seeks to set aside conveyances and other instruments affecting real property, on the ground of fraud, and the proof is that they constitute a mortgage from which the plaintiff has the right to redeem, there is a failure of proof. Patterson v. Patterson, 1 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 262.

Where the plaintiff declared upon a note made by one McKinley and one Campbell, and the note given in evidence was signed by H. C. McKinley

In Smith v. McGregor, 96 N. Car. 101, the answer alleged as a counterclaim, that the note sued on was indorsed to the plaintiff after maturity, and that the indorser was indebted to the defendant, before the transfer of the note, for money paid by him as surety, and the evidence offered to support it was of a joint and several note executed by the defendant and another party who, it was alleged, was the agent of the indorser of the plaintiff, but nothing in the note offered in evidence showed any agency. It was held that this was a failure of proof, and the court below properly charged the jury that there was no evidence to support the allegation of the counterclaim.

If the alleged cause of action is for services for having found a purchaser who agreed to buy the defendant's land at a certain price, evidence that the plaintiff found a party who would agree to purchase if the defendant would first take a lease for three years and give security for the rent, and that the defendant did not take the lease, but merely agreed to do so, and give security, and that the purchaser did not accept such agreement, does not show that the plaintiff found a purchaser who agreed to buy at any price, and there is a failure of proof. Masten v. Griffing, 33 Cal. 111.

In Cowles v. Warner, 22 Minn. 449, the complaint disclosed a contract terminable at the pleasure of either party. On the trial, the contract proved by the plaintiff was one that, by its terms, was to continue in force for a period of time longer than one year from the making thereof. There was held to be a fatal variance.

Under a complaint for money loaned, it is not competent for the plaintiff to prove a cause of action for money paid out for the defendant, under such circumstances as do not constitute a loan. Cummings v. Long, 25 Minn. 337.

Other Instances of Failure of Proof.—For other illustrations of failure of proof see the following cases: Batterson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 49 Mich. 184; Jones v. Kemp, 49 Mich. 9; Marsh v. Wade, 1 Wash. 538; Faulkner v. Faulkner, 73 Mo. 327; *Lawrence v. As the practice allows a variance between the proof and pleadings to be cured by amending the latter when the opposite party is not misled, if, in an action on a policy of insurance, evidence is offered without objection, establishing or intending to establish a defense under the policy which has not been properly pleaded, and on the defendant's request for instructions founded on that evidence, no objection is made that the defense was not within the issues, it is competent for the defendant to rely upon the defense after the opportunity for amending the pleadings has passed. Liverpool, etc., Ins. Co. v. Gunther, 116 U. S. 113. See also Williams v. Mechanics, etc., F. Ins. Co., 54 N. Y. 577; Williams v. Peoples' F. Ins. Co., 57 N. Y. 274.

1. Objection Cannot Be Taken on Motion for New Trial.—Bell v. Knowles, 45 Cal. 193. In Giffert v. West, 33 Wis. 617, objection was not taken to the variance until after verdict, and a motion for a new trial was denied, when it was taken on a motion in arrest of judgment. This was held to be too late to be available.

2. Burglary.—A structure above ground, arranged and intended for the interment of the dead, built of granite and called a vault, was held not to be a building, within a statute against burglary, in People v. Richards, 108 N. Y. 137. The court said: "Taking the law in regard to burglary, from the earliest period of the common law where that crime is referred to, down to the present time, we feel quite confident that not one case can be found where breaking and entering such a structure as the one in question has been held to come within that crime. We simply intend to decide this case and no other; and when we come to examine the indictment, and the proof giving a description of the structure, we come to the belief that it is really nothing more than a grave above ground. The witness speaks of these various compartments as graves. They are intended solely for the interment of dead bodies, and the structure itself can be put to no other possible use without altering its nature and purpose. The small room, as it is termed, in the front portion of the structure, between the outside wall and the place for the deposit of the coffins, is used for nothing. No services of a religious nature could be carried on there, and language could not be tortured into calling that place a church, or a place for religious worship. If instead of being placed above ground, this structure had been placed in a foundation deep enough to receive it, and then used for the purpose of burying the dead, and that only, could there be any question that it was not the subject of burglary, even although sufficient of the structure were above ground to enable one to reach it through a door and steps? We think not; and we do not think it becomes a building within the statute in regard to burglary, any more because it is placed above the ground when its sole purpose is that it shall be used as furnishing graves for the burial of the dead."

3. Revenue Law.—"Beans" have been held to fall within the term vegetables. Salomon v. Robertson, 41 Fed. Rep. 519. In this case the court said: "Looking further along in the act, we find the word 'vegetables,' and these articles, when they are used as food by man or by beast, would be referred to in everyday speech as 'vegetables.' There are, then, two words in the act which, when interpreted according to their common everyday use, are each of them sufficiently broad to cover the particular article here. The next question is whether the everyday use of the term has been modified by any commercial usage. The proof here, even on the part of the plaintiffs, is—I refer particularly to the testimony of Messrs. Wakeman & Ahles—that there is no difference between the commercial and the ordinary meaning of the words 'seeds' and 'vegetables.' A seed is a seed, and a vegetable is a vegetable, say the witnesses, whether in commercial language or in everyday life. Now the supreme court have held, over and over again, that where words are not used technically, or have not been wrenched from their ordinary meaning by commercial usage, their interpretation is for the court. That same tribunal has, moreover, in this very case, interpreted both those terms, 'seeds' and 'vegetables.' Robertson v. Salomon, 130 U. S. 412. As there are two words in the tariff act, each broad enough to cover the article, it only remains to determine under which it shall be classified for duty, whether as a seed or as a vegetable. Turning to the decision of the supreme court, I cannot escape the conviction that whatever the phraseology of the statute may now be, or whatever it may have been before the amendment of 1883, it was the clear understanding of the supreme court that such determination must be according to the use of the article. This seems to be quite sharply indicated by the phraseology of the opinion. Thus in one place it is said that 'as an article of food on our tables . . . they are used as a vegetable.' Elsewhere in the opinion it is held error in the circuit court not to allow the defendant to prove 'the designation of beans as an article of food,' the supreme court saying that 'the common designation, as used in everyday life, when beans are used as food (which is the great purpose of their production), would have been very proper.' Why it would have been proper to introduce testimony as to how the beans were called when they were used as food, I fail to see, unless it was on the principle that the use of the article was to determine its classification. The use of an article is a question of fact, and I should send this case to the jury, were it not for the testimony of the plaintiff, which is that, as to this particular importation, the affidavit which he made upon the back of the entry is a true statement; that affidavit stating that the beans are to be used exclusively as food. For that reason I shall direct a verdict for the defendant." To the same effect is Windmuller v. Robertson, 23 Blatchf. (U. S.) 233.

1. A bicycle is a vehicle, and is entitled to the rights of the road equally with a carriage or other vehicle. Holland v. Bartch, 120 Ind. 46; 16 Am. St. Rep. 307. In this case the court, by Olds, J., said: "In the case of Mercer v. Corbin, 117 Ind. 450; 10 Am. St. Rep. 76, it is held that a bicycle is a vehicle, and is entitled to the rights of the road, and has no lawful right to the use of the sidewalk. In the case of State v. Collins, 16 R. I. 371, decided by the supreme court of Rhode Island, the court says: 'The question raised by the exceptions is whether a bicycle is a carriage or vehicle, within the meaning of Rhode Island Pub. Stat., ch. 66, § 1, which enacts that 'every person traveling with any carriage or other vehicle, who shall meet any other person so traveling on any highway or bridge, shall seasonably drive his carriage or vehicle to the right of the center of the traveled part of the road, so as to enable such person to pass with his carriage or vehicle without interference or interruption.' We are of the opinion that it is a carriage or vehicle which carries a person mounted upon it, and which is propelled and driven by him. The word 'vehicle' is certainly broad enough to include any machine which is used and driven on the traveled part of the highway, for the purpose of conveyance upon the highway. The purpose of the section is to prevent accident or collision, and such accident or collision may happen from a bicycle and other carriage meeting 'unless the rule laid down in the section is observed.' In the case of Taylor v. Goodwin, 4 Q. B. Div. 228; 27 W. R. 489, a bicycle was held to be a carriage. Although but few courts have passed upon and defined the rights of persons riding upon and propelling or driving bicycles, yet such as have, unanimously place them upon an equality and governed by the same rule as persons riding or driving any other vehicle or carriage, and we think this is the proper rule to adopt. Although the use of the bicycle, for the purpose of locomotion and travel, is quite modern, yet it is a vehicle of great convenience, and its use is becoming quite common; while traveling upon the highways by means of horses has been in vogue much longer, and is more universal at present than by means of bicycles, yet persons traveling by means of horses have no superior rights to those traveling upon the highway by improved methods of travel, which are adapted to and consistent with the proper use of the highway."

Dray.—A city ordinance taxing "every owner of a wagon or other vehicle, kept or used for free delivery of goods to customers or others in the city," imposes the tax on drays belonging to an iron works situated outside of the city limits, but used for the delivery of their wares within the city. Memphis v. Battaille, 8 Heisk. (Tenn.) 537. Here the court said: "We are next to consider whether the words 'other vehicles,' used in the ordinance, include the vehicle commonly called a dray. It seems to us that the common sense of the proposition must be the law of it, and, without further discussion, we hold that a dray, being a vehicle other than the vehicle named in the ordinance, is necessarily embraced within its provisions and meaning, and that there is nothing in the section in question, or in the phraseology of the other sections referred to, which forbids this reasonable and material construction of unambiguous words."

Street Sprinkler—Public Vehicle.—A city ordinance imposed a license tax on all "public vehicles using the streets of the city for trade or traffic or other purposes." One A was engaged in the business of sprinkling the streets with water, for compensation paid by the owners of property fronting on the streets, and for this purpose used tanks which were mounted on wheels and driven through the streets, and were known as sprinkling carts. It was held that these carts were "public vehicles" within the meaning of the ordinance, and as such were subject to taxation. St. Louis v. Woodruff, 71 Mo. 93. The court, in this case, said: "Was the sprinkling cart a public vehicle which was used by defendant for trade or traffic? It was not owned by the public, nor are the vehicles of any class named in the ordinance so owned. They are all private property used in public employments, and this is what is meant in the ordinance by 'public vehicles using the streets of the city for trade or traffic,' etc. The sprinkling cart was not used exclusively for the purpose of hauling and sprinkling water upon the street in front of the premises of its owner, but to haul and sprinkle water on the streets for other persons who would employ and pay them for it, and was as much a public vehicle as omnibuses and hackney carriages used in the city in the business of transporting persons for pay. The one is equally with the other, a public business."

Ferryboat.—A ferryboat was held not to be a vehicle within the meaning of a statute empowering a municipality to levy a tax on "vehicles." Duckwall v. New Albany, 25 Ind. 286. The court said, in this case: "Webster states that the word vehicle is rarely applied to water craft, and our statute requires us to give the word, as used in the act, its 'ordinary and usual sense.' A former section refers also to the same objects, describing them as 'vehicles for the transportation of passengers, freight, or other articles, to or from points within the city, for hire or pay.'"

Street Car.—A statute declared that carriages, wagons, and other wheeled vehicles, should be subject to toll. It was held that "other wheeled vehicles" did not include street cars. Monongahela Bridge Co. v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., 114 Pa. St. 484. The court said, in this case: "It is contended, however, that the phrase, 'or other wheeled vehicles of whatever description,' used in the act of 1871, is broad enough to embrace street cars, and that the company has a right to charge tolls upon them accordingly. It is a conceded fact that, in 1871, street cars in the cities of the commonwealth were a well-known instrument of conveyance; for twelve years and upwards they had been extensively used for passenger travel over the Monongahela bridge, and, if the framers of the act of 1871 intended to embrace them within its provisions, it is very remarkable indeed that they were not specifically mentioned. A street car certainly is a wheeled vehicle in the general sense of that term; it is a vehicle in the same sense that an ordinary railroad car is a vehicle, but both are vehicles of a somewhat extraordinary character, in this respect, that they can only be used as a means of conveyance or transportation upon a permanent, continuous, and connected track. To pass the railway company's cars over this bridge, their railway track must be permanently laid upon it, so as to connect with their tracks at either end. In other words, the bridge must form part or parcel of the route of the railway. The vehicles which are specified in the act of 1871, 'carriages, wagons, buggies, sleighs and sleds,' are all of that class which requires no such special appliance to promote their passage, and it is reasonable to suppose that the general phrase, 'other wheeled vehicles of whatever description,' used in immediate connection therewith, may refer to vehicles of the same general class or kind as those particularly specified. In view, then, of the fact that special provision had already been made in the act of 1859, for the regulation of the rate of tolls which the railway company should pay for the passage of their street cars over the Monongahela bridge; that the railway company for twelve years and upwards had occupied the bridge with their track, and had paid, and the bridge company had received, tolls according to rates from time to time amicably agreed upon, in apparent conformity to the provisions of that act; that notwithstanding the extraordinary character of street cars as a means of conveyance, and of the unusual appliances required in order to facilitate their passage over the bridge, no particular reference was made to them in the designation of the tolls which might be charged under the act of 1871. We are of the opinion that it was not the legislative intention to embrace the railway company's cars in the provision of that act, and that the general designation 'other wheeled vehicles of whatever description,' must be restrained to the same kind or general class of vehicles with those particularized."

VEIN—(See also MINES AND MINING CLAIMS, vol. 15, p. 501).

1. Vein Matter.—In Bullion Min. Co. v. Croesus Gold, etc., Min. Co., 2 Nev. 687; 90 Am. Dec. 526, Beatty, J., said: "Vein matter may certainly be removed from between its original walls either by artificial or natural means, and after such removal it does not cease to be vein matter. When we say that certain substances are vein matter, we may mean that those substances are now a component part of some mineral vein, or that at some past time they did constitute a part of the substance of some vein. It is well known that what miners call vein matter frequently rolls down a mountain side to a great distance from its original location in the vein, and by the action of water it is carried to still greater distances."

2. In a declaration for infringing a patent which granted that the plaintiff, and no others, should "make, use, exercise, and vend" his invention, and forbade all persons to "make, use, or put in practice" the same, or counterfeit or imitate it, without the plaintiff's license, the plaintiff alleged that the defendant, without his license, exposed to sale articles intended to imitate his invention. It was held, on general demurrer, that the count was bad, as not stating anything which was necessarily an infringement of the patent. Minter v. Williams, 4 Ad. & El. 251; 31 E. C. L. 63. Here the court, by Coleridge, J., said: "The granting part of the patent authorizes the plaintiff exclusively to 'make, use, exercise, and vend' his invention. The prohibitory part forbids all persons to 'make, use, or put in practice the said invention,' or 'counterfeit, imitate, or resemble the same,' or to make any addition thereunto, or subtraction from the same, whereby to pretend himself or themselves the inventor or inventors, without license from the plaintiff. Then the count alleges that the defendant, without the plaintiff's license, exposed to sale divers chairs intended to imitate and resemble his invention. Do those words necessarily import the vending spoken of in the granting part of the patent? I certainly think not; because, even assuming that to vend may mean both a selling and an exposing to sale (though I rather think that it means the habit of selling and offering for sale), still those two meanings are not co-extensive, the former may include the latter, but a mere exposure to sell, i. e., with intent to sell, or for the purpose of selling, is not only not equivalent to a sale, but, as regards the patentee, may be attended with wholly different consequences. If we read the word 'vend' as expressly inserted in

VENDITIONI EXPONAS.—A judicial writ directed to the sheriff, commanding him to sell goods which he has taken into his hands by virtue of a former writ (but to which writ he had returned that he had taken the goods, but that they remained in his hands for want of buyers), in order to satisfy judgment against the defendant.¹

the prohibitory part of the patent, we ought only to give it there the meaning which would effectuate the purpose of the patent, the prevention of acts injurious to the patentee, with as little restraint on the public as possible. It must be taken here that the defendant has only exposed to sale; that whatever may have been his original purpose in so doing, or whatever motive has supervened, he has abstained from selling. Now, I cannot say that such a mere exposure to sale is necessarily injurious to the patentee; it may on the contrary be very beneficial; it is not, therefore, necessarily the vending which is exclusively granted to him."

1. 1 Chitty's Practice 678; Reg. Jud. 33.

A writ of venditioni exponas is a writ of execution, and confers upon the officer authority to sell, pursuant to the levy, advertisement, and command of the writ, without re-advertising the property. Young v. Smith, 23 Tex. 598; 76 Am. Dec. 81.

In Frisch v. Miller, 5 Pa. St. 315, the court, by Coulter, J., said: "The peculiar office of a venditioni exponas, as it regards personal property, is to enforce the sheriff to sell when he has returned a levy unsold for want of buyers, and to bring him into contempt for not selling; 2 Saund. 71b, n.; 11 S. & R. (Pa.) 304; and when it is supposed the property returned levied will not satisfy the debt, the plaintiff may have a clause of fi. fa. added, to justify the levy and sale of property beyond what is described in the venditioni exponas."

In Clark v. Sawyer, 48 Cal. 138, Rhodes, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The authorities make a distinction between cases where the venditioni is issued for the sale of personal property, and where it is issued for the sale of land. In cases of the former class, the venditioni must go to the officer who made the seizure; for by the seizure he acquired a special property in the chattels, and a right to their possession, by virtue of which, it is said, he might sell them without any new command, after the return of the writ, and even after his term of office had expired. (Tarkinton v. Alexander, 2 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 87; Rogers v. Darnoby, 4 B. Mon. (Ky.) 238.) In England, the venditioni goes only for the sale of personal property, and consequently the authorities there are all of this class. But when an execution is levied on land, the officer making the levy acquires no interest in the land, and is not entitled to its possession. The levy creates a lien only, which may be enforced by a sale, but until sale and deed, the title and right of possession remain in the execution debtor. When a venditioni exponas is issued for the enforcement of this lien, no reason is perceived why it must necessarily be executed by the sheriff who made the levy, and who has gone out of office, and not by his successor. It is accordingly held by some of the American authorities that the venditioni must be executed by the new sheriff, (Bank of Tennessee v. Beatty, 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 305; Lesley v. Gardner, 3 W. & S. (Pa.) 314); and by others, that it may be executed by either the old or new sheriff. (Holmes v. McIndor, 20 Wis. 657; Sumner v. Moore, 2 McLean (U. S.) 59; Tarkinton v. Alexander, 2 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 87.)"

In Leavitt v. Smith, 7 Ala. 175, it was held that a sheriff who has begun to do execution, should proceed therein, and having levied it, the common law requires that he should sell the goods, even after the return day, although he may have been superseded by his successor; and he is not excused for a non-performance of his duty by delivering the execution and goods to his successor, but he must sell them, or otherwise legally dispose of them. If, by statute, a venditioni exponas is made necessary to sell the goods after the return day of the fi. fa., he should at least accept it, when it is tendered him by the sheriff.

The intention of the Missouri execution law of 1855, and that of 1865 (§§ 59, 63), was to require executions not completely executed to be handed over to, and completed by, the sheriff in office at the time of the sales. Kane v. McCoan, 55 Mo. 181.

I. THE SUBJECT GENERALLY; ITS SCOPE AND DEFINITIONS.—While a vendor is strictly any person by whom a sale is made,¹ and a purchaser anyone who acquires property for a consideration,² whether the subject-matter of the contract be real or personal, the words are often used in a more restricted sense, and the subject of "Vendor and Purchaser" is made the complement of that of "Sales." The former is made to embrace contracts relating to real property and the latter to embrace those having to do with personal property exclusively.³ This is the usual division of the text-books, and is the one to be here followed. We may accordingly define a vendor as one who sells, and a purchaser as one who buys, real property.¹

II. THE SUBJECT-MATTER.—The law of vendor and purchaser has to do with the transfer of estates in real property. The consideration of the thing sold naturally subdivides itself into three heads; the property, the estate, and the title of the vendor.

1. The Property.—Real property includes land, tenements, and hereditaments.²

The great majority of questions occurring in the law of vendor and purchaser arise under contracts for the transfer of land.³

2. The Estate.—The estate to be conveyed is always an essential part of a contract to sell land. If a certain estate be expressly named, the words of the contract will, of course, prevail; but if none be mentioned, the person contracting to sell may be

1. The subject of Vendor and Purchaser is in one way broader than that of Sales, which includes only contracts founded on money considerations. SALES, vol. 21, p. 446.

As used in the books, the terms vendor and purchaser are applied to persons who take title under a contract supported by any valuable consideration. Goward v. Waters, 98 Mass. 596.

A purchaser, in the sense in which the word is here used, is not to be confused, however, with one who takes by purchase, as the latter word is employed in conveyancing; i. e., as comprising all modes of acquiring real property other than by descent. 2 Bl. Com. 241.

2. See REAL PROPERTY, vol. 19, p. 1029.

3. For the significance of the term land, and an enumeration of the different species of property embraced in its meaning, see CEMETERIES, vol. 3, p. 49; CROPS, vol. 4, p. 887; FIXTURES, vol. 8, pp. 41, 55; FRAUDS (STATUTE OF), vol. 8, p. 657; ICE AND ICE COMPANIES, vol. 9, p. 852; LAND, vol. 12, p. 655; LOGS AND LUMBER, vol. 13, p. 1020; MANURE, vol. 14, p. 315; MINES AND MINING CLAIMS, vol. 15, pp. 508, 578; NATURAL GAS, vol. 16, p. 221; PEWS, vol. 18, p. 413; REAL PROPERTY, vol. 19, p. 1032; TREES, vol. 26, p. 557.

Water.—As land includes everything above and below the surface of the earth, it embraces water upon the earth. The right of the land-owner to it is "identified with the realty, and is a real or corporeal hereditament, and not an easement." Cary v. Daniels, 5 Met. (Mass.) 236.

On account of its peculiar nature, however, it cannot be entirely appropriated, if running in a defined channel, but only a reasonable use may be made of it. The title may be in the land owner, but it is held subject to the rights of others. Ulbricht v. Eufaula Water Co., 86 Ala. 587; 11 Am. St. Rep. 72; Wadsworth v. Tillotson, 15 Conn. 373; 39 Am. Dec. 391; Kennedy, etc., v. Union Mfg. Co., 39 Conn. 576. In the case of percolating or standing water, there are no such rights, and the title of the owner is absolute. Hanson v. McCue, 42 Cal. 303; Wilson v. New Bedford, 108 Mass. 261; 11 Am. Rep. 352. Water upon an owner's land may be disposed of, not only as an incident to the land, but independent of the soil upon which it stands, or over which it flows. Avon Mfg. Co. v. Andrews, 30 Conn. 476; Bullen v. Runnels, 2 N. H. 255; 9 Am. Dec. 55. See also LAKES AND PONDS, vol. 12, p. 610; WATER AND WATERCOURSES.

Oil.—Oil, when in the earth, is governed by the same rules of property as water. Dark v. Johnston, 55 Pa. St. 164; 93 Am. Dec. 732.

Timber.—Standing timber is an interest in land that may be acquired by deed, and the fact that it must be removed within a definite period does not prevent the title to the timber from vesting in the grantee. Mee v. Benedict (Mich. 1893), 57 N. W. Rep. 175.

compelled to convey the fee.¹ In any event, he must convey all the estate that he has, unless the contract provides otherwise.²

Most of the estates known to the law are assignable, and may be the subject of a contract to sell.³

If the vendor does not own the estate which he undertakes to sell, he can pass no title, and but merely subjects himself to a suit for damages.⁴ As, in such case, it would not be in his power to comply with the order of the court, a decree of specific performance will not be granted to his vendee.⁵

3. The Title—(See also SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE, vol. 22, p. 908; TITLE (REAL PROPERTY), vol. 26, p. 20)—a. IN ABSENCE OF EXPRESS STIPULATIONS.—The title to an estate is the means whereby it is acquired.⁶ While the subject of a sale of land is the estate, that estate always implies a title, and the question under discussion is in every case an important one. If nothing is said about the title, the law raises, from the fact that one assumes to sell, an implied promise to give a good title to the vendee—one that will assure him of the quiet and peaceable enjoyment of the property sold.⁷ Such a title is denominated a "marketable

There is an implied undertaking on the part of the vendor in every executory contract for the sale of lands, to make a good title, unless such an obligation is expressly excluded by the terms of the agreement, and such implied warranty exists so long as the contract remains executory. Burwell v. Jackson, 9 N. Y. 535.

The vendee has the right to have conveyed to him an indubitable title, Swayney v. Lyon, 67 Pa. St. 436, and a court will not decree specific performance of a contract when the agreement is for a good title, and all reasonable doubt as to the title is not removed. Hymers v. Branch, 6 Mo. App. 511.

But the right to demand a good title exists in the purchaser, only so long as the contract remains executory. When the conveyance has been duly executed by all necessary parties, he must look to his covenants only. Cul-lum v. Branch Bank, 4 Ala. 29; 37 Am. Dec. 725; Hunter v. O'Neil, 12 Ala. 37; Thompson v. Christian, 28 Ala. 399; Peay v. Wright, 22 Ark. 198; Brown v. Manning, 3 Minn. 35; Walsh v. Hall, 66 N. Car. 233. But it devolves upon the vendee, if he questions the title, to show the defect. Allen v. Atkinson, 21 Mich. 351.

title."¹ The parties to the contract may stipulate for other than such a title, but, in the absence of an agreement, the law always presumes it as a part of the contract, and the purchaser can be compelled to accept no other.²

In order to be marketable, a title must either be free from incumbrances, or subject to such only as are easily removed.³

Where a contract for the sale of property provided that it should "be free from all liens and incumbrances," and that the "land money" should "be refunded if title should not prove good on examination of records or cannot be made good," it was held equivalent to a covenant to convey a marketable title. Herman v. Somers, 158 Pa. St. 424.

1. As to a marketable title, see MARKETABLE TITLE, vol. 14, p. 458; SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE, vol. 22, p. 948.

Where a contract provided that the title should be "first class," it was held to mean simply that it should be marketable. Vought v. Williams, 120 N. Y. 253; 17 Am. St. Rep. 634.

The title of a bona fide purchaser, or those claiming under him, is not rendered unmarketable by a prior deed from his grantor to a third person, of which he did not have notice, and which was not recorded until after the record of his deed. Abraham v. Mayer (City Ct.), 27 N. Y. Supp. 264.

Where, under a devise to A, B, and C, and if any of them should die leaving no lawful issue, then to the survivors, A and B conveyed and released the real estate so devised to C, by deed with full covenants, including a general warranty, C has a good and indefeasible title thereto, and a contract for the purchase of such real estate will be enforced. Vreeland v. Blauvelt, 23 N. J. Eq. 483.

In equity, a marketable title is one in which there is no doubt involved, either as to law or fact. Herman v. Somers, 158 Pa. St. 424.

Title by adverse possession for forty years is a marketable title. Tewksbury v. Howard (Ind. 1894), 37 N. E. Rep. 355. And see Waddell v. Latham (Miss. 1894), 15 So. Rep. 32. But where the wall of a building which defendant had agreed to sell to plaintiff encroached about two inches on the adjoining lot, and the deed tendered plaintiff did not convey these two inches, and defendant did not have title thereto at the time, the title tendered to plaintiff is not marketable. Arnstein v. Burroughs (Supreme Ct.), 27 N. Y. Supp. 958.

An agreement to sell land and execute a good and sufficient deed, is not satisfied by the tender of a deed sufficient in form, the vendor having no title. Haynes v. White, 55 Cal. 38. To the same effect are: Brown v. Gammon, 14 Me. 276; Mead v. Fox, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 199; Porter v. Noyes, 2 Me. 22; 11 Am. Dec. 30; Greenwood v. Ligon, 10 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 615; 48 Am. Getty*, 57 Pa. St. 266; Jones v. Huff, 36 Tex. 678.

It would be against good conscience to force a title not marketable on a purchaser, although his contract may seem to contemplate it. Freetly v. Barnhart, 51 Pa. St. 279.

The vendor must show, when the vendee relies upon defect of title, that the vendee purchased at his own risk. Littlefield v. Tinsley, 26 Tex. 353.

Where a contract makes prompt payment of instalments material, a vendee who has been repeatedly delinquent and has made payments knowing that the vendor does not hold the legal title, but that the holder of such title is out of the state, cannot, when the last payment is due, at once tender it, and demand a deed without giving the vendor a reasonable time to get title. Distler v. Dabney (Wash. 1893), 35 Pac. Rep. 138.

3. Chambers v. Tulane, 9 N. J. Eq. 146; Sibley v. Spring, 12 Me. 460; 28 Am. Dec. 191; Roberts v. Bassett, 105 Mass. 409; Murphin v. Scovell, 41 Minn. 262. And see Skinner v. Christie (N. J. 1894), 29 Atl. Rep. 772.

It must be free from all claims of dower, inchoate or consummate. If the wife of the vendor refuses to release her rights, the purchaser may elect either to take a deed executed by the vendor alone, and bring his action for a breach of covenant, or to accept such deed as part performance, and retain so much of the purchase-money as shall be proportionate to the wife's contingent interest.¹ The title must not only be more than a mere litigious right, but must be not likely to lead its possessor into a lawsuit.²

The estate must be free from easements. Prichard v. Atkinson, 3 N. H. 335; Wheeler v. Tracy, 49 N. Y. Super. Ct. 208.

A mortgage dating back fifty years, and given to secure a life annuity to a person long since deceased, is not such an incumbrance as will justify a vendee in refusing to accept a conveyance. Morgan v. Scott, 26 Pa. St. 51. Neither is a mortgage under which the mortgagee has no right of possession until foreclosure, which, though paid, has not been discharged of record. Curran v. Rogers, 35 Mich. 221.

It is no defense to an action to recover an installment due from a vendee in a contract for the purchase of land, that the land is incumbered, if such incumbrance can be removed by the vendor before the time fixed for the execution of the deed. Duluth Loan, etc., Co. v. Kloovdahl (Minn. 1893), 56 N. W. Rep. 1119.

But a purchaser may refuse to take title and may recover money paid by him where there is of record an unsatisfied mortgage on the premises, though the mortgage has been paid and a satisfaction piece executed by the mortgagee, as the purchaser is entitled to a clear record title. Zorn v. McParland (Super. Ct.), 28 N. Y. Supp. 485.

In Davis v. Parker, 14 Allen (Mass.) 104, the court by Chapman, J., said: "The general rule, as stated in Hill v. Buckley, 17 Ves. 394, is that the purchaser shall have what the vendor can give; with an abatement out of the purchase-money for so much as the quantity falls short of the representation. The principle applies to an incumbrance of any amount. The amount to be deducted is the value of the wife's right at the time of the conveyance, and not the difference between the market value of the whole land with her release, and the value without it. The rule should be the same as if the conveyance had been made with a warranty against the right of dower, and the existence of the right had afterwards been discovered and an action had been brought to recover damages for a breach of the contract."

In Wright v. Young, 6 Wis. 132; 70 Am. Dec. 453, the court, by Cole, J., said: "There can be no doubt but the title of the vendee is defective while the inchoate right of dower is left outstanding. If the wife should survive the husband, the vendee's title might be partially defeated by her taking a life estate in one-third of the premises." But see Powell v. Monson, 3 Mass. (U. S.) 355; Bostwick v. Williams, 36 Ill. 65. The rule is the same where the vendor expressly agrees to convey free of dower. Leach v. Forney, 21 Iowa 271; 89 Am. Dec. 574; Presser v. Hildenbrand, 23 Iowa 483; Park v. Johnston, 4 Allen (Mass.) 259; Park v. Johnston, 7 Allen (Mass.) 378. If the wife is before the court, she may be compelled to join in the deed. Matter of Hunter, 1 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 1. Where the contingent right to dower of the wife of a vendor of land, under articles for a deed clear of incumbrances, is known to the vendee, and the latter covenants to pay her for signing the deed, he does not thereby take the risk of her not signing on himself; nor will it excuse the vendor, so far as the vendee's right of action is concerned, that he offered to comply with his covenant, and to make such title as he was able to make without his wife's consent. Bitner v. Brough, 11 Pa. St. 127.

2. Dobbs v. Norcross, 24 N. J. Eq. 327; Speakman v. Forepaugh, 44 Pa. St. 363; Shriver v. Shriver, 86 N. Y. 575; Richmond v. Gray, 3 Allen

The title must be free from reasonable doubt,¹ but the doubt (Mass.) 25; Jeffries v. Jeffries, 117 Mass. 184; Luckett v. Williamson, 31 Mo. 54.

A title exposing the party holding it to litigation is not marketable. Swayne v. Lyon, 67 Pa. St. 436.

Every purchaser of land has a right to demand a title which shall put him in all reasonable security against loss or annoyance by litigation. He should have a title which will enable him not only to hold his land, but to hold it in peace, and if he wishes to sell it, to be reasonably sure that no flaw will come up to disturb its market value. Close v. Stuyvesant, 132 Ill. 607.

But the mere fact that there is pending, between two outside parties, a litigation over the land which does not affect the vendor's title, is immaterial. Curran v. Rogers, 35 Mich. 221.

A purchaser cannot be required to accept a conveyance, where, because of a mistake in the description of the land in a former conveyance through which the vendor holds, the title as to a part is so doubtful that it may expose the vendee to litigation on the part of a third person, or where, for such reason the title is not marketable. Smith v. Turner, 50 Ind. 367.

Where the vendor's title to a lot was by purchase at a sheriff's sale, as the property of one who had two years before sold it to another, but the deed had not been recorded until after the sale, on a bill for specific performance to compel a vendee under articles to comply, it was held that as the vendee was liable to contest the unrecorded and outstanding title, he could not be compelled, in equity, to take the property. Speakman v. Forepaugh, 44 Pa. St. 363.

1. Swain v. Fidelity Ins., etc., Co., 54 Pa. St. 455; Adams v. Valentine, 33 Fed. Rep. 1; Fleming v. Burnham, 100 N. Y. 1.

A marketable title is one free from reasonable doubt. Such doubt exists when there is uncertainty as to some fact, appearing in the course of its deduction, which affects the value of the land or will interfere with its sale. Vought v. Williams, 120 N. Y. 253; 17 Am. St. Rep. 634. And though the court may entertain a favorable opinion of the title, yet, if that opinion may be fairly questioned by competent persons, it will not decree specific performance. Hymers v. Branch, 6 Mo. App. 511; Vreeland v. Blauvelt, 23 N. J. Eq. 483.

It seems that a rational doubt exists when a court of law does not feel called upon to instruct a jury to find the existence of the fact on which the vendor's title depends. Shriver v. Shriver, 86 N. Y. 575.

A purchaser who has bargained for a good title, will not be compelled to take one which is subject to suspicion. It must be free from reasonable doubt—a title to which no reasonable man would object—one which a prudent man would not hesitate to purchase at a full market price. It is not sufficient that the title is probably good, but it must be one which the purchaser must feel a reasonable certainty that it is so. Brown v. Cannon, 10 Ill. 174.

The vendee may require not merely a title valid in fact, but a marketable one, such as can again be sold or mortgaged to a reasonable purchaser or mortgagee; a reasonable doubt as to the title proffered is sufficient to authorize its rejection. Moore v. Williams, 115 N. Y. 586; 12 Am. St. Rep. 844.

Title by Adverse Possession.—Where a vendor has been in adverse possession for the time specified in the Statute of Limitations, his title is not so impeached as to prevent his maintaining a suit for specific performance, by slight proof that the former owner was an alien, nor by the mere contingency that such owner may have died leaving heirs disabled from asserting their rights. Seymour v. DeLancey, Hopk. Ch. (N. Y.) 436; 14 Am. Dec. 552.

A clear adverse possession for twenty years makes a title to lands which a purchaser, upon a partition sale, may not refuse; he will not, however, be required to take title where there are circumstances which may prevent the possession from being adverse. Such purchaser will not be compelled to complete the purchase where there is some reasonable ground of evidence shown in support of an objection to the title, or where the title depends upon a matter of fact which is not capable of satisfactory proof, or, if capable of that proof, yet is not proved. Shriver v. Shriver, 86 N. Y. 575.

If the validity of the plaintiff's title is dependent on the question whether he has had ten years adversary possesmust be more than a bare possibility;¹ it must be considerable, rational, and such as would induce a prudent man to pause and hesitate.² The purchaser will not be allowed to make a mere captious objection to the title,³ and defects in the record or paper title may be cured or removed by parol evidence.⁴

But the purchaser cannot insist on being discharged on the ground of defective title, if it is capable of being made good within a reasonable time, as to which the vendor will be put under terms.⁵

sion of land, he must, before he can enforce such contract, specifically establish, by a clear evidence, that he has had such adversary possession for ten years; and if he has declined to defend an action of ejectment brought by a stranger to test his title, this will be regarded as showing that his title is so doubtful that the court ought not to require it to be received as a good title by the other party. Boggs v. Bodkin, 32 W. Va. 566.

1. On this subject the court acts on moral certainty, and a purchaser will not be permitted to object to a title on account of a bare possibility. Laurens v. Lucas, 6 Rich. Eq. (S. Car.) 217; Webb v. Chisolm, 24 S. Car. 487; Thompson v. Dulles, 5 Rich. Eq. (S. Car.) 370.

The mere possibility that there may be litigation over the title, is not sufficient, but there must be a reasonable probability that there will be such litigation. And so, where, after plaintiff's intestate and his grantors had been in undisturbed possession for nearly forty years, under a deed with a defective description, he brought an action to correct the defect in his title arising from such error, and notice was served by publication, and the two years allowed by statute for a motion for a new trial had not expired, it was held that the possibility of the defendant applying for and obtaining a new trial was too remote to be considered. Stevenson v. Polk, 71 Iowa 278.

Where the existence of the alleged fact, which is claimed or supposed to constitute a defect in or cloud upon the title, is a mere possibility, or the alleged outstanding right is but a very improbable or remote contingency, the court may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, compel the purchaser to complete his purchase. Cambrelleng v. Purton, 125 N. Y. 610.

In 1863, J. S. died seised of land which he devised to his wife. The will was proved, but no executor or administrator appointed. The wife married again, and in 1869 died intestate, leaving as her only heirs her children of the former marriage. Their duly licensed guardian sold the land by public auction in October, 1870, payment to be made one-half in cash and the other half to remain secured by a mortgage on the land. The purchaser, on examining the title, objected that neither the estate of J. S., nor his wife's estate, had been administered upon, whereupon the guardian, in December, 1870, took letters of administration on the wife's estate, and in January, 1871, on the estate of J. S., and in February, 1871, tendered a deed of the land to the purchaser and demanded performance of his contract, which he refused. The guardian filed a bill in equity to enforce the contract against the purchaser, and it was held that the possibility of debts against the estate of J. S., or his wife's estate, in the absence of any affirmative evidence thereof, was not a cloud on the title, which should debar the plaintiff from a decree for specific performance, protecting the defendant by not requiring him to give a negotiable note for the one-half of the contract price which was to remain for a reasonable time secured by mortgage. Hayes v. Harmony Grove Cemetery, 108 Mass. 400.

They may either compel the production of a better title than the law would require, or arrange for a defective title, or merely express and emphasize what the law would otherwise have implied.¹

defective one, at the date of the contract, a court of equity will decree a specific performance if he is able to make a good title at any time before the decree is pronounced, or when the master makes his report upon the title, Hepburn v. Dunlop, 1 Wheat (U. S.) 179; Hepburn v. Auld, 5 Cranch (U. S.) 262; Lockett v. Williamson, 37 Mo. 388; Clute v. Robison, 2 Johns (N. Y.) 595; Pierce v. Nichols, 1 Paige Ch. (N. Y.) 77; 32 Am. Dec. 613. And though the vendor may perfect his title at any time before the decree, he must, in such case, pay costs. Lyles v. Kirkpatrick, 9 S. Car. 265.

It is sufficient if he is able to convey the property when, by the terms of the contract, or the equities of the case, he is required to do so in order to entitle himself to the consideration; and if time is not of the essence of the contract, nor made essential by an offer to fulfill by the purchaser and his request for a conveyance, the vendor will be allowed reasonable time and opportunity to obtain or perfect title. Dresel v. Jordan, 104 Mass. 407.

Where the vendor in such contract has no interest in the land which he agrees to convey, but enters into it as a mere speculation or venture, he is not deemed a bona fide contractor, and a court of equity will not lend him its aid in enforcing it. But if he has acquired an equitable title or interest in the land under an executory agreement, he may enter into another agreement for the sale thereof to a third party, without waiting until he has obtained a deed, and it will be sufficient if the sale is made in good faith, and the title is fully perfected by the time specified for the completion of the sale. Town- shend v. Goodfellow, 40 Minn. 312; 12 Am. St. Rep. 736.

Specific performance will be decreed if the vendor is able to make a good title before the decree is pronounced, except where the contract is made in bad faith by one who knows that he has no title nor the means of acquiring one. Moss v. Hanson, 17 Pa. St. 379.

It is only in the absence of fraud that the vendee will be required to accept an after-acquired title. Fraker v. Brazelton, 12 Lea (Tenn.) 278.

1. A good title is one good both in law and equity. Maberley v. Robins, 5 Taunt. 625. For the construction of the term "satisfactory title," see SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE, vol. 22, p. 956.

If the legal title to land is outstanding in a trustee who may be compelled to convey at any time, the title is not "good and marketable," within the meaning of a vendor's covenant to convey such a title. Murray v. Ellis, 112 Pa. St. 485. An agreement of the vendor to present to the purchaser, "a perfect chain of title to said property from the United States government," compels him to show all the successive links, each perfect in itself, which connect the claimant of the title with, and invest in him, the title of the government. It is not enough to produce evidence of color of title and possession, and payment of taxes thereunder, which, under the Statute of Limitations, would bar recovery by an adverse claimant. Payne v. Markle, 89 Ill. 66. One who has contracted that he will thereafter, on demand, convey property by good and sufficient deed in fee simple, is in default, if he fails to have a perfect title when demand is made. Gregory v. Christian, 42 Minn. 304; 18 Am. Dec. 507. A vendor who has agreed to convey land free from incumbrances, must, in order to satisfy the requirements of his contract, tender not only a deed made by himself, but also a release of dower duly executed by his wife. Heimburg v. Ismay, 35 N. Y. Super Ct. 35.

A covenant to convey land, "the title to be a good and sufficient deed," is a covenant to convey a good title

If the contract calls for a record title, a title by adverse possession will not suffice, no matter how strong such a title may be,¹ and if the vendee agrees to purchase subject to the approval of the title by his attorney, he cannot be compelled to complete the sale unless his attorney accepts the title offered.² But a contract for a title satisfactory to the party to whom it is to be given, means a title to which there is no reasonable objection, and with which the party to whom it is tendered ought to be satisfied.³

by deed. Brown v. Gammon, 14 Me. 276.

By undertaking to sell land described as patented to another, the vendor must be understood as contracting to convey the title of the patentee. Hays v. Bonner, 14 Tex. 629.

A vendor bound to convey a good legal title, cannot force the vendee to accept a mere equitable title to the land. Littlefield v. Tinsley, 26 Tex. 353.

A covenant to execute and deliver "a good and sufficient, full and general, warranty deed" for land, binds the vendor to make something more than a bare legal title. But a title which, though imperfect as a legal one, is perfected by surrounding equities so that the vendor's deed will convey a good and sufficient title in fee simple, is sufficient. Jones v. Huff, 36 Tex. 678.

A contract by the vendor to furnish an abstract of title "showing a good and clear title free from defects," is not performed if the abstract shows defects which may or may not exist in the title as tested, by the original records, and an incumbrance which may or may not be barred by limitation. Kane v. Rippey (Oregon, 1893), 33 Pac. Rep. 936.

"Lawful Title."—An obligation to make a "lawful title" to lands, binds the obligor for a perfect title, with a general warranty. A tender of a deed, without the signature of the obligor's wife, was held not sufficient. Clark v. Redman, 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 380.

"Lawful Deed."—By a lawful deed of conveyance, a deed conveying a lawful or good title may be fairly understood. Dearth v. Williamson, 2 S. & R. (Pa.) 498; 7 Am. Dec. 652.

"Good and Sufficient Deed, with Covenant of Warranty."—The words, "a good and sufficient deed, with covenant of warranty," in an agreement for the sale of land, will be held to mean "a good and sufficient title," if it appears in the agreement, or its attendant circumstances show that such was the intention of the parties. Tindall

Covenant to Convey By Special Warranty.—A covenant to convey land by a special warranty deed, implies that the covenantor has a legal title regularly derived from the commonwealth. If he cannot give such a title, the covenant is broken, and the contract may be rescinded. Bodley v. McChord, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 475.

But where the vendee has not contracted for a record title, he may be compelled to accept one not of record. Parks v. Laroche, 15 Ill. App. 354.

2. Title Subject to Approval of Attorney, etc.—Where the vendee agrees to purchase land subject to the approval of the title by his attorney, unless such attorney accepts the title offered, he is not bound to consummate the sale, and may recover back any portion of the purchase-money deposited on the sale. Allen v. Pockwitz (Cal. 1894), 36 Pac. Rep. 1039.

Where the vendor agrees to give such a title as a named title guaranty company will approve, the vendee may recover the purchase-money paid on the contract, in case such guaranty company refuses to approve the title, although the title is free from legal objection, unless the approval is prevented by the vendee. Flanagan v. Fox (C. Pl.), 26 N. Y. Supp. 48.

3. In Fagen v. Davison, 2 Duer (N.

If the parties contract for an imperfect title, full effect will be given to their agreement.¹

If the contract be for the sale of the vendor's claim to land, rather than of the land itself, there is no implied warranty of title.²

Defects of title furnish a defense to the vendee, but not to the vendor. The former may elect to take such title as the latter has, but may not compel him to execute a deed, if he has no title at all.³

If the vendor has a good title at the time the contract is made, but conveys it away or forfeits it through laches, the vendee is discharged from all obligations to accept his deed, or pay the purchase price.⁴

4. Options. — The right to purchase land is frequently the subject of contract, and such a right may be styled an option. It is

Y.) 153, Oakley, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The assertion, that the provision in the agreement that the title should be satisfactory to the party who was to receive it, gave to the defendant an absolute right to reject that which was tendered, scarcely requires an answer. We cannot give a construction to the agreement that, by enabling each party to rescind it at his pleasure, would have robbed it wholly of its obligatory character. We cannot say that there was no contract for the breach of which an action could be maintained. When such is its nature, so far from having a discretion to reject, he is bound to accept it." But see Crigler v. Blair, 4 Ohio Circ. Ct. 324.

Thus, where executors, acting under a power of sale in a will, agreed to sell the testatrix' interest in land, and recited that the purchaser "is to have a deed in fee for said interest from the executor," it was held that the contract taken as a whole showed that the interest of the testatrix, only, was sold, and that the purchaser could not demand an absolute title in fee simple. Twitty v. Lovelace, 97 N. Car. 54.

But general or doubtful expressions suggesting, but not specifying, a flaw in the vendor's title, are jealously viewed by the courts. Edwards v. Wickwar, L. R., 1 Eq. Cas. 68.

An agreement to convey "such title as they [the vendors] have received from A and B," will be enforced, as made. Wilmot v. Wilkinson, 6 B & C. 506; 13 E. C. L. 238. To the same effect is Stillman v. Canales, 39 Tex. 406.

When the parties to an agreement to convey with a clear title, agree that part of the purchase-money be paid to the mortgagees to release a mortgage, and the vendor procures such release, the vendee cannot refuse to perform his part, and demand a conveyance free from incumbrance. Derling v. Little, 26 Pa. St. 502.

2. Tweed v. Mills, L. R., 1 C. P. 39; Hill v. Hobart, 16 Me. 164; Broyles v. Bee, 18 W. Va. 514. Thus, an agreement to convey all of the vendor's "right, title, and claim" in a certain tract of land, is complied with by the tender of a deed purporting to convey all such "right, title, and claim." Herrod v. Blackburn, 56 Pa. St. 103; 94 Am. Dec. 49. Thus, an agreement to make a good and sufficient conveyance, with full warranty only against the vendor's acts, and those of his heirs and personal representatives, compels the conveyance of such title, only, as the vendor has. Thompson v. Hawley, 14 Oregon 199.

Where one agrees to convey by quitclaim deed, his agreement has reference to the title as it was at the time of the agreement; not to one subsequently acquired. Woodcock v. Bennet, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 711; 13 Am. Dec. 568.

not an estate in land, and an option contract is not a contract of sale.¹ Such an agreement must rest upon a valuable consideration;² otherwise it is a mere offer, revocable until accepted,³ and personal to the parties to it. After the death of the vendee, his heirs cannot accept it.⁴ The option must be for a limited time, and, if none is mentioned, will remain in force for a reasonable time, to be determined under all the circumstances of the case.⁵ Time is thus always of the essence of the contract.⁶ All conditions as to time, and as to other particulars, must be strictly complied with by the prospective purchaser.⁷ Unless the terms of the option be clear and unequivocal, it will not be specifically enforced.⁸ Such a right cannot be given by one in a fiduciary capacity, unless he has express authority to that effect.¹ An agreement to purchase land at the election of the owner is the counterpart of an option, and the rules of law governing it are substantially the same.²

III. PARTIES.—As in every contract there must be two parties, so in a contract for the sale of land there must be a vendor and a vendee, each competent to enter into a binding agreement. The capacity of these parties is presumed until the contrary is shown.³ It is to be noted that there is a difference between the capacity required to make a contract of sale, and that needed to carry the sale into full effect by a conveyance of the estate. The latter has been already considered.⁴ As to the former, it may be said that as the contract is bilateral, with rights and obligations on each side, the same degree of capacity is required on the part of both grantor and grantee.⁵

1. Persons Sui Juris.—The parties to a contract must not only be competent, but they must act voluntarily; otherwise, their acts are voidable.⁶ Certain persons, not under other circumstances incompetent parties, are rendered so by their relations to others, or else peculiar results follow from their contracts of sale or purchase. These instances are now to be considered.

Lease with Option of Purchasing.—The circulars of a land company invited settlers on its lands to cultivate them, with or without option to purchase, and its notices specified that the land was for sale or to rent. Its practice in dealing with its tenants was to execute written leases, with or without option to purchase. It was held, where there was no evidence of fraud or mistake, that a written lease to plaintiff containing no option to purchase, must be deemed to embody the final determination of the parties, and that no such option would be implied. *Abbott v. In a contract for the sale of real estate, it was stipulated that the vendor would, upon the request of the vendee, at the expiration of three years from the sale, repurchase it at the same price, if the latter should desire to sell it. The vendee failed to make the request until nearly a month after the expiration of the three years. It was held that he thereby lost all right to enforce the contract, either at law or in equity. Magoffin v. Holt, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 95.

of purchase and sale may be made between joint tenants or tenants in common. If, after compliance therewith, only one tenant then holds the whole estate, the tenancy is severed, and the remaining owner holds as tenant in severalty.¹ If there remain, after the sale and conveyance, two or more tenants, the one purchasing the share of the retiring joint tenant, or co-tenant, holds it as a tenant in common with the others.²

At law, these results only follow where the contract has been consummated by a conveyance; in equity, the agreement to sell is regarded as causing the changes in relationship.³

Joint tenants and co-tenants may purchase interests in the estate from outside parties. If these interests are adverse, however, they will inure to the benefit of the other tenants, if they so elect, who will be liable to contribution for the price given for them. They can sell only their undivided interests in the land.⁴

b. PARTNERS—(See also PARTNERSHIP, vol. 17, p. 824).—In the absence of special authority, one partner cannot make a binding contract to convey or incur the real estate of the partnership, which will be specifically enforced against the other members of the firm. He has no power to convey the real estate of the firm either by deed or assignment.⁵ But where the business of the firm is dealing in real estate, one partner may bind the others by a contract to convey or purchase;¹ and when a partnership is dissolved by the death of one or more partners, leaving a sole survivor, such surviving partner may sell the partnership real estate, where it is necessary in order to meet the obligations of the firm.²

c. CORPORATIONS.—(See also CORPORATIONS, vol. 4, p. 184; MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, vol. 15, p. 949).—The power of a corporation to take and hold real estate is limited by law, and the terms of its charter. If its charter authorizes it to acquire real estate in certain cases, and for certain purposes, it can do so in those cases and for those purposes only.³ If the charter forbids it to

Where a contract for the sale of partnership lands, is executed by one partner in the firm name, and in the presence and with the approbation and consent of the other partner, it is sufficient to enable the vendee to enforce a specific performance. McWhorter v. McMahan, Clarke Ch. (N. Y.) 400; 10 Paige (N. Y.) 386.

Though by the Statute of Frauds authority to convey land is required to be in writing, it is otherwise as to authority to contract to convey, and hence a contract to convey partnership lands, signed with the firm name by one partner under parol authority from the other, is valid and binding against both. Lawrence v. Taylor, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 107.

1. Sage v. Sherman, 2 N. Y. 417; Young v. Wheeler, 34 Fed. Rep. 98; Thompson v. Bowman, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 316; Batty v. Adams County, 16 Neb. 44.

It is now well settled that real estate may be bought and sold by a firm, and be held by a firm as part of their stock in trade, and therefore the acts or contracts of one of the partners, with respect to the partnership realty, and within the scope of the partnership business, are valid in equity and binding upon all the partners. Baldwin v. Richardson, 33 Tex. 16.

Where it appeared that the partners were "tobacconist merchants, and trading and dealing in real estate," and that the land was purchased with money of the firm, it was held that those facts alone did not authorize the conclusion that the partners had impressed upon the land the character of personal estate, and that they intended it to be used and disposed of as such. *Galbraith v. Such sale and deed by the surviving partner will pass the entire equitable interest of the parties in the property, and the purchaser will be entitled to a decree vesting the entire legal title in himself. *Easton v. In Dupuy v. Leavenworth, 17 Cal. 262, one of the partners absconded with the assets of the firm, after which the remaining partner treated the partnership as dissolved as if by the death of one of its members, proceeded to sell the partnership real estate, and executed deeds therefor. The absconding partner afterward returned and sold and conveyed his legal interest in the land to another party. The court held that the case was the same as if the absconding partner, at the time the sale was made by the survivor, was dead, and, therefore, that the deed of the survivor passed the whole equitable or beneficial interest of the partnership, and the purchaser took the title in equity against the purchaser who bought under the absconding partner.

The Tennessee courts go to the length of holding that the partnership realty vests in the surviving partner absolutely, until the partnership affairs are wound up, and that, where there is no fraud or collusion, he may sell whether the sale is required for the payment of the firm debts or not. Griffey v. Northcutt, 5 Heisk. (Tenn.) 746; Solomon v. Fitzgerald, 7 Heisk. (Tenn.) 552.

A corporation is a being created by law and has properly no authority but such as is conferred upon it, expressly or by implication, by the law of its creation. Auerbach v. LeSueur Mill Co., 28 Minn. 291; 41 Am. Rep. 285.

In Missouri, there is a general statute providing that every corporation has power to sell, purchase, and convey such real and personal estate as the purposes of the corporation may require, not exceeding the amount

At common law, corporations generally have the legal capacity to take a title in fee to real property, except where they undertake to hold it for purposes wholly outside and foreign to the objects of their incorporation, or unless restricted by charter or by statute. Page v. Heineberg, 40 Vt. 81; 94 Am. Dec. 378; Mallett v. Simpson, 94 N. Car. 37; 55 Am. Rep. 595.

In Morawetz on Corp. (2nd ed.), § 327, it is said that this implied power extends not merely to the acquisition of such property as is absolutely necessary in carrying on the company's business, but that a corporation may acquire and hold whatever property is reasonably useful and convenient in attaining its legitimate ends. And in Spear v. Crawford, 14 Wend. (N. Y.) 20; 28 Am. Dec. 513, it was held that a canal company was not restricted, in its purchase of lands, to the mere thread of the canal.

A railway company may maintain a bill in equity for the specific performance of a contract to purchase of them land which they have purchased for the purpose of having gravel dug therefrom, and transported at a certain freight over their road, to be delivered to and used by a third party. Old Colony R. Corp. v. Evans, 6 Gray (Mass.) 25; 66 Am. Dec. 394.

generally extended by statute.¹ He may, before any action has been taken against him by the state, convey his interest, and transmit a good title to the purchaser.²

As to the contract of sale, there is a difference, according as it is made by an alien friend, or an alien enemy. The contract of the former is valid and enforceable; that of the latter void by the law of nations.³

b. INFANTS—(See also INFANTS, vol. 10, p. 613).—The contracts of an infant for the conveyance of real estate, and conveyances of real estate by him, are, like the great majority of an infant's contracts, voidable only, and, until disaffirmed by him, are binding.⁴ But the mere recognition by an infant, after arriving at full age, of a contract of conveyance made during minority, or his temporary acquiescence in the same, does not amount to a confirmation.⁵

c. MARRIED WOMEN.—Conveyances by a married woman are, at common law, absolutely void, unless joined in by the husband as grantor, and even as to her separate estate, the deed is unavailable to pass the husband's curtesy, unless signed by him.⁶ But

State, 40 Ala. 689; Morris v. Hoyt, 18 Cal. 217. If the alien die, his estate passes directly to the state without inquest of office. See, on this point, Co. Litt. 2 b; Fairfax v. Hunter, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 621; Orr v. Hodgson, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 453; Wilbur v. Tobey, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 179; Foss v. Crisp, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 124; People v. Conklin, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 67. An alien cannot protect himself by taking title in the name of another. The title will vest in that other and no trust will result for his benefit. Perry on Trusts (4th ed.), § 64; Taylor v. Benham, 5 How. (U. S.) 270; Phillips v. Crammond, 2 Wash. (U. S.) 441; Leggett v. Dubois, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 114; 28 Am. Dec. 413; Anstice v. Brown, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 448. An alien may take land as trustee, and hold it until office found. Perry on Trusts (4th ed.), § 55. If he is the beneficiary under a passive trust, his estate is liable to be defeated by inquest of office, but not if the trust is active. Perry on Trusts (4th ed.), § 64.

An act was passed by the Texas legislature, in 1891, prohibiting aliens from acquiring title to, or owning any interest in lands in the State of Texas, and providing that any deed or other conveyance purporting to convey such title or interest to any alien or unnaturalized foreigner, or to any firm, company, or corporation composed of such, in whole or in part, should be void. But this act was found to be disastrous to the business interests of the state, and has been since repealed. See Texas Gen. Laws, 1891, p. 82.

The fact that the alien party employed a resident agent is immaterial. Dillon v. U. S., 5 Ct. of Cl. 586.

The following cases lay down a doctrine somewhat different from that of the text: Conrad v. Waples, 96 U. S. 290; Shaw v. Carlile, 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 594.

4. Infants.—Kendall v. Lawrence, 22 Pick. (Mass.) 540; Tucker v. Moreland, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 58; Irvine v. Irvine, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 617.

It is a question for the jury and not for the court, whether the evidence shows an affirmation or not. Irvine v. Irvine, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 617.

6. Married Women.—At common law, as to her separate estate, and property held by her as trustee, without any beneficial interest, she is considered a feme sole, and her contracts concerning the same may be valid and enforceable in equity against her.¹ She may also make a valid conveyance of land when her husband is civilly dead, or is an alien enemy, or has abjured the realm.²

d. PERSONS OF WEAK MIND—(1) Insane Persons.—Generally speaking, insane persons are incapable of making valid contracts, and all contracts entered into by them are either void or voidable.³ The same principle applies to contracts for the purchase and sale of real estate, and to conveyances of the same.⁴ Deeds a married woman could convey only by a fine or common recovery, but by 3 & 4 Wm. IVth, ch. 74, it was enacted that the joint deed of husband and wife, when properly acknowledged, should pass a good title. Williams on Real Prop. (6th ed.), pp. 229-232; Tiedeman on Real Prop., § 794; 3 Washburne on Real Prop., p. 252; Martin v. Dwelly, 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 9; 21 Am. Dec. 245. Similar statutes have been enacted in the United States. Lawrence v. Heister, 3 Har. & J. (Md.) 371; Preston v. Fryer, 38 Md. 225. And see DEEDS, vol. 5, p. 427; MARRIED WOMEN, vol. 14, p. 626; HUSBAND AND WIFE, vol. 9, p. 789.

In some of the United States, the joint deed of the husband and wife always has been recognized independently of statute, as if authorized by the common law. Fowler v. Shearer, 7 Mass. 14; Davey v. Turner, 1 Dall. (U. S.) 11.

Thus, by the customary and ancient law of Rhode Island, a femecover may pass her estate by a deed in which her husband joins, which is duly executed and acknowledged. Manchester v. Hough, 5 Mason (U. S.) 67.

Under Massachusetts Gen. Stat., p. 108, § 3, a married woman may, with the written assent of her husband, enter into a written executory contract for the sale of her real estate, and specific performance will be enforced in equity. Baker v. Hathaway, 5 Allen (Mass.) 103.

If she enters into an agreement, clearly indicating her intention to affect her separate property, a court of equity will, in the absence of fraud or undue advantage taken of her, apply her separate property to discharge such engagement. Jaques v. M. E. Church, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 549; 8 Am. Dec. 447.

of insane persons are generally voidable,¹ unless the grantor has been placed under guardianship, in which case they are absolutely void.²

(2) Persons of Slight Intelligence.—Though mere weakness of mind or inferiority of intellect will not necessarily incapacitate one from making a binding contract,³ yet one may be so enfeebled in mind and memory, either from old age, disease, or other cause, as to destroy his capacity to contract, and constitute ground for setting aside his contracts and conveyances.⁴ Then, too, a person in such condition is peculiarly susceptible to undue influence, party to set up and sustain this objection." Allen v. Berryhill, 27 Iowa 539; 1 Am. Rep. 309. And see DEEDS, vol. 5, p. 426.

But a power of attorney given by a lunatic is absolutely void, and, therefore, a deed given under such power is void also. Dexter v. Hall, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 9.

If the deed of an insane person not under guardianship, obtained without fraud and for an adequate consideration, has never been ratified or affirmed, it may be avoided by his heirs, not only as against his immediate grantee, but also as against subsequent bona fide purchasers for value and without notice. Hovey v. Hobson, 53 Me. 451; 89 Am. Dec. 705.

2. If a person non compos mentis has been placed under guardianship, his deed is void, as the decree and letters of guardianship take from him all capacity to convey. But where there is no such decree or letters, the presumption of law is in favor of his sanity. Wait v. Maxwell, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 217; 16 Am. Dec. 391.

In Griswold v. Butler, 3 Conn. 227, it was held that a deed, executed by a person under a conservator, with the consent of such conservator, but without authority from the county court, was void.

A remarkable doctrine was recognized by Littleton and Coke as undoubted law, namely, that if an insane person executes a conveyance, he cannot plead his want of reason to invalidate the conveyance, although his heir may, because "no man of full age shall be received in any plea by the law to disable his own person;" 3 Th. Co.

Lit. 44-46; to which the further reason was sometimes added that if he were really out of his senses, he could not know whether he had made the conveyance or not. 2 Bl. Com. 291; Beverley's Case, 4 Co. 123b. This doctrine, however, is now wholly abandoned, and the party himself may in all cases invalidate any conveyance or other contract made while in a state of mental aberration. 2 Minor's Inst. (3d ed.), p. 642; 2 Kent's Com. 451; 2 Bl. Com. 292, n; 1 Story's Eq. Jur. (13th ed.), § 230.

4. Coleman v. Frazer, 3 Bush (Ky.) 300; Davis v. Cummings, 60 Vt. 502.

Persons of unsound mind incompetent to take good care of themselves and property, are entitled to the protection and curatation of courts of equity as much as technical idiots and lunatics. The jurisdiction of the courts extends to the case of every person who, in consequence of old age, disease, or other cause, is in such a state of mental imbecility as to be incapable of conducting his affairs with common prudence, and leaves him liable to become the victim of his own folly, or the fraud of others. Nailor v. Nailor, 4 Dana (Ky.) 339; Shaw v. Dixon, 6 Bush (Ky.) 644.

Deaf Mutes.—Persons born deaf and dumb are prima facie non compos mentis. Gartside v. Isherwood, 1 Bro. C. C. 560; Dickenson v. Blisset, 1 Dick. 268; Cruise v. Christopher, 5 Dana (Ky.) 181; Oliver v. Berry, 53 Me. 206; Brower v. Fisher, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 441; Dunn v. Chambers, 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 376; Buffalow v. Buffalow, 2 Dev. & B. Eq. (N. Car.) 241; Whitehorn v. Hines, 1 Munf. (Va.) 557.

The civil law rule is the same.

and if others have taken undue advantage of his mental weakness to inveigle him into contracts or conveyances, a court of equity will set them aside.¹

e. PERSONS UNDER DURESS AND UNDUE INFLUENCE.—In all contracts there must be an aggregatio mentium, an agreement of minds, which can never be the case where one of the parties enters into the agreement by fear or the threats of the other, or yields his will to some force, either moral, social, or domestic, unduly exercised upon him. In such case a court of equity will relieve against the transaction.²

Justinian Inst. Bk. 1, tit. 23, § 4; Digest, Bk. 26, tit. 5, f. 8, § 3.

A person deaf and dumb from his birth who has in fact sufficient capacity, is not legally incapable of executing a deed. Brown v. Brown, 3 Conn. 299; 8 Am. Dec. 187.

Drunken Persons.—All contracts and transactions entered into by a drunken person are invalid or voidable, where the drunkenness was brought about by the opposite party, or a fraudulent advantage was taken of it, or it deprived the party of his reason and of an agreeing mind. 2 Minor's Inst. (3d ed.), p. 644; 1 Chitty on Contracts (11th Am. ed.) 192; Smith's Contracts 202; 1 Parsons on Contracts (7th ed.), *384, n; Gore v. Gibson, 13 M. & W. 623. But the mere fact of being drunk is insufficient to enable a grantor to set aside a deed where no contrivance was used to draw him into drink, and no unfair advantage taken of his situation. Cooke v. Clayworth, 18 Ves. 12; 11 Rev. Rep. 137. But if, through the management or contrivance of him who gained the deed, he was drawn into drink, it will be set aside. Johnson v. Medlicott, 3 P. Wms. 130; Harvey v. Pecks, 1 Munf. (Va.) 518.

A person reduced to a state of mental imbecility by habitual intoxication, is incapable of making a deed. Samuel v. Marshall, 3 Leigh (Va.) 567.

1. Davis v. Cummings, 60 Vt. 502; Wray v. Wray, 32 Ind. 126; Whitehorn v. Hines, 1 Munf. (Va.) 557; Tracey v. Sacket, 1 Ohio St. 54; 59 Am. Dec. 610. See UNDUE INFLUENCE, vol. 27, p. 457.

Where one stands in a relation of trust and confidence to another who is old and failing in mind, the law will presume a contract between them to have been the result of undue influence emanating from the stronger party. Cadwallader v. West, 48 Mo. 483.

In Tracey v. Sacket, 1 Ohio St. 54; 59 Am. Dec. 610, Bartley, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It is said that a court of equity will not measure the size of men's understandings or capacities, there being no such thing as an equitable incapacity where there is a legal capacity; and that the law will not relieve a man who is capable of taking care of his own interest, except where he is imposed on by deceit, against which ordinary prudence could not protect him. But whatever weight this may be entitled to, and whatever may be its application, it is obvious that weakness of mind may constitute a very important circumstance to prove that a contract has been obtained through fraud, imposition, or undue influence."

2. See FRAUD, vol. 8, p. 635; UNDUE INFLUENCE, vol. 27, p. 457.

Equity reaches every case "where influence is acquired and abused, or where confidence is reposed and betrayed." Smith v. Kay, 7 H. L. Cas. 750.

All grants and contracts made under duress are voidable by the parties who make them. Reed v. Exum, 84 N. Car. 430; Somere v. Pumphrey, 24 Ind. 231; Deputy v. Stapleford, 19 Cal. 302; Sharon v. Gager, 46 Conn. 189. And see DURESS, vol. 6, p. 57.

In the great majority of cases, undue influence arises from the condition of the grantor, such as mental or physical weakness, or the confidential relations of the parties, such as guardian and ward, trustee and cestui que trust, attorney and client, physician and patient, etc. We have seen that weakness of mind renders a party peculiarly susceptible to the undue influence of others, and that a deed or contract secured under such conditions would be set aside. See supra, this title, Persons of Slight Intelligence; 2 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d ed.), § 951.

3. Persons in Fiduciary Capacities—a. TRUSTEES—(See also POWERS, vol. 18, p. 901; TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES, vol. 27, p. 1).—A trustee, upon conveyance to him, takes an estate commensurate with the objects of the trust, unless terms negating this construction are used.¹

As to persons in confidential relations, the general rule is, that where the existence of such relations is once established, there is a presumption against the validity of such transactions on the ground of public policy. Dunn v. Dunn, 42 N. J. Eq. 431; Caspari v. First German Church, 12 Mo. App. 314; Kempson v. Ashbee, L. R., 10 Ch. App. 15; Harrison v. Guest, 6 De G. M. & G. 424; 8 H. L. Cas. 481; UNDUE INFLUENCE, vol. 27, p. 461, et seq.; 2 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d ed.), § 951.

All contracts and transactions entered into by a former ward, soon after arriving at full age, with his recent guardian, are scrutinized with rigor, for the influence usually exercised by a guardian over his ward is presumed to last while the guardian's functions are, to any extent, still performed. Consequently, all contracts and conveyances between them, by which the guardian derives a benefit made under such circumstances, will be presumed invalid and set aside at the request of the ward; the burden being cast upon the guardian to show full knowledge, freedom of will, and absence of undue influence. Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Ves. 292; Wright v. Vanderplank, 8 De G. M. & G. 133; Somes v. Skinner, 16 Mass. 348. And see GUARDIAN AND WARD, vol. 9, p. 151.

Conveyances by wards to guardians, soon after the termination of the wardship, or at, or before the time of settling the accounts and delivering up the estate, will be set aside as against public policy, without any proof of actual fraud, and especially where there are circumstances of positive fraud. Waller v. Armistead, 2 Leigh (Va.) 11; 21 Am. Dec. 594. The court will not permit such transactions to stand, unless the circumstances demonstrate the fullest deliberation on the part of the ward, and the most abundant good faith on the part of the guardian. Meek v. Perry, 36 Miss. 190.

Thus, where a ward, shortly after arriving at age, was induced by her guardian, before a settlement of his accounts, to convey her real estate to him for the express consideration of $1,300, he paying but $600, and representing that indebtedness amounting to $700 was existing against the land, when such was not the case, it was held that the conveyance would not be sanctioned in equity. Wickiser v. Cook, 85 Ill. 68. See, to the same effect, Eberts v. Eberts, 55 Pa. St. 110; Williams v. Powell, 1 Ired. Eq. (N. Car.) 460; Wright v. Arnold, 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 513; 61 Am. Dec. 172.

Where one standing in loco parentis to the minor owners of real estate, who were accustomed to obey him and were ignorant of business affairs, induced them, after they had attained their majority, to make a contract, unconscionable in character, to convey to him their real estate, the court refused to enforce it. Tucke v. Buchholz, 43 Iowa 415.

A court of equity will set aside a deed where the undue influence is exercised by the former guardian, in favor of a third person, the same as if it was exercised by the beneficiary in the deed; the latter takes it subject to the taint of improper influence. Ranken v. Patton, 65 Mo. 378.

If, however, all the circumstances of good faith, full knowledge, and free consent are shown, the transaction will be valid and binding. Cowan's Appeal, 74 Pa. St. 329; Bickerstaff v. Marlin, 60 Miss. 509; 45 Am. Rep. 418; Kirby v. Taylor, 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 242.

The mere fact that the relation of guardian and ward has existed will not preclude the making of contracts between the two, after the guardianship has ceased and the accounts fully and fairly settled. After the fiduciary relation has terminated and the influences which that relation would necessarily create have ceased to exist, the parties may make contracts which, if fairly and honestly made and based upon an adequate consideration, will be sustained. Wickiser v. Cook, 85 Ill. 68.

1. TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES, vol. 27, p. 111.

Thus, if the fee is required to carry out the objects of the trust, such an estate will be vested in the trustee,

So far as third parties without notice are concerned, he is, as to this estate, in the same position as though it were unincumbered by the trust. He may convey it as though he were the beneficial as well as the legal owner.¹

If he sells the estate, acting beyond the powers given him in the trust instrument, to one having notice—either actual or constructive—the purchaser will hold it subject to the same trusts as attached to it in the original trustee's hands.² If the purchaser knows that he is dealing with the trustee, in regard to trust prop-although the usual words of limitation are not used. Villiers v. Villiers, 2 Atk. 72; Blagrove v. Blagrove, 4 Exch. 569.

In Webster v. Cooper, 14 How. (U. S.) 499, the court, by Curtis, J., said: "A devise to the trustees and their heirs to the uses mentioned, carries the legal estate to the cestui que use, unless the will has imposed on the trustees some duty, the performance of which requires the legal estate to be vested in them. And in that case they would take an estate exactly commensurate with the exigencies of their trust." See also Doe v. Willan, 2 B. & Ald. 84; Morant v. Gough, 7 B. & C. 206; *Kenrick v. Although words of limitation are used, the fee will not pass if the trust can be executed without its passing. West v. Fitz, 109 Ill. 425.

It is a settled rule in equity that a purchaser without notice, to be entitled to protection, must not only be so at the time of the contract or conveyance, but at the time of the payment of the purchase-money. Wormley v. Wormley, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 449.

Wormley*, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 421; Oliver v. Piatt, 3 How. (U. S.) 333; Caldwell v. Carrington, 9 Pet. (U. S.) 86; Smith v. Walser, 49 Mo. 250.

A purchaser with notice of a prior equity is a trustee, and will be compelled to convey. Liggett v. Wall, 2 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 149; Wright v. Dame, 22 Pick. (Mass.) 55; Reed v. Dickey, 2 Watts (Pa.) 459. Statutes sometimes provide that, if the trust is expressed in the instrument which creates the trustee's estate, every sale, conveyance, or other act of the trustee, in contravention of the trust, shall be absolutely void. These statutes have been given full effect as written. Russell v. Russell, 36 N. Y. 581; 93 Am. Dec. 540; Anderson v. Mathes, 44 N. Y. 249; Douglas v. Cruger, 80 N. Y. 15.

The grantees of land in trust for the payment of debts, reconveyed to the grantor, reciting that the trusts had been executed. The debts had not all been paid. It was held that the reconveyance, being in contravention of the trust, was void, and that the estate remained in the trustees. Briggs v. Davis, 20 N. Y. 15; 75 Am. Dec. 363.

It does not affect the question that such a sale was under an order of the court. Cruger v. Jones, 18 Barb. (N. Y.) 168; Lahens v. Dupasseur, 56 Barb. (N. Y.) 266.

In the absence of such a statute, however, a sale and conveyance of the legal erty, he is bound at his peril to take notice of the extent of the trustee's powers.¹

The questions whether a given trustee has power to make a sale which will divest the interest of the cestui que trust, or may make a purchase, are considered elsewhere.²

b. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—(See also DEBTS OF DECEDENTS, vol. 5, p. 206; EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS, vol. 7, p. 165; POWERS, vol. 18, p. 877).—Executors and administrators frequently have powers of sale over the real estate of decedents, either expressly given them by will or in accordance with statutes directing the sale of lands to pay debts.³ They have no right or title in real estate by virtue of their office, and can make no sale without express direction in the will, or under an order of the court acting in pursuance of the law.⁴

The executor, unless specially permitted by the will to go title to one, either with or without notice, passes the legal estate. Canoy v. Troutman, 7 Ired. (N. Car.) 155; Shortz v. Unangst, 3 W. & S. (Pa.) 55.

Whether the legal estate will thus pass in any given conveyance is largely a matter of intention. Thus, in a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, made by a trustee, only those estates in which he had a beneficial interest will pass. Abbott, Petitioner, 55 Me. 480.

The assignees, being mere volunteers, are regarded simply as the agents of the assignor, standing in his place, and consequently, as a general rule, take only such rights and interests as he himself had and could claim at the time of the assignment made. Ludwig v. Highly, 5 Pa. St. 132; Luckenbach v. Brickenstein, 5 W. & S. (Pa.) 149; In re Wilson, 4 Pa. St. 430; 45 Am. Dec. 701. A voluntary assignment by a debtor is, in this respect, like the assignment of a bankrupt or insolvent, which passes nothing more than he possessed or enjoyed, and under which the assignee takes his rights, precisely as he had them. Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. 100; Worrall v. Marlow, 1 P. Wms. 459, note; Like v. Beresford, 3 Ves. 506.

The assignees could not take more than the legal estate, burdened with the equity to which it was subject in the hands of the assignor. Twelves v. Williams, 3 Whart. (Pa.) 485; 31 Am. Dec. 542; Wolf v. Eichelberger, 2 P. & W. (Pa.) 346; Knowles v. Lord, 4 Whart. (Pa.) 500; 34 Am. Dec. 525; Vandyke v. Christ, 7 W. & S. (Pa.) 57.

If the legal estate passes, it does not follow that the vendee will have the discretionary powers given to the original trustee. Such will be the case only when the instrument of trust contemplated and authorized a transfer of the estate and the power. Perry on Trusts (4th ed.), § 410.

The rule is settled as well that a discretionary power cannot be delegated to a stranger by assignment. Alexander v. Alexander, 2 Ves. 642; Saunders v. Webber, 39 Cal. 287; Hawley v. James, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 318; Berger v. Duff, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 368.

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS, vol. 7, p. 165; Stuart v. Allen, 16 Cal. 473; 76 Am. Dec. 551. In Ryan v. Duncan, 88 Ill. 144, the court, by Sheldon, J., said: "An administrator takes neither an estate, title, nor interest in the realty, and he cannot support any possessory or real action, in law or equity, for the recovery or maintenance of possession or title, or to clear up title from clouds from adverse claims. If necessary to sell for payment of debts, he must take the estate as he finds it, and if incumbered, or there be clouds upon the title, sell it subject thereto." Stone v. Wood, 16 Ill. 177; Smith v. McConnell, 17 Ill. 135; 63 Am. Dec. 340; Walbridge v. Day, 31 Ill. 379; 83 Am. Dec. 227; Phelps v. Funkhouse, 39 Ill. 402; Cutter v. Thompson, 51 Ill. 390; LeMoyné v. Quimby, 70 Ill. 399; Gridley v. Watson, 53 Ill. 186.

They cannot relieve the title of incumbrances, nor perfect it.² They cannot delegate their authority;³ nor can they warrant the title; and if they attempt to do so, the warranty will be binding upon themselves personally.⁴

c. GUARDIANS—(See also GUARDIAN AND WARD, vol. 9, p. 85).—It is a well settled general principle that a guardian cannot, by his contracts, bind the estate of his ward,⁵ and cannot make a valid sale of the latter's real estate without an order of court.⁶

d. MORTGAGEES—(See also POWERS, vol. 18, p. 877; TRUST DEEDS, vol. 26, p. 859).—Sales by mortgagees, under mortgages with power of sale, are governed by the same rules as sales by trustees under powers. The power of the mortgagee depends upon the terms of the mortgage.⁷ It is immaterial whether it be conferred by the instrument conveying the title, or by another instrument made simultaneously with it.⁸ The power may be created by express words or by necessary implication.⁹ A power to sell implies the power to convey.¹⁰ The whole of the mortgagor's interest in the land must be sold, not an undivided part.¹¹ All the conditions as to time, notice, and manner of sale, must be strictly complied with.¹² The assignee of the mortgagee may execute the power,¹ which may be by either a private sale or an auction.²

IV. THE FORMATION OF THE CONTRACT—1. General Principles—Offer and Acceptance.—Every contract consists of an offer and an acceptance.³ If an offer is made to sell land, it is revocable until accepted, even though a certain time, which has not yet elapsed, is given for acceptance.⁴

Acceptance completes the contract and renders it binding on both parties.⁵ The acceptance must, however, in order to be operative, be made within a reasonable time, unless some special period, during which it is to remain open, is named.⁶

701; Fitzpatrick v. Fitzpatrick, 6 R. I. 64; 75 Am. Dec. 681; Smith v. Provin, 4 Allen (Mass.) 516.

A condition, attached to a power of sale contained in a trust deed, that the trustee shall sell only by and with the consent of the grantor, to be manifested by the grantor's joining in the conveyance, is valid. The condition is reasonable, and the trustee must comply with it. Kissam v. Dierkes, 49 N. Y. 602.

If a power is to sell partly for cash and partly on credit, the sale cannot be made entirely on credit. Strother v. Law, 54 Ill. 413. If at public auction, a private sale will be set aside. Greenleaf v. Queen, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 138.

Where the mortgagee was given the right, on default, to enter, take possession, and sell, it was held that he could not sell without entry and taking possession, or, at least, a demand for possession and refusal. Roarty v. Mitchell, 7 Gray (Mass.) 243.

3. CONTRACT, vol. 3, p. 841.

4. Smith v. Reynolds, 3 McCrary (U. S.) 157; Perkins v. Hadsell, 50 Ill. 216.

A party making an offer has a right to withdraw it, at any time before the one to whom it is made accepts it. The party to whom the offer is made must accept within the time limited, and before the offer is withdrawn. School Director v. Trefethren, 10 Ill. App. 127; Larmon v. Jordan, 56 Ill. 204.

A gave an option to C, to be exercised within a given time for a valuable consideration. Before the expiration of the time thus limited, it was verbally agreed to extend the time for the exercise of the option, no further consideration being given. After the expiration of the time, as first limited, A sold and conveyed the property in question to B. Before the time had expired, as agreed upon verbally, C tendered the amount agreed upon to A, and demanded a deed, which was refused. On a bill for specific performance, it was held that, as there was no consideration for the verbal promise, or agreement to extend the time for the exercise of the option, such promise was a mere nudum pactum and, therefore, not enforceable. Coleman v. Applegarth, 68 Md. 21; 6 Am. St. Rep. 417. See also Conner v. Renneker, 25 S. Car. 514.

5. Perkins v. Hadsell, 50 Ill. 216.

The burden of proof that a proposal has been accepted, and the requisite notice communicated, rests upon the party claiming to have accepted it. Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736.

6. Martin v. Black, 21 Ala. 721; Larmon v. Jordan, 56 Ill. 204; Longfellow v. Moore, 102 Ill. 289; Peru v. Turner, 10 Me. 185; Wilson v. Clements, 3 Mass. 1.

Parol evidence of material facts and circumstances, known to the parties at the time, may be introduced to show what is a reasonable time. Stone v. Harmon, 31 Minn. 512. See REASONABLE TIME, vol. 19, p. 1089.

Where, from the terms of the offer made by mail, or from the nature of the business, the vendor has a right to expect an answer by return mail, the acceptance must be made in that manner. Maclay v. Harvey, 90 Ill. 525; 32 Am. Rep. 35.

The defendant wrote a letter to D., empowering him to sell certain land at a specified price, agreeing to confirm any sale made "within a reasonable time," and also gave D. an option to purchase the land for himself for a less amount. D. transferred the letter to the plaintiff, but nothing was paid on the price, and it was held not to constitute a sale to the

No special form of language is required for either offer or acceptance. It is enough that each be fairly deducible from the terms used.¹ The two must agree in their terms; otherwise, the apparent acceptance is in reality merely a new offer.² The acceptance may be in writing, or may consist of some act prejudicial to the purchaser and named by the vendor as a means of plaintiff. Dyer v. Duffy (W. Va. 1894), 19 S. E. Rep. 540.

A clause in a lease, giving the lessee a right to purchase the property demised, is a continuing offer to sell. Unless otherwise provided, it extends throughout the term of the lease. Willard v. Tayloe, 8 Wall. (U. S.) 557. See also, to same effect, Welshman v. Spinks, 5 L. T. N. S. 385; Warner v. Willington, 3 Drew. 523; Boston, etc., R. Co. v. Bartlett, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 224.

Such an offer differs from an ordinary offer to sell, in that it is supported by a consideration and hence is not revocable. See supra, this title, The Subject-Matter—Options.

1. An agreement to execute and deliver a deed of land, is an agreement to sell and convey. Martin v. Colby, 42 Hun (N. Y.) 1.

The mere naming of a price for land, or the terms on which a sale will be made, in response to an inquiry, is not an offer to sell. Knight v. Cooley, 34 Iowa 218; Burns v. Allen, 11 Ired. (N. Car.) 25. But see Kempner v. Cohen, 47 Ark. 519; 58 Am. Rep. 775.

An agreement to sell land, "the said A [the vendor] to retain possession and enjoyment of said land while he lives . . . and, upon his death, the said B [the purchaser] to have full and entire possession and enjoyment thereof," is an agreement for the sale of land, and not a will. Book v. Book, 104 Pa. St. 240.

Offers and acceptances may be by letters, Thames L. & T. Co. v. Beville, 100 Ind. 309; Lynn v. Lynn, 10 Ill. 602; Knight v. Cooley, 34 Iowa 218; Otis v. Payne, 86 Tenn. 663; Matteson v. Scofield, 27 Wis. 671; or by telegrams. Deshon v. Fosdick, 1 Woods (U. S.) 286; Duble v. Batts, 38 Tex. 312; Wells v. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co., 30 Wis. 605.

It is the duty of the court to determine whether the letters contain the essentials of a contract, and it is error to submit the question to the jury. The letters being proved, and the acts of the parties shown, it is the duty of the court to determine their legal effect whether or not they constitute a contract, and to give construction to the same. Ranney v. Higby, 5 Wis. 62.

A letter takes effect from the time that it is mailed. Potter v. Sanders, 6 Hare 1; Duncan v. Topham, 8 C. B. 225; 65 E. C. L. 225; Tayloe v. Merchants' Fire Ins. Co., 9 How. (U. S.) 390; Averill v. Hedge, 12 Conn. 424; Moore v. Pierson, 6 Iowa 279; 71 Am. Dec. 409; Hutcheson v. Blakeman, 3 Metc. (Ky.) 80.

The letter must actually be placed in the post office, directed to the proper place. If directed to a place where the party to be bound sometimes resorts, but does not live, it must be proved to have been received. Potts v. Whitehead, 20 N. J. Eq. 55; Vassar v. Camp, 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 341; Clark v. Dales, 20 Barb. (N. Y.) 42; Myers v. Smith, 48 Barb. (N. Y.) 614.

Where the offer is by letter or by telegram, the acceptance signified in the same manner is sufficient, irrespective of the time when it comes to the knowledge of the proposing party. Trevor v. Wood, 36 N. Y. 307; 93 Am. Dec. 511.

2. Lucas v. James, 7 Hare 410; Bowman v. Patrick, 36 Fed. Rep. 138; Fox v. Turner, 1 Ill. App. 153; Maclay v. Harvey, 90 Ill. 525; 32 Am. Rep. 35; Lyman v. Robinson, 14 Allen (Mass.) 242; Lanz v. McLaughlin, 14 Minn. 72; Bruner v. Wheaton, 46 Mo. 363.

The acceptance must be unconditional, and notice of such acceptance must be communicated within the time limited, or within that time some act must be done, which the parties expressly or impliedly agreed to treat as notice of such acceptance. Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736.

An acceptance of a simple offer to sell land, which is made conditional by a clause reading "provided the title is perfect," is not binding. Corcoran v. White, 117 Ill. 118; 57 Am. Rep. 858.

An answer to an offer to sell land, fixing a different place for the delivery of the deed and the payment of the price, completing the sale.¹ Such an act furnishes a consideration, and prevents the vendor from withdrawing his offer.²

In every contract for the sale of lands, the act of assent must be complete. If the agreement is executed by some of the parties only, or if it appears that certain conditions, still unfulfilled, were to be complied with, before it should go into effect, there is no contract.³

2. Auctions.—(See AUCTIONS AND AUCTIONEERS, vol. 1, p. 977).—Sales of land are frequently made by auction. They do not differ in their essentials from private sales. The rules for conducting auctions are substantially the same, whether the subject of the sale is real or personal property. The power of the auctioneer over the estate is not materially different from that of an ordinary agent.⁴

3. Contracts Through Agents, Brokers, etc.—(See also AGENCY, vol. 1, p. 331; BROKERS, vol. 2, p. 571; POWER OF ATTORNEY, vol. 18, p. 871).—Sales of land are very often made through agents or brokers.⁵ The power of the representative depends upon the terms of his appointment. It may extend merely to finding a purchaser, to the making of a binding contract of sale, or to the execution of the instruments of conveyance. The former is the usual authority of a real estate broker;⁶ the latter requires an instrument of the same solemnity as that to be executed by the agent.⁷

is not a binding acceptance. Langelier v. Schaefer, 36 Minn. 361.

A conditional acceptance is not only no real acceptance, but it has an effect of declining the offer, which cannot be subsequently accepted. Hyde v. Wrench, 8 Beav. 334; Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736.

1. Mix v. Baldue, 78 Ill. 215; Perkins v. Hadsell, 50 Ill. 216; Lanz v. McLaughlin, 14 Minn. 72; Bruner v. Wheaton, 46 Mo. 363.

3. Where the papers evidencing a proposed contract were left with the clerk of the attorney of the purchaser, to be delivered only in case the attorney approved the title, and were obtained by the vendor before an opinion as to the title was given, it was held that there was no binding agreement. Dietz v. Parish, 79 N. Y. 520. See also Griffith v. Winborne, 105 N. Car. 403.

4. AUCTION AND AUCTIONEERS, vol. 1, p. 977.

5. A vendor or purchaser may be represented, at any stage of the negotiation, by an agent, and such agent need not present proof of authority unless it is required. Thus, a claim that the purchaser was in default because he was not present in person, but merely by agents, who failed to produce evidence of authority, was not well founded, the vendor not having at the time questioned the authority of such agents. Baumann v. Pinckney, 118 N. Y. 604.

6. Rutenburg v. Main, 47 Cal. 213; Braun v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 186; Henderson v. State, 50 Ind. 234. A broker, however, may be invested with a wider authority. See BROKERS, vol. 2, p. 592.

A verbal authority to an agent "to sell" or "to close a bargain," gives merely the power to find a purchaser and bring the parties together. Duffy v. Hobson, 40 Cal. 240; 6 Am. Rep. 617; Shepherd v. Hedden, 29 N. J. L. 343; Morris v. Ruddy, 20 N. J. Eq. 238; Coleman v. Garrigues, 18 Barb. (N. Y.) 60; Glentworth v. Luther, 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 45.

7. AGENCY, vol. 1, p. 337. If an agent, acting under parol authority, makes a sealed instrument in the name of his principal, it is inoperative as such, but will have the effect of an ordinary

The general principles of agency are universal and apply to those dealing with either personal or real property.¹

In the conferring of express authority, there is no difference in the application of these principles. It may be granted by parol, even though its exercise requires a written instrument.² If it is sought to establish an authority by implication, and thus hold a principal responsible for the acts of his alleged agent, the rules are the same, but stronger proof is required if the dealing is with real, than if with personal, property, for the reason that the policy of the law requires more formality in the former case and because of the different nature and effect of possession on the part of the agent.³ The authority in the latter case must be clear and distinct, and naturally inferable from the language or dealings of the parties.⁴

Every agent has the incidental powers necessary to transact the business intrusted to him in the usual manner.⁵ Subject to this qualification, however, it is the duty of the agent to act strictly within his authority; if he does not do so, he is liable to his principal; if he acts without the apparent authority with which his principal has invested him, his acts will be binding only upon himself.⁶

A contract, made by an agent in behalf of an undisclosed principal, may be enforced either in favor of, or against, the latter.⁷

4. Proudfoot v. Wightman, 78 Ill. 553. Authority must be clear and explicit and not clouded with any uncertainty. Taylor v. Merrill, 55 Ill. 52. It cannot be inferred properly merely from a correspondence between a real-estate owner and an agent, in which the former speaks of the property and names a price and terms of sale. Bosseau v. O'Brien, 4 Biss. (U. S.) 395; Duffy v. Hobson, 40 Cal. 240; 6 Am. Rep. 617; Albertson v. Ashton, 102 Ill. 50.

An agency to sell land will be construed as a special agency, unless a general agency is clearly intended. AGENCY, vol. 1, p. 360.

5. An agent to plat, subdivide, and sell land may dedicate part of it for a street. Barteau v. West, 23 Wis. 416, and cases cited in AGENCY, vol. 1, p. 361.

A clause in a power of attorney, "giving and granting unto our said attorney full power and authority to do and perform all and every act and thing whatsoever requisite and necessary to be done in and about the premises," confers no additional powers. Jenkins v. Funk, 33 Fed. Rep. 915.

6. Thornton v. Boyden, 31 Ill. 200. The acts of a special agent are not binding on his principal, unless they are strictly within his authority. Mathews v. Hamilton, 23 Ill. 470; *Speer v. Dec. 62.

7. Enforcement.—AGENCY, vol. 1, p. 416; Lawrence v. Taylor, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 113.

Where the agent contracts under seal, the rule is different. The seal is his alone, and no one else can be treated as a party to the instrument. Huntington v. Knox, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 374; Briggs v. Partridge, 64 N. Y. 357.

But if the principal has ratified the contract and received the benefit of it, and his interest appeared upon its face, he may hold others, or may be held liable himself in an action of assumpsit.

The amount of compensation and the terms of its payment depend upon the agreement of the parties.¹

4. Sales Under Order of Court.—The sale of land may be ordered by a court of competent jurisdiction through its officers duly appointed and commissioned to sell.²

Townsend v. Hubbard, 4 Hill (N. Y.) 351; Spencer v. Field, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 88.

1. Compensation.—Where a landowner and real-estate broker agreed in advance that payment of commissions should be made in lots of land, and a deed of the same was tendered by the former to the latter, who had selected certain lots, it was held that the agent could not repudiate the agreement and recover his commissions, but he could recover only for the value of his services after a refusal by the obligee to convey, it being immaterial that the agreement to convey the land was not legally enforceable. Bailey v. Gardner, 6 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 147.

Compensation may consist, by agreement, of a part of the interest in the purchase-money mortgage. Artcher v. McDuffie, 5 Barb. (N. Y.) 147.

If the agreement is merely to find a purchaser, the compensation may be recovered if this is done, although the sale does not result immediately from the agent's efforts. Phelan v. Gardner, 43 Cal. 306; Leete v. Norton, 43 Conn. 219; Hoyt v. Shipherd, 70 Ill. 309; Vinton v. Baldwin, 88 Ind. 104; 45 Am. Rep. 447; Tombs v. Alexander, 101 Mass. 255; 3 Am. Rep. 349; Jones v. Adler, 34 Md. 440; Hamlin v. Schulte, 34 Minn. 534; Bell v. Kaiser, 50 Mo. 150; Hinds v. Henry, 36 N. J. L. 328; Knapp v. Wallace, 41 N. Y. 477; *Wyllie v. Marine Nat. He must, however, be a proper and solvent purchaser, or accepted by the principal. Coleman v. Meade, 13 Bush (Ky.) 358; Kimberly v. Henderson, 29 Md. 512; Hinds v. Henry, 36 N. J. L. 328.

The insolvency of the party found is a matter of defense, in a suit by an agent to recover his fees. It is no part of the plaintiff's case to disprove it. Cook v. Kroemeke, 4 Daly (N. Y.) 268. But see Coleman v. Meade, 13 Bush (Ky.) 358.

vendor to convey, Phelan v. Gardner, 43 Cal. 306; Stewart v. Murray, 92 Ind. 543; 47 Am. Rep. 167; Tyler v. Parr, 52 Mo. 249; Moses v. Bierling, 31 N. Y. 462; Delaplaine v. Turnley, 44 Wis. 31; nor by any act of the owner, either before the sale, as fraudulent conduct or misrepresentation, or after the sale, as voluntarily placing it beyond his power to comply, Leete v. Norton, 43 Conn. 219; Lane v. Albright, 49 Ind. 275; Love v. Miller, 53 Ind. 294; 21 Am. Rep. 192; Chapin v. Bridges, 116 Mass. 105; Pearson v. Mason, 120 Mass. 53; for it is an established principle that a broker, employed to make a sale under an agreement for a commission, is entitled to pay when he makes a sale according to instructions and in good faith, and the principal cannot relieve himself from liability, by a refusal to consummate the sale, or by a voluntary act of his own disabling him from its performance. Nesbitt v. Helser, 49 Mo. 383; Bailey v. Chapman, 41 Mo. 536; Woods v. Stephens, 46 Mo. 555; Glentworth v. Luther, 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 145; Reed v. Reed, 82 Pa. St. 420. Nor by the fact that the title was defective. Knapp v. Wallace, 41 N. Y. 477; Doty v. Miller, 43 Barb. (N. Y.) 529. But see Tombs v. Alexander, 101 Mass. 255; 3 Am. Rep. 349. Where the broker failed to bind the purchaser by a contract which the vendor could enforce under the Statute of Frauds, it was held that he was not entitled to compensation as broker for the parol contract of the sale made by him, where the proposed purchaser refused to accept a good title, which the vendor was ready, willing, and able to make. Gilchrist v. Clarke, 86 Tenn. 583.

As to other causes of failure to complete the contract and their effect on the broker's commission, see BROKERS, vol. 2, p. 578.

2. Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. (U. S.) 495; JUDICIAL SALES, vol. 12, p. 208. And see RECEIVERS, vol. 20, p. 13; SHERIFF'S SALES, vol. 22, p. 597.

The court is the vendor through the instrumentality of its agent. Hurt v. Stull, 4 Md. Ch. 391.

V. THE ESSENTIALS OF THE CONTRACT.—(See also FRAUDS, STATUTE OF, vol. 8, p. 657).—A contract for the sale of land must have competent parties, a subject-matter, and a valuable consideration.¹

1. Of What Consideration May Consist.

—A covenant, though to be executed by the grantee in futuro for life, is a proper consideration. Stewart v. Redditt, 3 Md. 67. So is the cancellation of an existing indebtedness. Schluter v. Harvey, 65 Cal. 158. So, also, is a promise to move on to the land and support the vendor. But where this was not done within two years, it was held that there had been a failure of consideration. Shepardson v. Stevens, 77 Mich. 256.

A promise to pay for a deficiency in quantity of land sold, as containing a certain number of acres, made after the completion of the transaction, is a mere nudum pactum. Smith v. Ware, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 257.

A note given by the vendee payable to the vendor, the same to be in trust for the infant son of the vendee, furnishes a sufficient consideration. Eldridge v. Turner, 11 Ala. 1050.

Where a vendee, as the surety of the vendor, was liable to damages, it was held that this was not a sufficient consideration as against creditors, to support the absolute transfer of land. Gorham v. Herrick, 2 Me. 87.

A promise by the vendor to pay the vendee the amount of any improvements that he may make, if the title fails, is supported by a consideration, and it makes no difference whether the promise was made before or after the deed. Richardson v. Gosser, 26 Pa. St. 335.

Payment of Consideration by Discharging Incumbrances.—An agreement on the sale of a farm, that an incumbrance thereon may be paid as a means of discharging the indebtedness secured by purchase-money notes, is binding. Joy v. Hull, 4 Vt. 455; 24 Am. Dec. 625.

In that case if the vendee expressly or impliedly promises on his part, but does not keep the promise, the vendor may discharge the incumbrance and claim exoneration at the expense of the land. Curry v. Hale, 15 W. Va. 867.

Such will be the case where land is sold "under and subject" to an incumbrance. Moore's Appeal, 88 Pa. St. 450; 32 Am. Rep. 469.

If a purchaser, as a part of the consideration, covenants to pay a mortgage given by the vendor, he cannot avoid liability by showing that it was not binding on the vendor by reason of a personal disability to execute a valid and binding mortgage. Comstock v. Smith, 26 Mich. 306; Ritter v. Phillips, 53 N. Y. 586. See also MORTGAGES, vol. 15, p. 832.

Failure of Consideration.—An agreement to exchange land for slaves was held binding, even though the abolition of slavery occurred between the making of the contract and its fulfillment. Calloway v. Hamby, 65 N. Car. 631.

In the absence of fraud, the fact that the vendor has no title does not constitute a total failure of consideration, the conveyance having been with warranty and the vendee being undisturbed in his possession, for the vendee may receive some benefit or interest of value, even if the vendor has no title. Winslow v. Buel, 11 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 373. But the rule is otherwise where there is fraud, as in assigning a worthless patent. Babb v. Lindley, 23 Kan. 478.

Nude Facts.—Where the owner of land, purchased on execution sale, promised to convey it to the party with whom the debtor had a contract of sale, there being no new consideration, it was held that his promise was not binding. Lanier v. Brooker, 65 Ga. 761.

Where the facts disclosed an absolute sale of lots, a deed executed and delivered, and notes executed for the purchase-money upon which suit was instituted and a new and distinct agreement to forbear the enforcement of the collection of the purchase-money for ten years, upon the condition that the vendee in that period should erect a tavern house upon the premises worth the sum of $10,000, the court, by Lindsay, J., said: "Now we cannot appreciate the force of the conclusion, that the erection of such a building upon the property of the vendee was any consideration in law to give any binding effect to a promise from the vendor. To whose benefit did such an improvement inure? Surely to the vendee himself. But it is alleged that the security of the vendor was thereby increased, when he should come to enforce his lien as a vendor. That may be very true, but it was one of those benefits resulting from the improvement in which the local community also participated and may be fitly characterized as potentia remotissima, upon which no legal obligation could be justly predicated. It was no legal consideration upon which to found a promise. If made, it was a nude contract and could not be enforced." Hogan v. Crawford, 31 Tex. 633. See also CONTRACT, vol. 3, p. 830; INADEQUATE CONSIDERATION, vol. 10, p. 325.

Certainty Required in Consideration.—Id certum est quod certum reddi potest: A contract for the sale of a village lot provided that its price should be that for which the first lot disposed of in the vicinity should be sold. In a suit for the breach, it appeared that an adjacent lot had been sold for $125. It was held that the contract was not void for uncertainty. Cunningham v. Brown, 44 Wis. 72.

An agreement specifying that deferred payments shall be made in the autumn following, is sufficiently definite. Everett v. Dilley, 39 Kan. 73. So is one which leaves the amount of the first payment open, the amount of the whole consideration being certain. Doyle v. Teas, 5 Ill. 202.

In California, the burden of proof rests upon the party seeking to avoid a written contract on the ground of lack of consideration. Deering's Codes, vol. 2, § 1615. In Georgia, it is provided by statute that a consideration moving from another is sufficient. Code (1882), § 2747.

Effect of Seal.—By statute, a seal is sometimes made presumptive evidence of consideration, rebuttable by proof. Howell's Michigan Ann. Stat. (1882), § 7520; New York Rev. Stats. (7th ed.), § 840; Hill's Oregon Ann. Laws, vol. 1, § 753.

1. Young v. Griffith, 84 N. Car. 715. A bond described land as follows: "Two hundred acres of land, it being part of the tract which I bought of Charles Vinzent, lying about one mile east of Mount Enterprise; said two hundred acres to be run off of the south end of said tract next to John Salmon's and extending across said south end." It was held that the bond was not void on its face for insufficient description, for the land might be identified by aid of extrinsic evidence. Rainbolt v. March, 52 Tex. 246.

"The farm situated in that part of Mount Desert Island, called Pretty Marsh, and consisting of between two hundred and sixty and two hundred and seventy acres, and standing in the name of Benjamin Hodgdon," was held a sufficient description. Mansfield v. Hodgdon, 147 Mass. 304.

"My house and lot in the town of Jefferson, in Ashe County, North Carolina," the grantor having but one house and lot in that town, was held to be a sufficient description of the premises to pass them by deed. Carson v. Ray, 7 Jones (N. Car.) 609; 78 Am. Dec. 267.

Description is sufficient if it will distinguish and identify the land. Doe v. Low, 2 Ired. (N. Car.) 457.

An agreement under seal to "furnish water out of the milldam sufficient to carry the fulling-mill and carding machine at all times, except in drought in summer, and the usual times of freezing in winter, and at all times to have such a share as is sufficient to carry one wheel, when either of the wheels of the gristmill and sawmill are running," was held sufficient as to certainty of description, it being proven by extraneous evidence that the grantor had no other mills or dams at the time of the contract. Fish v. Hubbard, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 651.

Thus, "my Lenoir lands" is a sufficient description, if it can be established what land is intended. Thornburg v. Masten, 88 N. Car. 293. As is a description by numbers of sections, townships, numbers of acres, and all known as "the Shook farm or place on the Coosa river." Bogan v. Hamilton, 90 Ala. 454. And "We agree to purchase of P. H. Hodges, his place at Stratford containing fifteen acres, more or less." Hodges v. Kowing, 58 Conn. 12. And "a house and lot situated on Amity street, Lynn, Mass." Hurley v. Brown, 98 Mass. 545; 96 Am. Dec. 671. Also "a tract in Iredell county, containing thirty acres, adjoining the lands of William Shaver, Caldwell, and others." Shaver v. Shoemaker, Phil. Eq. (N. Car.) 327. And "my farm." Thomas v. Mathis, 92 Ind. 560.

A memorandum of sale of "my right in B's (my father's) estate" sufficiently describes the property, it being shown that B owned only a homestead which he devised in equal shares to the vendor and vendee. Ryder v. Loomis (Mass. 1894), 36 N. E. Rep. 836.

In a written contract to convey real estate, the words "a house on Church street" are a sufficient description of the estate to satisfy the Statute of Frauds; and the house may be identified by parol evidence. Upon this point Wells, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It is not a question of the sufficiency of the writing under the Statute of Frauds, so much as it is of the right to resort to parol evidence in aid of the writing, where an ambiguity exists in respect to the property intended to be sold, or to which the contract relates. The most specific and precise description of the property intended requires some parol proof to complete its identification. A more general description requires more. When all the circumstances of possession, ownership, situation of the parties, and of their relation to each other and to the property, as they were when the negotiations took place and the writing was made, are disclosed, if the meaning and application of the writing, read in the light of those circumstances are certain and plain, the parties will be bound by it as a sufficient written contract or memorandum of their agreement. That parol evidence is competent to furnish these means of interpreting and applying written agreements is settled by the uniform current of authorities." Mead v. Parker, 115 Mass. 413; 20 Am. Rep. 110.

But "sixty acres Comida and Cove bottom, also ten acres hillside woodland adjoining the Mitchell tract" unaided by extraneous evidence of identification of the land intended to be sold, is too uncertain. Meyer v. Mitchell, 75 Ala. 475. As is "Forty acres of land." Thompson v. Gordon, 72 Ala. 455. See also Rollin v. Pickett, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 552.

If land be described by numbers and measurements and also by the words "known as the Cook and Clover block," the latter words will prevail in case of discrepancy. Lyman v. Gedney, 114 Ill. 388; 55 Am. Rep. 871.

A description in a bond for title cannot be aided by reference to the obligor's receipt for purchase-money when the papers can be connected only by aid of parol evidence. Falls of Neuse River Mfg. Co. v. Hendricks, 106 N. Car. 485.

1. Lewis v. Baird, 3 McLean (U. S.) 56; Bogan v. Hamilton, 90 Ala. 454.

Thus, an agreement to convey ten lots in a town, which does not point out certain ones, is good, although a deed to that effect would be void for uncertainty. Bemis v. Becker, 1 Kan. 226.

A contract to convey an acre to be laid out, is certain enough if the purchaser has entered upon the land and laid out that amount; it then becomes an agreement to buy as well as to sell, and either party can compel specific performance. Collins v. Vandever, 1 Iowa 573.

A slight error in the survey will not affect a contract to convey. Kennedy v. Davis, 2 Bibb. (Ky.) 343.

A description as two acres of land adjoining and connected with a saw-mill, is sufficiently certain. Brown v. Bellows, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 179.

A description of land as lying in a certain section, upon a certain creek, is sufficient, although the subdivision of the section, township and range are not mentioned. The location on the particular creek removes the uncertainty as to the subdivision and township. Hazlip v. Noland, 6 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 294. But an agreement "to execute and deliver to each and every lot owner, who may have title thereto from J. B. and wife, or from either of them, in any portions of lot known as lot 4, section 29, town 111, north of range 10 west, State of Minnesota, a good and sufficient deed in fee simple, with all proper covenants of warranty, whenever hereafter a patent shall be issued for said lot 4," to one of the obligors, is void for uncertainty in the description of the property. Sharpe v. Rogers, 10 Minn. 168.

A contract to convey "a certain piece of land in the county aforesaid, adjoining the lands of A and B, and others, being a part of the Alexander tract, supposed to contain 30 or 35 acres," is so vague and indefinite that it cannot be enforced specifically. Grier v. Rhyne, 69 N.

The effect of the Statute of Frauds has been elsewhere considered at length.¹ By the fourth section of that act it was provided that no action should be brought, whereby to charge any person upon any contract for the sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them, unless the agreement upon which the action was brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, should be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or his duly authorized agent;² and this section has been adopted substantially in all of the states of the Union save Pennsylvania.³

VI. THE FORM OF THE CONTRACT.—A contract for the sale of land may assume any form, so long as it makes apparent the intention of the parties.⁴

Car. 346. See also Capps v. Holt, 5 Jones Eq. (N. Car.) 153; Murdock v. Anderson, 4 Jones Eq. (N. Car.) 77; Allen v. Chambers, 4 Ired. Eq. (N. Car.) 125.

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF, vol. 8, pp. 657, 694.

2. Stat. 29 Car. II., ch. 3, § 4.

The phraseology of the original section was "no contract or sale of lands," but this has been held to mean no contract for the sale of lands, as was the case in Massachusetts, where the identical terms of the English act were adopted and given this construction by the courts. Boyd v. Stone, 11 Mass. 346.

In the Virginia statute, in parol agreements, this error in phraseology was corrected. See Virginia Code 1873, ch. 140, § 1.

The act applies to sales at auction and by guardians, executors, administrators, sheriffs, public officers, commissioners, etc., Carroll v. Powell, 48 Ala. 298; Hutton v. Williams, 35 Ala. 503; 76 Am. Dec. 297; Ruckle v. Barbour, 48 Ind. 274; Ingram v. Dowdle, 8 Ired. (N. Car.) 455; Smith v. Arnold, 5 Mason (U. S.) 414; Brent v. Green, 6 Leigh (Va.) 16; save in so far as they are judicial sales, for the reasons for the statute were held not to apply to the latter, since the sale in such cases is made directly by an officer of the court and is ineffective until ratified by it, and hence no chance for fraud or perjury exists. Fulton v. Moore, 25 Pa. St. 468; Tate v. Greenlee, 4 Dev. (N. Car.) 149.

Thus, under the probate system of California, a sale by an executor or administrator is made under an order of the probate court and is a judicial sale, and hence, the contract need not be in writing subscribed by the parties. Hallock v. Guy, 9 Cal. 181; 70 Am. Dec. 643.

A sale of land by a commissioner, under a decree of court, does not come within the statute, and is valid without writing. Watson v. Violett, 2 Duv. (Ky.) 332. And so of a chancery sale of land by a trustee, under an order of court. Warfield v. Dorsey, 39 Md. 299; 17 Am. Rep. 562.

In Minnesota, it is held that, upon an execution sale of land by a sheriff, no note or memorandum other than the certificate of sale, is required under their statute. Armstrong v. Vroman, 11 Minn. 220; 88 Am. Dec. 81. And it has been held that a sale under an authority given in a mortgage, as provided for by article 64 of the Maryland Code, which requires all such sales to be reported under oath to the court, and provides for the same proceedings on such report as if the same were made by a trustee under a decree, does not come within the application of the statute. Warfield v. Dorsey, 39 Md. 299; 17 Am. Rep. 562.

Auction Sales.—Sales at auction are within the statute, except sales under a decree, and the auctioneer's receipt for the deposit not containing expressly, or by reference, the terms, namely, the price, cannot have the effect of an agreement binding the vendor within the statute. Blagden v. Bradbear, 12 Ves. 466.

3. See FRAUDS, STATUTE OF, vol. 8, p. 694.

4. Thus, a paper which is in form a receipt, also, if it contains all the elements necessary, may be construed to be a contract. Schweitzer v. Connor, 57 Wis. 177.

An obligation to pay money, with a

The Statute of Frauds generally require that a memorandum of the contract be in writing,¹ but this memorandum is quite distinct from the contract itself, which may be made orally.²

The question whether an instrument is a deed, vesting title, or a mere executory contract, is often a difficult one. It is largely one of intention.³

condition that it shall be null and void if a conveyance of a tract of land is made, is equivalent to a direct covenant to convey land. Kennedy v. Kennedy, 2 Bibb. (Ky.) 465; 5 Am. Dec. 629.

A memorandum read: "It is agreed that B is to have the refusal of a certain farm, situate, etc., which was bought by me for nineteen hundred and forty dollars, upon his complying with certain conditions from the first day of April next, which conditions the aforesaid B has complied with." It was held that this constituted a valid contract, and that it expressed the price for which the land was to be conveyed. Bird v. Richardson, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 252; Atwood v. Cobb, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 227; 26 Am. Dec. 657.

Words of Inheritance.—No words of inheritance are necessary in an executory contract, if it is manifest from the instrument that a fee simple was intended to be conveyed. Gaule v. Bilyeau, 25 Pa. St. 521.

A contract to convey land passes the equitable fee-simple title to the grantee and his heirs, even if it runs to the grantee alone, and not to the grantee and his heirs. The feudal doctrine that the fee simple passes only by a deed running to the grantee and his heirs, does not extend to contracts to convey land. Bodley v. Ferguson, 30 Cal. 511.

Informal Deed Construed as Contract to Sell.—A, the attorney in fact of B, executed a conveyance of land owned by A; but the deed throughout was in the name of "A, attorney in fact for B," and was so signed. It was held, that though the deed did not convey the land, it was a contract to convey, binding upon B, and might be enforced after B's death. Oliver v. Dix, 1 Dev. & B. Eq. (N. Car.) 158.

A deed lacking attestation and acknowledgment, often may be enforced as an agreement to convey, if it is fair and just, and founded on a valuable and adequate consideration. Caperton v. Hall, 83 Ala. 171; Pollard v. Maddox, 28 Ala. 321; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Boykin, 76 Ala. 560.

1. As in Connecticut Gen. Stats. (1888), § 1366. But where the petition in an action for the purchase price of land sold, alleges that the defendant accepted a deed therefor, it is not demurrable on the ground that it fails to show a memorandum or contract of sale in writing, signed by the defendant. If the deed is accepted in consummation of the sale, the vendee will have to pay, notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds. Tinsley v. Miles (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 999.

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF, vol. 8, p. 710. Under the civil law, as existing in New Mexico in 1868, a verbal contract for the sale of real estate, accompanied by delivery of possession, could be enforced. Maxwell Land-Grant Co. v. Dawson (N. Mex. 1893), 34 Pac. Rep. 191.

3. Boone on Real Property, § 372; Brown v. Ewing, 19 Ind. 373.

Whether an agreement for the sale of land is executed, a present conveyance operating to pass title, or executory, contemplating further assurance, depends upon the intention of the parties as evidenced by the whole instrument. Where an agreement for the sale of land to a married woman, in consideration of a sum of money to be paid annually during the lifetime of the grantor and his wife, for their support, with a provision for an increase or reduction, in case the annual sum should be too small or too large for that purpose, contained the formal words of a present deed of conveyance and was duly executed, acknowledged, and possession delivered, the instrument was held an executed conveyance vesting the title in the grantee, though the stipulated consideration was to be paid in the future, and although the grantee was a married woman and the title was incumbered with a condition. Bortz v. Bortz, 48 Pa. St. 382; 86 Am. Dec. 603.

In Shirley v. Shirley, 59 Pa. St. 267, the court, by Thompson, C. J., said: "Courts should be slow to give the effect of absolute conveyances to instruments for provisions made between parents and children, unless the intention be very clear. Such agreements are usually fruitful sources of strife, litigation, and, very often, of great wrong."

The construction of agreements for the sale of land is a matter of law for the court.¹

The rules governing construction and interpretation of contracts are the same, whatever the subject-matter may be. Sales of real estate present, however, a few peculiarities in their application.²

Where one who has purchased land at an execution sale, agrees, after the time for redemption has expired, to convey the land to the execution debtor whenever he shall pay the debt, the writing which states the agreement is not a deed vesting title. Anderson v. Ingram, 13 Lea (Tenn.) 270.

Where the owner of land agreed to sell it, and the purchaser accepted the offer and paid the price, but before receiving the deed, took back his money, and accepted a contract binding him to pay at a future day upon certain conditions, it was held that there was a contract to sell and not a present conveyance passing the legal title. Oliver v. Livingston County, 62 Ill. 528.

Where S. and N. made a contract by which S. was to convey his farm to N., who paid a sum in cash and agreed to pay a further sum at a future time, and executed a mortgage for the balance of the purchase price, at which time S. agreed to make a deed to the farm, and give possession; and at the same time it was further agreed that if N. failed to pay the further sum of money and to execute the mortgage, the money already paid should be forfeited to S., it was held that the instrument was a contract to sell and not a sale itself. Stewart v. Fowler, 37 Kan. 677.

Contracts should be construed so as to give effect to the intention of the parties, and where that intention is sufficiently apparent, effect should be given to it, even though violence be thereby done to its words; for greater regard is to be had to the clear intent of the parties, than to any particular words they may have used in the expression of their intent. Walker v. Douglas, 70 Ill. 445; 2 Parsons on Contracts (7th ed.), side page 512; Maxfield v. Terry, 4 Del. Ch. 618.

Sale or Option.—N., the owner of certain premises, agreed that G. might, during the year, purchase the same for $5,000; and G. bound himself to pay N., for this privilege, the sum of $10,000 at the expiration of the year, if he did not purchase the property for the $5,000; and, if he should complete the purchase within the year, then the $1,000 should be considered as included in the purchase-money, and should not be required of him. It was held that the contract between the parties was not a bargain and sale of the property, but the giving of an option of purchase to G., in consideration of the $1,000. Grabenhorst v. Nicodemus, 42 Md. 236.

1. See CONTRACT, vol. 3, p. 867; INTERPRETATION, vol. 11, p. 519, where the apparent exceptions to the rule are noted and explained.

2. Acts and relationships of parties may be shown in case of ambiguity. Thus, an agreement to convey "ten acres out of one hundred and sixty acres," is not void for uncertainty, if the vendee has previously gone into possession of certain ten acres. Purinton v. Northern Ill. R. Co., 46 Ill. 297.

One guarantying a certain amount of timber on the land sold, cannot charge his vendee, for the purpose of the guaranty, with timber in swamps which it is impossible to remove. Anderson v. Northern Nat. Bank (Mich. 1894), 57 N. W. Rep. 808.

Rule "Contra Preferentem."—Both deeds and contracts for sale are construed most strongly against the one framing the instrument. Warvelle on Vendor and Purchaser, p. 122; Lawson on Contracts, § 389; Hager v. Spect, 52 Cal. 579; Winslow v. Patten, 34 Me. 25; Duryea v. Mayor, 62 N. Y. 592; Rung v. Shoneberger, 2 Watts (Pa.) 23; 26 Am. Dec. 95; Waterman v. Andrews, 14 R. I. 589; Mills v. Catlin, 22 Vt. 98.

Entire or Separable Contract.—The question of whether a contract for the sale of land is entire or separable, is largely one of intention, to be discovered by a view of the language employed, and surrounding circumstances. Southwell v. Beezley, 5 Oregon 458.

No precise rule for determining this intention can be given. When the price is especially apportioned by the contract, or such an apportionment is to be implied clearly, the contract will be regarded as several. Mayfield v. Wadsley, 3 B. & C. 357; 10 E. C. L. 110; More v. Bonnet, 40 Cal. 251; 6 Am. Rep. 621; Lucesco Oil Co. v. Brewer, 66 Pa. St. 351.

Thus, a contract for the sale of two pieces of land, one for £700 and the other for £300, is separable. Johnson v. Johnson, 3 B. & P. 162.

Where a contract was for the sale of a piece of land and "also a tract of coal property," the "coal to be paid for at the rate of half a cent a bushel," this was held divisible in Graver v. Scott, 80 Pa. St. 88.

Where an estate is sold in separate lots and one person buys several of them, there are several distinct contracts. Emerson v. Heelis, 2 Taunt. 38; Roots v. Lord Dormer, 4 B. & Ad. 77; 24 E. C. L. 28; Seaton v. Booth, 4 Ad. & El. 528; 31 E. C. L. 124.

A purchase of three pieces of ground for a single sum, taking title to one of them by a separate deed, and giving a mortgage thereon to secure all the unpaid purchase-money, was held to constitute a separable and not an entire contract. The purchaser could not set up, as a defense to an action on the mortgage, that the title to the two other lots had failed. Fisk v. Duncan, 83 Pa. St. 196.

If the purchaser desired especially to buy one piece of land, and it had for him a value independent of another piece, with which it formed the subject-matter of one sale at a round figure, and if the two would not be injured by their separation, the contract will be construed as separable. M'Queen v. Farquhar, 11 Ves. 467; Bowyer v. Bright, 13 Price 698; Simpson v. Hawkins, 1 Dana (Ky.) 305; Collard v. Groom, 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 488; Waters v. Travis, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 450; Van Eps v. Schenectady, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 436; 7 Am. Dec. 330; Stoddart v. Smith, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 355.

A landowner made a written contract to sell a certain piece of land, and at the same time delivered a deed of the same. In a second paragraph of the same writing, he agreed to sell certain other land, when a deed could be procured from the owner, and to forfeit one thousand dollars in case he could not get the title. The consideration for the first piece was paid, excepting one thousand dollars, which was reserved to cover the chance of forfeiture on the second piece. Owing to a failure of a condition precedent, the second agreement was not carried out, and a suit to recover the one thousand dollars kept back as above, was brought. It was held that there were two distinct contracts, and that the one thousand dollars was reserved merely to secure performance, and not as part payment. Jacobs v. Spalding, 71 Wis. 177.

Where several distinct pieces of property are sold for one consideration, the contract is generally entire. Dykes v. Blake, 4 Bing. N. Cas. 463; 33 E. C. L. 413; Chambers v. Griffith, 1 Esp. 150; Drew v. Hanson, 6 Ves. 675; Scheland v. Erpelding, 6 Oregon 258.

If the vendor has title to some pieces, but not to others, he can enforce the sale of none of them. Johnson v. Johnson, 3 B. & P. 162; Dalby v. Pullen, 3 Sim. 29; Parham v. Randolph, 4 How. (Miss.) 435; 35 Am. Dec. 403; Bates v. Delavan, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 300; Reed v. Noe, 9 Yerg. (Tenn.) 283.

Where the plaintiff agreed to convey certain property to the defendant, for a consideration payable, part in cash and by the assignment of certain mortgages, and part by the conveyance by the defendant to the plaintiff of certain premises, it was held that the contract was entire. Sternberger v. McGovern, 56 N. Y. 12.

Contract for Quitclaim Deed.—The defendant held junior mortgages on certain lots, and having bought the sheriff's certificate of sale on the foreclosure of the first mortgage, denied the right of certain judgment creditors to redeem. The parties then agreed to divide the lots, and the defendant to "quitclaim and convey" certain ones to the judgment creditors, and it was held that the defendant was bound to quitclaim only, and not to make a good title. Brame v. Towne (Minn. 1894), 57 N. W. Rep. 454.

Admissibility of Parol Evidence to Explain Contract.—A verbal promise at the making of a written contract, if made to obtain its execution, may be given in evidence. Graver v. Scott, 80 Pa. St. 88. But where a sale of land is verbally made, and a bond for title

A question frequently arises as to whether a sale is by the acre or is of a tract of land, the acreage being merely for description and not determining the amount of the price. The question is largely one of intention.¹

If nothing is said as to the payment of the price the presumption is that the sale is for cash.² The effect of special agreements as to the time of payment are considered in the notes,³ as is given three weeks later, it will not be presumed that the verbal agreement contained more stringent obligations than are found in the written instrument. Twitty v. Lovelace, 97 N. Car. 54. A condition cannot be annexed by parol to a written contract, as that the land shall correspond with the representations of the vendor. Lowber v. Connit, 36 Wis. 176.

It is not admissible to show that the vendor agreed to pay certain assessments which would otherwise fall upon the vendee. Jones v. Schulmeyer, 39 Ind. 119.

It is admissible to show that time was not of the essence of the contract, which contained a recital: "balance of purchase-money to be paid within thirty days from date, said S. [vendor] giving said T. [purchaser] proper title." Scarlett v. Stein, 40 Md. 512. And see PAROL EVIDENCE, vol. 17, p. 419.

The Contract to be Construed as a Whole.—In a title bond, the vendor agreed to convey a certain strip described by metes and bounds, and farther on in the same contract the whole tract, including the strip. It was held that this was an evident mistake, as the plaintiff would never have specifically described the strip, had he intended to convey the whole tract. Eggspiller v. Nockles, 58 Iowa 649.

1. In a sale of lands described in the deed as containing five hundred and three acres, the presumption is that the specified number of acres was intended, and if there is a considerable deficiency—here thirty-four acres—the purchaser is entitled to an abatement of price. Watson v. Hoy, 28 Gratt. (Va.) 698.

A sale of a tract of land, described by metes and bounds as containing a certain number of acres, "more or less," is a sale in gross and not by the acre, though the price named be an exact multiple of the number of acres named. Depue v. Sergeant, 21 W. Va. 326; Anderson v. Snyder, 21 W. Va. 632; Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438. But see Benson v. Humphreys, 75 Va. 196.

See also ABOUT, vol. 1, p. 32; MORE OR LESS, vol. 15, p. 717.

2. Angel v. Simpson, 85 Ala. 53.

When interest-bearing notes are given for land, the interest is no part of the price of the land. McCann v. Bell, 79 Ky. 112.

When a conveyance is to be made upon payment of the purchase-money, the respective acts are dependent, and neither party can maintain suit for breach of contract without performance, or an offer to perform, upon his part. A mere allegation in the bill of an offer and readiness to make a deed, is not sufficient. Kimbrough v. Curtis, 50 Miss. 117; Klyce v. Broyles, 37 Miss. 524; Robinson v. Harbour, 42 Miss. 800; 97 Am. Dec. 501; 2 Am. Rep. 671.

3. A contract for the sale of land provided that, if a recovery in certain suits affecting the title should be had against the vendor, the part of the land affected by them should not be paid for, and that the last installments of the price might be withheld until the determination of the suits. It was also provided that interest on payments should be computed from a certain date. It was held that the installment withheld bore interest from that date, although the suits were not decided in the vendor's favor until afterward. Baines v. Clarke, 111 U. S. 789.

If a payment is to be made upon a day specified, "if required or demanded," a reasonable time after demand must be allowed. Dunbar v. Stickler, 45 Iowa 384.

A contract for the sale of land provided that the purchaser should pay "the following sums of principal and interest at the several times named below: Due August 1, 1885, $40; due September 1, 1885, $40; due October 1, 1885, $40. And forty dollars on the first day of each month thereafter, until this contract is fulfilled, said payments to bear 7 per cent. interest per annum, payable with each payment." It was held to be a contract for the payment of forty dollars, and interest thereon

each month. Delaney v. Linder, 22 Neb. 274.

Where land is sold upon the agreement that the price shall be one half of that which the purchaser shall realize on it, and the purchaser sells it, together with land bought from other parties on similar terms, for a gross sum, the amount due on the contract to his grantor is determined by apportioning the whole amount received, between the two tracts at their respective values. Kickland v. Menasha Wooden Ware Co., 68 Wis. 34; 60 Am. Rep. 831.

Where a bond is given for the performance, by a vendor, of a contemporaneous contract of sale, which is referred to in, and so made a part of, the recitals of the bond, stipulations in such contract as to the times of making payments and of delivery of the conveyance will control repugnant provisions in the condition of the bond. Coughran v. Bigelow, 9 Utah 260.

1. Where the vendors agreed to refund the purchase-money, "if it should be adjudged that they had no legal right to sell, and if said defendant, by reason thereof, be legally compelled to give up possession of said premises," it was held that the defendant had no greater right under this contract than one who takes under a deed with a covenant of general warranty. No cause of action arises unless there has been either an actual or constructive ouster. Failing v. Osborne, 3 Oregon 498.

An agreement made by the vendor, upon a sufficient consideration, that he will look only to the property for his price, applies both to obligations not yet matured, and to those upon which suit has been brought. Montgomery v. Gibbs, 40 Iowa 652.

A landowner proposed to sell a tract of land for a certain sum to be deposited in the bank. The one to whom the offer was addressed, telegraphed that he accepted the offer, but said nothing as to price and did not deposit the money; it was held there was no contract. Sands Lumber Co. v. Crosby, 74 Mich. 313.

Where the purchaser agreed to assume the payment of a $4,000 subscription, made by the grantor in aid of the extension of a railroad, but, because of the abandonment of such extension before completion, is rendered liable only for a portion of the subscription, he is liable for the balance to the grantor. Miller v. Barler (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 1105. But a purchaser, under a contract containing a condition that he should pay one half the cost of a survey, does not forfeit his rights under the contract by a refusal to pay, as costs, a sum greater than half. Davis v. Terry (N. Car. 1894), 18 S. E. Rep. 947.

Where a widow sold land for $1,817.50, in notes, it being agreed, as she owned only a dower interest therein, that it should be sold by a decree of court, and the sale was made, and the vendee bid it in for $1,460, it was held that the widow could recover on the notes, less a credit of $1,460. Smith v. Meek, 85 Ky. 46. And see, generally, Syllacanga Land Co. v. Hendrix (Ala. 1894), 15 So. Rep. 594; Miller v. Eheinzwieg (Supreme Ct.), 29 N. Y. Supp. 466.

2. See SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE, vol. 22, p. 1043.

In Coughran v. Bigelow, 9 Utah 260, it was held that, where it appears from the contract that the parties have, in fact, agreed that by failure to make certain deferred payments at the specified times the vendee shall lose the benefit of his purchase, the courts will not grant him relief.

Where time is made the essence of the contract, but the parties for several years do not treat it as such, and the vendor seems to treat the transaction as an investment on which she is satisfied to receive the interest, she cannot claim a forfeiture, as provided by the contract, for failure of the vendee to make payments at the time stipulated. Robinson v. Trufant, 97 Mich. 410.

3. If the option is to be exercised any time within sixty days, the purchaser has the whole of the sixtieth day in which to make his election. Webb v. Fairman, 3 M. & W. 472; Serrill v. Burk, 8 Phila. (Pa.) 515.

The rule of the common law, as to the computation of time, is to include the first day, and exclude the last. Thomas v. Affick, 16 Pa. St. 14; Barber v. Chandler, 17 Pa. St. 48; 55

Under a contract of sale the property specifically described passes, and, by implication, those privileges which are in the power of the owner to grant, and which are necessary to its complete enjoyment.¹

VIII. THE EFFECT OF THE CONTRACT—1. Upon the Title.—An executory contract of sale is regarded differently at law and in equity. At law, it is a mere agreement which does not affect the title, and the breach of which gives but the right to sue for damages;² while at equity, it vests an equitable title in the vendee, and Am. Dec. 533; Cromelien v. Brink, 29 Pa. St. 522; Mark v. Russell, 40 Pa. St. 372; Lysle v. Williams, 15 S. & R. (Pa.) 135. See supra, this title, Subject-Matter—Options.

1. Property Specifically Described—Terms Construed.—An agreement to convey a tract to be surveyed so as to include the dwelling house of the vendee, and "also the fields and fenced lands in front of and about said house," does not include a "corral" on the land. Hearst v. Pujol, 44 Cal. 230. A sale of a store "and premises" includes the water and gas pipes, water-closets, basins, etc., and if these have been removed by the vendor's tenant, under a right that was known neither to the vendor nor vendee, to the serious depreciation of the value of the property, the vendee is released from his contract. Smyth v. Sturges, 13 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 75.

If the phrase, a mill "with all the additions thereto," is used, personal property, such as oxen, carts, etc., used in connection with the mill, is not included. Hill v. Townsend, 69 Ala. 286.

A sale of all the coal under a certain tract, with the privilege, for forty years, to use the railroad and other improvements of the vendor, for the removal thereof, confers no right to use the improvements, etc., in taking coal from an adjoining tract. McCloskey v. Miller, 72 Pa. St. 151.

A bond to a railroad company to convey to it the right of way through a certain tract of land, "and also seven acres of land in said section, tract, and orchard, adjoining to said right of way on either side thereof," is not so uncertain in its terms as to be a nullity. It requires a conveyance of the right of way wherever the company may choose to establish its track, and a strip of land of uniform width along the railway, through the entire tract described in the bond, and having three and one half acres on each side of the right of way.

It cannot construct its road so as to leave a tract containing nine tenths of an acre on one side of the right of way, and six and one tenth acres on the other. Chidester v. Springfield, etc., R. Co., 59 Ill. 87.

The purchaser is entitled to a deed describing the land in the words of the agreement without any limitation other than those therein agreed upon. Waters v. Bew (N. J. 1894), 29 Atl. Rep. 590.

A contract for the sale of tannery property, stipulating that "all bark is to be sold to the purchaser at the cost price thereof," does not embrace bark on trees on other lands of the vendor to which no reference whatever is made in the contract, but the contract relates only to peeled bark on the premises contracted to be sold. Baugh v. White (Pa. 1894), 29 Atl. Rep. 267.

Property Passing by Implication.—Where the owner of two estates, so uses them that a burden rests upon one for the benefit of the other, and sells the latter estate, there is an implied agreement that the advantages and burdens shall continue after the sale. Ingals v. Plamondon, 75 Ill. 118. But no interest in a street, other than what he has in common with the public, passes to the purchaser of a lot abutting thereon, if the fee is in the municipality. If the street is abandoned, the fee reverts to the original proprietor. St. John v. Quitzow, 72 Ill. 334.

2. In the ordinary case of an executory contract for the sale of real estate, the effect is such that at law it confers upon the vendee a mere right of action. The estate remains the estate of the vendor, and the money remains that of the vendee. Lombard v. Chicago Sinai Congregation, 64 Ill. 481. And see Maxwell Land-Grant Co. v. Dawson, 151 U. S. 586. It confers, however, color of title upon the vendee. Farley v. Smith, 39 Ala. 38.

makes of him a trustee of the purchase-money which he holds,¹ upon the theory that equity looks upon that as done which ought to be done.² This is the case, however, only with binding agree-

1. Baum v. Grigsby, 21 Cal. 175; 81 Am. Dec. 153; Bodley v. Ferguson, 30 Cal. 511; Lombard v. Chicago Sinai Congregation, 64 Ill. 481; Linscott v. Buck, 33 Me. 530; Cary v. Whitney, 48 Me. 516. The court, by Maxwell, C. J., in Dorsey v. Hall, 7 Neb. 464, said: "It is a well-established principle of equity that, where a contract is made for the sale of real estate, it considers the vendor as a trustee of the purchaser for the estate sold, and the purchaser as a trustee of the purchase-money for the vendor."

A contract for the sale of real estate, works an equitable conversion of the land into personalty from the time when it was made, and the purchase-money, thereupon, becomes a part of the personal estate of the vendor, and, in equity, on the execution of the contract, the vendor becomes trustee of the property for the purchaser, and upon his death intestate, his heir-at-law becomes trustee in his place. Miller v. Miller, 25 N. J. Eq. 354. But he is not a mere naked trustee. Swepson v. Rouse, 65 N. Car. 34; 6 Am. Rep. 735.

In Derr v. Dellinger, 75 N. Car. 302, the court, by Pearson, C. J., said: "The legal effect of a contract of sale, and a bond for title in pursuance thereof, is to create an equitable estate in the vendee, leaving the legal estate in the vendor in trust to secure the payment of the purchase-money, and then in trust to convey to the vendee." See also Kerr v. Day, 14 Pa. St. 112; 53 Am. Dec. 526.

In Siter's Appeal, 26 Pa. St. 180, the court, by Woodward, J., adopting the auditor's report, said: "It seems to be well settled that, when articles of agreement are entered into for the sale and purchase of land, the purchaser is considered the owner in equity of the land, subject to the payment of the purchase-money, he is regarded as trustee of the purchase-money for the vendor, and the vendor is treated as a trustee for the purchaser of the legal title, having no interest in the land beyond the amount of the purchase-money due. It does not seem to be necessary, to produce this effect, that any part of the purchase-money should be paid, it results from the contract." To the same effect is Reed v. Lukens, 44 Pa. St. 200; 84 Am. Dec. 425.

The legal title remains, however, in the vendor. Snodgrass v. Parks, 79 Cal. 55; Martin v. Wright, 21 Ga. 504; Secrest v. Jones, 21 Tex. 121; Lewis v. Cole, 60 Tex. 341. It is not changed by payment or tender of the purchase price by the vendee. Either a conveyance or a suit is necessary for that purpose. Schearff v. Dodge, 33 Ark. 340.

2. In Craig v. Leslie, 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 578, the court, by Washington, J., said: "The principle upon which the whole of this doctrine is founded is, that a court of equity, regarding the substance, and not the mere forms and circumstances of agreements and other instruments, considers things directed, or agreed to be done, as having been actually performed, where nothing has intervened which ought to prevent a performance. This qualification of the more concise and general rule, that equity considers that to be done which is agreed to be done, will comprehend the cases which come under this head of equity." Where it was verbally agreed, between the father and a son, that the son should convey to the father a lot of land, and that, in consideration thereof, the father should devise to the son two other lots of land, and the son conveyed his lot to the father, and the father devised his two lots to the son, but the will, by which he did this, had but two witnesses to it and was, therefore, void, it was held that the son was entitled to have a specific performance of the contract from the representatives of his father. Maddox v. Rowe, 23 Ga. 431; 68 Am. Dec. 535.

In King v. Ruckman, 21 N. J. Eq. 604, the court, by Dalrimple, J., said: "A contract for the sale of land is regarded in equity, for most purposes, as if it had been specifically executed. The purchaser becomes the equitable owner of the land, and the seller of the purchase-money."

Where the purchaser goes into possession with the consent of the vendor, and pays the purchase-money, but receives no deed of conveyance, he is entitled to specific performance, and for all practical purposes is owner of the land, although a part of the purchase-ments to convey, which do not make other provisions as to the time when the title shall pass.¹

The property is, from the time of the delivery of the executed contract, at the risk of the vendee,² who holds the full equitable title,³ the vendor's legal title merely remaining in him for money was paid after the death of the purchaser. Roberts v. Smith, 21 S. Car. 455. See generally SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE, vol. 22, p. 925.

1. Jackson v. Moncrief, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 26; Millard v. McMullin, 5 Hun (N. Y.) 572; Carnes v. Apperson, 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 564.

In a contract with reference to the sale of land, the parties may stipulate that the title shall pass at the time, or that it shall be withheld until a future day, or the performance of a further condition; and if, upon survey of the entire instrument, the latter intention appear, it must have effect. Topp v. White, 12 Heisk. (Tenn.) 174.

If the contract provides that a conveyance shall be made when the purchaser performs certain acts, the equitable title does not vest in him until he complies with this requirement. Chappell v. McKnight, 108 Ill. 575.

The owner of a farm allowed his daughter and son-in-law to go into possession, under a contract, by which they were to cultivate it during his lifetime, support him and his wife from the proceeds thereof, and apply anything left to the improvement of the place. In consideration of this, he was to give the daughter an undivided one-half interest in the farm. It was held that the daughter and son-in-law did not become the equitable owners of one half of the farm, upon the making of the contract, but were entitled to receive that interest only when they had performed their undertakings under it. Flower v. Cruikshank, 77 Iowa 110.

2. Brewer v. Herbert, 30 Md. 301; 96 Am. Dec. 582.

After an executory contract for the conveyance of real estate has been entered into, the property is at the risk of the purchaser. If it burns up, it is his loss; if it increases in value, it is his gain. This is the settled equity doctrine, and it is based upon the principle that in equity what is agreed to be done must be considered as done. Snyder v. Murdock, 51 Mo. 175.

After a contract for the sale of real estate duly executed, the purchaser is the equitable owner thereof, entitled to all advantages that may thereafter arise, and responsible for all loss that may befall it, Reed v. Lukens, 44 Pa. St. 200; 16 Am. Dec. 425, unless the agreement provides that possession of the premises shall be delivered with improvements in the same condition as at the time of the sale. Goddard v. Bebout, 40 Ind. 115.

The same exception holds true where the loss was occasioned by the culpable negligence of the vendor. Marks v. Tichenor, 85 Ky. 536. But see, contra, Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514.

If the vendor cannot make title, the premises remain at his risk. Christian v. Cabell, 22 Gratt. (Va.) 82.

After the contract for the sale of an interest in land, to commence in futuro, but before the purchaser had right of entry, or was entitled to the possession and use of the property, a considerable part of the land was washed away by an ocean storm. It was held that the loss must fall on the vendor who was still the owner. Huguenin v. Courtenay, 21 S. Car. 403.

Where a contract of sale was made and the deed delivered in October, and the vendor agreed to paint the house and put a new roof on it, and deliver possession by the following January, it was held that there was an agreement to repair only, and not one on the part of the vendor to assume the risk of fire. The house having been destroyed between the two dates above, the loss fell on the vendee. Marks v. Tichenor, 85 Ky. 536. As to loss by fire, see Wicks v. Bowman, 5 Daly (N. Y.) 225.

3. The vendee may dispose of the property or incur it, subject to the vendor's rights in it to secure the purchase-money, if the purchaser is in possession under the contract to convey. Smith v. Price, 42 Ill. 399; Baldwin v. Pool, 74 Ill. 97; Ricker v. Moore, 77 Me. 295.

A vendee may sue for the destruction of his crops, caused by the vendor's overflowing the land, if he has right of possession. Connally v. Hall, 84 Ga. 198.

Liable for Vendee's Debts.—Neal v. Murphey, 60 Ga. 388. Property held under a bond for a deed is subject to the security to compel the payment of the purchase price.¹ The relation between the parties is analogous to that between mortgagor and mortgagee, the vendee holding an equity which is liable to foreclosure on the suit of the vendor.²

The parties hold their respective interests in the land subject to the disabilities to be hereafter noted.³

purchaser's debts, no matter when created. A provision in the writing attempting to secure it from prior debts contracted before a certain date, is inconsistent with the grant itself, and null and void. Carlin v. Carlin, 8 Bush (Ky.) 141.

Dower of Vendee's Widow.—Where the purchaser of land has been in possession under a title bond, having paid part of the purchase-money, his widow, after his death, will be entitled to her dower in the land. Hart v. Logan, 49 Mo. 47.

1. Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 225.

It is a well settled rule that the vendor of real estate, who has not executed a deed to the purchaser, holds the legal title as a security for the payment of the purchase-money. Conner v. Banks, 18 Ala. 44; 52 Am. Dec. 209; Baldwin v. Pool, 74 Ill. 97; Miller v. Corey, 15 Iowa 166; Cary v. Whitney, 48 Me. 516; Fitzhugh v. Maxwell, 34 Mich. 138; Strickland v. Kirk, 51 Miss. 795; King v. Ruckman, 21 N. J. Eq. 599.

The legal effect of a contract of sale and a bond for title in pursuance thereof, is to create an equitable estate in the vendee, leaving the legal estate in the vendor, in trust, to secure the payment of the purchase-money, and then in trust to convey to the vendee. Derr v. Dellinger, 75 N. Car. 302; Reed v. Lukens, 44 Pa. St. 200; 84 Am. Dec. 425; Church v. Smith, 39 Wis. 492.

Although the vendor is, in equity, a trustee for the purchaser, yet, if he has not received the whole of the purchase-money, he is not a mere naked trustee, and on his becoming a bankrupt, his interest passes to the assignee. Swepton v. Rouse, 65 N. Car. 34; 6 Am. Rep. 735.

In Chapman v. Chunn, 5 Ala. 399, the court, by Clay, J., said: "All the essential incidents of a mortgage, particularly in regard to a lien upon the premises for the purchase-money, attach to and control a contract for the sale of lands, where the vendor makes a bond, conditioned for title, when payment is complete."

In Haley v. Bennett, 5 Port. (Ala.) 470, the court, by Goldthwaite, J., said: "The particular form of the contract cannot be considered as material. It is, to all intents and purposes, in the nature of a mortgage, and all the equitable incidents of one must attach to the contract." See also Roper v. McCook, 7 Ala. 322.

In Conner v. Banks, 18 Ala. 44; 52 Am. Dec. 209, the court, by Dargan, C. J., said: "If the vendor has executed a bond to make title, when the purchase-money is paid, the contract in a court of equity will be considered in the nature of a conveyance to the purchaser, and a reconveyance back by way of mortgage." See also Fitzhugh v. Maxwell, 34 Mich. 138.

In Tanner v. Hicks, 4 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 300, the court, by Clayton, J., said: "Retention of the title by the vendor upon a sale is, in effect, the same thing as conveying the title and taking a security by mortgage."

In Strickland v. Kirk, 51 Miss. 798, the court, by Sinnall, J., said: "The vendor is treated by the courts as mortgagee; his retention of the title operates as an equitable mortgage, which is of equal import with the ordinary mortgage."

In Church v. Smith, 39 Wis. 495, the court, by Lyon, J., said: "The relation between the parties is analogous to that of equitable mortgagor and mortgagee." See also Edwards v. Thompson, 71 N. Car. 177; Button v. Schroyer, 5 Wis. 598.

In Muldrow v. Muldrow, 2 Dana (Ky.) 387, the court, by Nicholas, J., said: "Nothing can be better settled than that, after the contract for the sale of real estate, the vendor is to be deemed a trustee of the estate for the purchaser, and the vendee is a trustee of the purchase-money for the vendor, and that the death of either, even before the time agreed on for the completion of the contract, does not alter his relative attitude." Green*, 2 Ired. Eq. (N. Car.) 121.

In Billing's Appeal, 106 Pa. St. 558, the court, by Clark, J., said: "Where distinctly personal considerations are at the foundation of the contract, the relation of the parties is dissolved by the death of him whose personal qualities constituted the particular inducement to the contract. The casus must be such, however, as to wholly prevent the performance of the contract." Green v. Rugely, 23 Tex. 539; Fowler v. Kelly, 3 W. Va. 71. See also SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE, vol. 22, p. 1064.

In Kentucky, the contract is binding even if the obligee is dead at the time of its execution. Kentucky Gen. Stats., ch. 22, § 9. And so in Virginia, Virginia Code (3d ed.), ch. 99, § 12, and West Virginia, West Virginia Code (1887), § 2854.

2. He who takes a legal title, with notice of a prior equitable title, is trustee for him who holds the equitable title; but the legal title obtained by a purchaser under the former, although with notice of the prior equitable title, will not be disturbed, if the purchaser was encouraged by the latter to pay the purchase-money. Kurtz v. Bank of Columbia, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 701.

A party who purchases land which another has contracted to convey, with a full knowledge of that fact, takes it subject to the rights and equities of the claimant. Glover v. Fisher, 11 Ill. 666.

In Walker v. Cox, 25 Ind. 272, the court, by Elliott, J., said: "It is well settled that a purchaser of real estate cannot hold against a prior equitable title, if he has notice of the equity, either before the payment of the purchase-money or the execution of the deed."

A purchaser who takes an estate, after notice of a prior equitable right, though for a valuable consideration, makes himself a mala fide purchaser, and will not be enabled, by getting in the legal title, to defeat such prior equitable interest. Mitchell v. Peters, 18 Iowa 119; Baldwin v. Lowe, 22 Iowa 367.

A man who receives a deed of conveyance for land and pays for it, after he knows that the vendor had previously contracted for the sale of it to a third person, and is in equity bound to convey it to him, will be decreed to convey to such third person, although he knew nothing of this outstanding equity at the time he contracted for the purchase of the land. Simms v. Richardson, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 274; Liggett v. Wall, 2 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 149; Clough v. Clough, 3 B. Mon. (Ky.) 64; Langdon v. Woolfolk, 2 B. Mon. (Ky.) 105; *Muldrow v. A third person who purchases with notice of the outstanding contract, does so subject to all equities growing out of the contract, and will be in no better condition than the original vendor. School Dist. No. 3 v. MacLoon, 4 Wis. 98.

He is liable to the same equity, and is bound to do that which his vendor should have done under the contract with such other. Cox v. Cox, 5 W. Va. 335.

One purchasing land, with notice that there is a prior contract affecting the land for the benefit of the vendor's

While, so far as subsequent grantees with notice are concerned, the rights of the vendee of land remain intact,¹ the case is otherwise if there is present no element of notice. Under such circumstances, the equities being equal, the law will prevail, and the second purchaser take a full title, free from any rights on the part of the first vendee.²

The general principles as to what constitutes such notice, have been already given under the titles referred to above, and little is required to be said to apply them to the subject in hand.³

wife, takes it subject to all of the wife's equities growing out of such contract. Phillips v. South Park Com'rs, 119 Ill. 626.

1. A contract to convey land, on payment of the price, gives the vendee at once the right to specific performance, defeasible only by his failure to pay; and a grantee of the vendor's executor, with notice, cannot claim such land as included in his deed merely because, when his deed was executed, the contract had not been fully performed. Rapley v. Klugh (S. Car. 1893), 18 S. E. Rep. 680.

2. Allen v. Holding, 29 Ga. 485; Walker v. Cameron, 78 Iowa 315.

An agreement under private signature, not recorded, between A and certain other persons, that lands purchased by him in his own name are to be conveyed to them, can have no effect against third persons. The apparent title being in A, the property is bound for judgments recorded against him. Robertson v. Wood, 5 La. Ann. 197.

A purchaser for value, who has notice of a previous contract to convey, which is void under the Statute of Frauds, acquires good title, the grantor having elected to treat his former contract as void. Messmore v. Cunningham, 78 Mich. 623.

A purchaser with notice of outstanding equities is not affected thereby, if his vendor was an innocent purchaser. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Gill, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 496; Klinger v. Lemler (Ind. 1893), 34 N. E. Rep. 698.

In order to be a bona fide purchaser, a second grantee must have paid value, NOTICE, vol. 16, p. 834; as by the transfer of other land. Bowen v. Prout, 52 Ill. 354. It must, however, be in money or its equivalent. The giving of a bond or note, secured by mortgage, is not sufficient, Haughwout v. Murphy, 21 N. J. Eq. 118; nor is a payment in Confederate bills. Willis v. Johnson, 38 Tex. 303.

A subsequent purchaser of lands, who has made part payment without notice, leaving a balance unpaid, and who then receives notice of a prior equity, cannot, as against the holder of the prior equity, perfect his entire claim as a purchaser without notice, by afterwards paying the balance. Wells v. Morrow, 38 Ala. 125; Warner v. Whittaker, 6 Mich. 133.

Possession as Notice.—The visible and unequivocal possession of the vendee is notice. Moss v. Atkinson, 44 Cal. 317; De Wolf v. Pratt, 42 Ill. 198; Rogers v. Hussey, 36 Iowa 664.

3. Strickland v. Kirk, 51 Miss. 795; Izard v. Kimmel, 26 Neb. 51.

Actual, open, and notorious possession of land is constructive notice of the possessor's right. Cunningham v. Brown, 44 Wis. 72.

But the possession of a wife, to whom her husband has executed a deed, which is not recorded, is not notice of her title, where she merely continues to live on the land with him as they did before the deed was made. Motley v. Jones, 98 Ala. 443.

Constructive Notice.—Where, by the statute, a contract to convey can be recorded like a deed, the occupancy of land by one under such a contract instead of under a conveyance, affords notice in like manner. Weisberger v. Wisner, 55 Mich. 246.

The mere record is constructive notice, if, by the local law, the instrument is recordable. De Wolf v. Pratt, 42 Ill. 198. The registration of a bond, conditioned to make title to land on payment of a certain consideration, is constructive notice to a purchaser of the land under execution of the rights and equities of the obligee. Schuster v. La Londe, 57 Tex. 28.

Where a bank acquires title to land by deed from its president, who held the land under a deed reciting full payment of the price, and it has no actual knowledge that the price was not in fact paid, it is an innocent purchaser

As between the parties, however, the rights are vested, and are affected only by the action of some innocent third party having a real interest.¹

IX. RIGHTS, DUTIES, AND LIABILITIES OF THE PARTIES—1. In Making the Contract—a. CONCEALMENTS AND MISREPRESENTATIONS.—(See also DECEIT, vol. 5, p. 318; FRAUD, vol. 8, p. 635; MISTAKE, vol. 15, p. 625; RESCISSION, vol. 21, p. 24; UNDUE INFLUENCE, vol. 27, p. 452.)

Whatever may be the moral obligations of the parties to a contract for the sale of land, the vendor is under no legal duty to point out defects, and the vendee under none to disclose circumstances unknown to the vendor, which would tend to increase the value.² without notice, and is not chargeable with constructive notice because of the knowledge of its president. First Nat. Bank v. Tompkins, 57 Fed. Rep. 20.

Suspicious Circumstances.—Notice may be inferred from suspicious circumstances, as the refusal of a vendor to give a general warranty deed, without any explanation, Lowry v. Brown, 1 Coldw. (Tenn.) 456, or the fact that the consideration paid was very inadequate, as five dollars for land worth $6,000. Gaines v. Summers, 50 Ark. 322.

But where land worth $30,000 was sold for $18,000, it was held that the consideration was not so inadequate as to be equivalent to notice of fraud. Fish v. Benson, 71 Cal. 428.

Willfully Abstaining from Inquiry.—If a vendee designedly and fraudulently abstains from making inquiries, he will not be regarded as a bona fide purchaser. Wilson v. Miller, 16 Iowa 111.

Louisiana.—Bona fide purchaser defined in Louisiana Rev. Civ. Code (Saunders, 1888), art. 503.

Statutory Provisions—Recording Agreements to Sell, and Title Bonds.—It is generally provided that agreements and title bonds may be recorded, and that such record furnishes constructive notice binding upon those acquiring interests subsequently. See Connecticut Gen. Stats. (1888), § 2964; Indiana Rev. Stats., § 2956; Howell's Michigan, Annot. Stat., § 5712; Mississippi Rev. Code, § 1214.

1. Harrison v. Roberts, 6 Fla. 711.

A purchase made pending an injunction forbidding the sale, though void against the complainant's interest, is valid as against the vendor. Greenwald v. Roberts, 4 Heisk. (Tenn.) 494.

2. Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers (8th Am. ed.), p. 1.

In Laidlaw v. Organ, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 178, the court, by Marshall, C. J., said: "The question in this case is, whether the intelligence of extrinsic circumstances which might influence the price of the commodity, and which was exclusively within the knowledge of the vendee, ought to have been communicated by him to the vendor? The court is of the opinion that he was not bound to communicate it. It would be difficult to circumscribe the contrary doctrine within proper limits, where the means of intelligence are equally accessible to both parties. But at the same time each party must take care not to say or do anything tending to impose upon the other." The same rule is laid down in the following cases: Warner v. Daniels, 1 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 90; Ward v. Packard, 18 Cal. 392; Oldham v. Bently, 6 B. Mon. (Ky.) 428; Williams v. Spurr, 24 Mich. 335; Burt v. Mason, 97 Mich. 127; Smith v. Countryman, 30 N. Y. 655; Hanson v. Edgerly, 29 N. H. 343; Bench v. Sheldon, 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 72; Farrar v. Alston, 1 Dev. (N. Car.) 73; Alston v. Outerbridge, 1 Dev. Eq. (N. Car.) 18; Mitchell v. Zimmerman, 4 Tex. 75; 51 Am. Dec. 717.

But there is a distinction between suppressio veri and suggestio falsi. Hunt v. Moore, 2 Pa. St. 107; Fisher v. Budlong, 10 R. I. 525.

It has been held that where a vendor, at the time of his conveyance, knows of the interest of others in the land growing out of the original purchase, he cannot bind his vendee, who is ignorant of the facts, to assume all the risk of the title; and that his concealment of such facts is constructive fraud. Lloyd v. Farrell, 48 Pa. St. 73; 86 Am. Dec. 563.

This rule is confined, however, to dealings between those who stand in no special relation of confidence one towards the other.¹

Where property was sold low on execution, it being supposed to be subject to a prior mortgage, when the fact that it was not might have been easily ascertained, it was held that the mere fact that the purchaser knew to the contrary was not ground to set aside the sale. Drake v. Collins, 5 How. (Miss.) 253.

In Mitchell v. McDougall, 62 Ill. 503, the court, by Breese, J., said: "The party in possession of the facts must be under some special obligation, by confidence reposed or otherwise, to communicate them truly and fairly."

A failure to disclose facts within the knowledge of the seller of lands, to constitute fraud must amount to a suppression of such facts as he is bound, under the circumstances, in conscience and duty, to disclose to the purchaser, and in respect to which he cannot, innocently, be silent. Where there is no fraud or mistake in such facts, a party may properly be remitted to his remedy at law. Conover v. Wardell, 22 N. J. Eq. 492.

A bargain or dealing with one who supposes his own rights are defective, because of the supposed validity of a conflicting conveyance, is not bound to disclose his knowledge that the conveyance was fraudulent, the means of information being equally within the reach of both. A purchaser is not bound to disclose his knowledge of facts which enhance the price, where opportunities for information are equally open to both parties. Kintzing v. McElrath, 5 Pa. St. 467.

In a case where a purchaser, who knew of the existence of a mine, unknown to the vendor, merely kept silent but used no misrepresentations, the court refused to set the sale aside. Caples v. Steel, 7 Oregon 491.

The Opposite Doctrine.—It has been said that if one of two parties to a contract know that the other is acting under a misapprehension of fact, and does not set him right, there is a fraud which vitiates the agreement. As illustrating this view, see Gerhard v. Bates, 2 El. & Bl. 488; 75 E. C. L. 486; Crocker v. Lewis, 3 Sumn. (U. S.) 8; Bowers v. Johnson, 10 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 169; Hunt v. Moore, 2 Pa. St. 105; Moore v. Clay, 7 Ala. 742.

Where one purchased land under the false impression that he thereby acquired the elder, legal title, the facts being known to the seller, who did not disclose the date of his grant, it was held that the contract should be rescinded. Kennedy v. Johnson, 2 Bibb (Ky.) 12; 4 Am. Dec. 666.

A willful concealment by the vendor, of a defect in his title, which does not appear on the face of his title papers, and of which the purchaser is ignorant, is a fraud on the purchaser against which equity will relieve. Bryant v. Boothe, 30 Ala. 311; 68 Am. Dec. 117.

If the vendor of land knows, when he effects the sale, that the purchaser has been induced to buy by the false representations of a third person, he is responsible for the fraud, though such third person was not his agent. Law v. Grant, 37 Wis. 548.

If the vendor knows of a defect in the title to a part of the thing sold, which is material to the enjoyment of the rest, and he does not disclose the defect to the purchaser, and the purchaser buys, ignorant of the defect, the purchaser, although he has taken a deed, may in equity have a rescission of the sale. Prout v. Roberts, 32 Ala. 427; Crutchfield v. Danilly, 16 Ga. 432; Campbell v. Whittingham, 5 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 96; 20 Am. Dec. 241; Parham v. Randolph, 4 How. (Miss.) 435; 35 Am. Dec. 403; Johnson v. Pryor, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 243.

1. If one party occupies toward another such a position that he is under an obligation to disclose the true state of affairs to the other, he must do so, or the contract will be vitiated by the fraud. Roseman v. Canovan, 43 Cal. 110.

Undue concealment which amounts to a fraud from which a court of equity will relieve, where there is no peculiar relation of trust or confidence between the parties, is the non-disclosure of those facts and circumstances which one party is under some legal or equitable obligation to communicate to the other, and which the latter has a right, not merely in foro conscientie but juris et de jure, to know. Fish v. Cleland, 33 Ill. 243; Mitchell v. McDougall, 62 Ill. 498; Swimm v. Bush, 23 Mich. 99; Conover v. Wardell, 22 N. J. Eq. 492; Kintzing v. McElrath, 5 Pa. St. 467; Paddock v. Strobridge, 29 Vt. 470. See also UNDUE INFLUENCE, vol. 27, p. 452.

It is generally held that, in order to render a party liable, he must have been guilty of active concealment,¹ made false assertions by word or action, or prevented inquiry on the part of the vendee;² in short, his conduct must have been active and not merely passive.³

1. Mason v. Crosby, 1 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 342.

To make the mere suppression of a fact such a fraud as avoids the contract, there must be something more than a failure to communicate facts within the knowledge of the vendor; there must be a concealment, as by withholding information when asked for, or by using some device to mislead, thus involving act and intention. Kohl v. Lindley, 39 Ill. 195; 89 Am. Dec. 294; Slevekings v. Litzler, 31 Ind. 13; Martin v. Jordan, 60 Me. 531; Fari-bault v. Sater, 13 Minn. 223; Coon v. Atwell, 46 N. H. 510; Coleman v. Burr, 93 N. Y. 31; 45 Am. Rep. 160; Simar v. Canaday, 53 N. Y. 298; 13 Am. Rep. 523.

But where a vendee, in a conversation with the vendor, charged him with having concealed an incumbrance upon the land sold, and the vendor neither admitted nor denied it, it was held that this was not sufficient evidence of fraudulent concealment to justify a rescission of the contract. Hall v. Thompson, 1 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 443.

2. In Bailey v. Smock, 61 Mo. 213, the court, by Wagner, J., said: "The principle is unquestionably established that fraudulent representations, in respect to the title of land, will entitle the aggrieved party to relief; but the misrepresentations must be concerning something unknown to the party injured, who has been induced to act or abstain from examination from some special confidence reposed in the other party, as in this case, where the vendor prevents the vendee from making an examination of the records in regard to the title, by assurances that the title is perfectly good and the property is free from incumbrances, and upon the faith of such assurances and representations the vendee abstains from making the proper examination."

A purchaser living at a great distance from the land, may rely on the representations of the vendor's agent, and need not make a personal inspection of the land. White v. Lowden (Supreme Ct.), 28 N. Y. Supp. 619. And false representations as to value will authorize a rescission of the sale, where the buyer, a non-resident, was ignorant of its value and dissuaded from making inquiries by the fraud of the vendor. McKnight v. Thompson (Neb. 1894), 58 N. W. Rep. 453.

3. Where a purchaser represented to the vendor that the land was valueless except as a sheep pasture, when he knew—although the vendor did not—that it contained a valuable mine, it was held that there had been a fraud which would avoid the purchase. Livingston v. Peru Iron Co., 2 Paige (N. Y.) 390.

Where A discovered a salt spring on B's land, and purchased the land at the ordinary price, concealing the fact of his discovery, the contract was rescinded. Bowman v. Bates, 2 Bibb (Ky.) 47; 6 Am. Dec. 677.

But the fact that the vendees of land discovered a valuable mine on it soon after their purchase, is no ground for rescission of the sale, where there is no proof that the vendees knew the fact before the purchase, and suppressed it. Bean v. Valle, 2 Mo. 83.

In Mitchell v. Zimmerman, 4 Tex. 79; 51 Am. Dec. 717, the court, by Wheeler, J., said: "If the party intentionally misrepresents a material fact, or produces a false impression by words or acts, in order to mislead or obtain an undue advantage, it is a case of manifest fraud. It is a rule in equity that all the material facts must be known to both parties, to render the agreement just and fair in all its parts, and if there be any intentional misrepresentation or concealment of material facts in the making of a contract, in cases in which the parties have not equal access to the means of information, it will vitiate and avoid the contract."

In Crocker v. Lewis, 3 Sumn. (U. S.) 8, the court, by Story, J., said: "No principle seems better founded than this, that if a party makes a representation to one person in respect to a sale, and that representation constitutes the basis of a subsequent sale, made by the party so making the representation, to the party to whom it is Misrepresentations thus stand upon a different footing from passive concealment. If sufficient to constitute fraud, they vitiate the contract.¹ They must be proved clearly by the party alleging them,² however, in every case where the parties stand in no fiduciary relation. The fact of the making of the representation, and the knowledge of the parties as to its truth or falsity, communicated by the third person, it is treated in the same way as if directly made by the vendor to himself. It is by no means true that representations made to third persons are to be treated as res inter alios acta, if those representations have been communicated and acted upon by another person who places entire confidence in them."

In Smith v. Hughes, L. R., 6 Q. B. 597, the court, by Cockburn, C. J., said: "The passive acquiescence of the seller in the self-deception of the buyer did not entitle the latter to avoid the contract," and in the same case Blackburn, J., said: "There is no legal obligation in a vendor to inform a purchaser that the latter is under a mistake not induced by the vendor." In Smith v. Countryman, 30 N. Y. 655, the court, by Mullin, J., said: "A vendor of property may put upon the purchaser the responsibility of informing him correctly as to the market value, or any other fact known to him, affecting the market price of the property, and if the purchaser answers untruly, the purchase will be void by reason of the fraud. The purchaser is not bound to answer in such a case; but if he does, he is bound to speak the truth."

1. Hickey v. Drake, 47 Mo. 369.

The doctrine of caveat emptor does not apply where the buyer was induced, by the fraud of the vendor, to enter into the contract to purchase. Wright v. Deniston (C. Pl.), 29 N. Y. Supp. 718.

The false and fraudulent representations of a seller of an estate to two or more purchasers, constitute several torts, and those injured cannot join in actions therefor. Woodbury v. Deloss, 65 Barb. (N. Y.) 501.

In Tindall v. Harkinson, 19 Ga. 448, relief was refused to a vendee who had relied upon the false statements of the vendor as to value, when he was on the land when the bargain was made, and was not prevented from making a personal examination.

Where a party purchased property for $7,000, its full value, and procured a deed to be made to him for $12,000, which latter sum he assured a purchaser from him was the amount he had paid for the property, which statement was relied on by the purchaser, it was held a good defense to the foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure part of the price. Fairchild v. McMahon, 139 N. Y. 290. And where one is induced to purchase land by fraudulent representations as to its quantity, and the cash payment exceeds its value, the covenant of warranty as to the land conveyed constitutes no consideration for the notes given for the deferred payments, since it affords no remedy for the fraud. Still v. Snow (Vt. 1894), 29 Atl. Rep. 250.

2. Rupart v. Dunn, 1 Rich. (S. Car.) 101.

It was held that a sale of land should not be rescinded because the vendor represented that a certain spring was on the land, the vendee charging it to be within the boundaries of the adjoining tract, it being a doubtful matter on which tract the spring was, and the defendant denying all fraud, or that he knew that the spring was on the adjoining tract, and there being no proof that he did know it. Jasper v. Hamilton, 3 Dana (Ky.) 280.

The mere reading by the vendee, of letters addressed to him by a third person, to the vendor, cannot constitute fraudulent representations. Cooper v. Lovering, 106 Mass. 77; Crist v. Dice, 18 Ohio St. 536. Misrepresentations may be proved by parol evidence. Thomas v. Kennedy, 24 La. Ann. 209; Coon v. Atwell, 46 N. H. 510; Van Kleeck v. Le Roy, 37 Barb. (N. Y.) 550; Sandford v. Rose, 2 Tyler (Vt.) 428.

Statements other than those alleged in the pleadings may be proved, to show the animus. Udike v. Abel, 60 Barb. (N. Y.) 15.

To show the condition of the premises at the time of the representation, that of a time subsequent may be shown. Mason v. Raplee, 66 Barb. (N. Y.) 180.

chase price of land, the defendant alleges that the delivery of the deed was only conditional, and, if not, that he was induced to make the purchase through fraud, and there is evidence to prove the fraud, failure to submit the question to the jury is error. Tinsley v. Miles (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 999. And see Smalley v. Morris, 157 Pa. St. 349, where it was held that there was sufficient evidence of fraud to warrant the submission of the issue to the jury.

2. As where a vendor, while negotiating the sale of land, fraudulently shows to the vendee the house and inclosure, in such a manner as to induce the belief that two certain lots were included, but designedly omits them in the deed. Underwood v. West, 43 Ill. 403.

3. Where parties are negotiating a trade for property which there is opportunity to examine, each has the right to exalt the value of his own property to the highest point his antagonist's credulity may bear, and depreciate that of the other. Such boastful assertions, or highly exaggerated descriptions, do not amount to fraudulent misrepresentation or deceit. In such case the parties are upon equal ground, and their own judgments must be their guide, in coming to conclusions. Miller v. Craig, 36 Ill. 109.

4. A statement made by the vendor, which is tantamount to an estimate or opinion of the value, condition, character, adaptability to certain uses, etc., of such real estate, is not actionable, unless the seller resorts to some fraudulent means to prevent the purchaser from examining the property. Williams v. McFadden, 23 Fla. 143; 11 Am. St. Rep. 345; Nostrum v. Halliday (Neb. 1894), 58 N. W. Rep. 429.

Statements of mere matters of opinion or judgment, although known to be false, do not constitute fraud in the absence of relations of trust and confidence. Wise v. Fuller, 29 N. J. Eq. 257.

The maxim caveat emptor has ever been held to apply with regard to affirmations and representations in relation to real estate. When the vendor affirms to the purchaser that his estate is worth a certain sum, that he gave so much for it, that he has been offered so much for it, or has refused so much for it, such statements, though known by him to be false, and though uttered to deceive, are not actionable. Medbury v. Watson, 6 Met. (Mass.) 259; Mooney v. Miller, 102 Mass. 220; Maney v. Porter, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 347; Law v. Grant, 37 Wis. 548. But see cases cited in the next note.

False representation, as of the quantity of wood on the land, being merely an opinion, is not ground for rescission, and is not a basis of an action against the vendor. Longshore v. Jack, 30 Iowa 298.

Mistaken opinion as to title gives no right of action, neither is it ground for a rescission of the contract. Glascock v. Minor, 11 Mo. 655.

The same rule applies to representations of value. Marshall v. Lewis, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 140.

In Speiglemyer v. Crawford, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 254, the court, by Walworth, Ch., said: "The law at the present day appears to be well settled that a false assertion by the vendor, merely as to the value of the property which he is about to sell, or as to the amount of its future income, where there is neither a warranty as to value, nor a misrepresentation of any fact respecting the property which is not a mere matter of opinion, forms no substantive ground for relief either at law or in equity. A naked assertion by the vendor as to the present or future value of property, does not imply knowledge, but must necessarily be understood by the purchaser as a mere matter of judgment or opinion; and upon a subject as to which the purchaser is generally supposed to be as competent to form a correct judgment as the vendor. I will not attempt to defend the morality of a false assertion either by the seller or the buyer, in relation to his real opinion as to the value of property which is the subject of negotiation between them. It is sufficient to say the law presumes that each relies upon his own judgment and opinion as to the value of property, rather than upon the opinion of the other party to the negotiation, where or of law.¹ They must be, in other words, of facts.² They must the facts upon which the value of the property depends are equally known to both." To the same effect is Sandford v. Handy, 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 260.

The opinion of the vendor, honestly expressed, in regard to the location of a boundary line, constitutes no fraud, and is no misrepresentation available to the purchaser, although it is erroneous. Stow v. Bozeman, 29 Ala. 397; French v. Griffin, 18 N. J. Eq. 297.

The representations of a broker that certain improvements on neighboring lots are contemplated, and that the lots he is selling will be much enhanced thereby, are expressions of opinion, and unless known by the broker to be false, are no defense to a suit for the price. Cooke v. Cook (Ala. 1893), 14 So. Rep. 171.

1. As a statement of the vendor of land, made pending negotiations, that "his wife would be in no event entitled to dower in the lands sold by him in his lifetime, but would be entitled to dower in the lands owned and possessed by him at the time of his death." Martin v. Wharton, 38 Ala. 637.

2. Kelly v. Allen, 34 Ala. 663.

The rule is the same, if matters of opinion are combined with them. Wright v. Wright, 37 Mich. 55.

Representations as to Quantity.—Statements as to quantity, where the sale is in gross, are generally representations of facts. Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. (U. S.) 210; Spence v. Duren, 3 Ala. 251; Harris v. Carter, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 233; Pitts v. Cottingham, 9 Port. (Ala.) 675; Yost v. Shaffer, 3 Ind. 331; 56 Am. Dec. 509; Mitchell v. Moore, 24 Iowa 394; Stephenson v. Taylor, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 235; Pringle v. Samuel, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 43; 13 Am. Dec. 214; Parret v. Shaubhut, 5 Minn. 323; 80 Am. Dec. 424; Thomas v. Beebe, 25 N. Y. 244; M'Alister v. Barry, 2 Hayw. (N. Car.) 290; Estes v. Odum (Ga. 1894), 18 S. E. Rep. 355; Peyton v. Butler, 3 Hayw. (Tenn.) 141; Harris v. Williamson, 4 Hayw. (Tenn.) 124; Walker v. Dunlop, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 271; 9 Am. Dec. 787; Lewis v. McLemore, 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 206; Hatch v. De La Garza, 7 Tex. 60.

As where one, who was about to sell land, represented to the purchaser that an open unmarked line would run so as to include a field of forty acres of rich bottom land adjoining, when he had been informed previously to the contrary. Camp v. Camp, 2 Ala. 632; 36 Am. Dec. 423.

Representations as to Location.—A vendor is liable for false representations as to the location of land, if the purchaser has not an opportunity, at the time, of seeing the land. So he is liable for a misrepresentation as to the cost of the land. Sandford v. Handy, 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 260; Newell v. Horn, 45 N. H. 421. But is not liable for a statement that the land is in an eligible situation. French v. Griffin, 18 N. J. Eq. 279.

Where a vendor of land pointed out to the vendee the probable western boundary, there being no definite marks laid down; and upon a survey of the line, after the purchase, it was found that the line fell so far east of the line so pointed out as to cut off twenty-five acres, the vendee receiving, however, the full number of acres he bargained for, and of equal quality, the court refused to rescind the contract on the ground of misrepresentation. Hall v. Thompson, 1 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 443.

Representations as to Productive Qualities.—Where a vendor sold land, and, at the time, represented that it was valuable for agricultural purposes, but when asked if it overflowed, he represented that it only overflowed from the backwater of a certain bayou, though it was shown that the vendor knew at the time that the land did overflow generally, which diminished its value, it was held that the sale was a fraud upon the vendee, and a court of equity would rescind the contract. Alexander v. Beresford, 27 Miss. 747; 61 Am. Dec. 538.

Where the vendor of a saltpetre cave misrepresented the quantity of saltpetre which could be produced from a given quantity of the nitrous earth of the cave, it was immaterial that the vendee employed a person, in whom he confided, to examine the cave. Perkins v. Rice, 6 Litt. (Ky.) 218; 12 Am. Dec. 298.

Representations as to Character of Land.—Such representations are generally regarded as matters of fact. Hutcheon v. Johnson, 33 Barb. (N. Y.) 392.

Where one selling land represented that it was early vegetable land, which was a material matter and known by have been relied upon by the other party,¹ and a material inducement to the making of the contract,² but need not have been fraudulently made.³

him to be such, though the fact so asserted was not true, this was held sufficient ground for rescinding the contract. Taylor v. Fleet, 1 Barb. (N. Y.) 471.

Where a party has purchased city lots on the representation of the vendor, among other things, that other parties have bought lots in the same neighborhood at a certain price, and it afterward turns out that they were bought for much less than was represented, there is sufficient ground for a rescission of the contract. Kertz v. Dunlop, 13 Ind. 277.

Representations as to Quality.—Where land was sold under representations made by the vendor, that it was level and in a state for building, it was held that the vendor could recover in a suit on a bond given for value, the land proving rough and uneven. Van Epps v. Harrison, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 63; 40 Am. Dec. 314. See also Gilbert v. Cherry, 57 Ga. 129.

An agreement to purchase a farm, made because of the vendor's false representation that the neighborhood is not unhealthy, cannot be enforced. Holmes' Appeal, 77 Pa. St. 50.

Representation as to Title.—Where positive statements as to title are made, they are representations of matters of fact. Smith v. Robertson, 23 Ala. 312; Carr v. Callaghan, 3 Litt. (Ky.) 365; Miller v. Hainy, 4 Bibb (Ky.) 405; Gill v. Corbin, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 392; Bailey v. Smock, 61 Mo. 213; Green v. Chandler, 25 Tex. 148.

If a vendor represents his title to be good, it is the same as saying his title is perfect for the entire tract, unaffected by any gaps in the chain of title, or any flaw or incumbrance whatever. Smith v. Robertson, 23 Ala. 312.

Case lies against a grantor for a fraudulent representation that lands sold by him are free and clear of incumbrances, although, in the deed of conveyance, there is a covenant against incumbrances. Ward v. Wiman, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 193.

As to Other Facts.—Rescission may be had on the ground that the vendor, who was making a public sale as administrator, under an order of the court, stated falsely that he had authority to do so under a will. Stark v. Henderson, 30 Ala. 438.

1. Pritchett v. Munroe, 22 Ala. 501; Foster v. Kennedy, 38 Ala. 359; 81 Am. Dec. 56; Negley v. Wilson, 14 Ind. 215; Casey v. Allen, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 465; 10 Am. Dec. 750; Whiting v. Hill, 23 Mich. 399; Johnson v. Taber, 10 N. Y. 319; Miner v. Medbury, 6 Wis. 295.

If the party complaining makes an examination of the land himself, and relies upon it, rather than upon the statements of the one with whom he contracted, he will not be heard. Hall v. Thompson, 1 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 443; and so if he employs counsel and relies upon his statements. Saltonstall v. Gordon, 33 Ala. 149.

2. Foster v. Gressett, 29 Ala. 393. Misrepresentations, to be noticed, must be material, and must mislead the party to his damage. Wilson v. Strayhorn, 26 Ark. 28; Coffee v. Newsom, 2 Ga. 442; Morgan v. Snapp, 7 Ind. 537; Holland v. Anderson, 38 Mo. 55; Langdon v. Green, 49 Mo. 363.

But the statements need not be the only inducement. James v. Hodsden, 47 Vt. 127. If a material inducement, it makes no difference whether or not, under other circumstances, it would affect the market value of the land. Masterton v. Beers, 6 Robt. (N. Y.) 368.

Where an incumbrance was concealed by the vendor from the vendee, but was removed by the vendor before decree, upon a bill for rescission filed by the vendee, the court refused to rescind the contract. Davidson v. Moss, 5 How. (Miss.) 673.

3. In Read v. Walker, 18 Ala. 332, the court, by Chilton, J., said: "Where a vendor makes a false representation as to the existence of a fact which constitutes a material inducement to the contract, and upon which the vendee reposed, and had a right to rely, and without the existence of which he would not have entered into the contract, then, as the ignorance of the party making such representation, as to its being false, does not avert the injury, it should not destroy the remedy." To the same effect are Lanier v. Hill, 25 Ala. 554; Sherwood v. Salmon, 5

Misrepresentations may be taken advantage of in several forms of action.¹ These actions are not affected by the death of the original parties,² but must be promptly brought.³ The general rule of damages applies.⁴

2. After the Contract is Made—a. RIGHT TO USE AND OCCUPATION—(See also LANDLORD AND TENANT, vol. 12, p. 658).—The vendor, as he holds the legal title, is prima facie entitled to the possession of the land.⁵ This right may, however, be given

3. In Patten v. Stewart, 24 Ind. 339, the court, by Elliot, C. J., said: "A party who seeks the aid of the court to compel the rescission of a contract for fraud, must show that he has exercised at least reasonable diligence in ascertaining the facts, if readily within his power, and has been prompt in seeking his remedy within a reasonable time after the facts constituting the fraud are discovered. The relief is granted to the vigilant, but denied to the negligent." See also Comstock v. Ames, 1 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 411.

If, after the discovery of a fraud, the purchaser accepts a conveyance, he cannot set up the fraud as a defense, in an action for the purchase-money. Vernol v. Vernol, 63 N. Y. 45.

For the general principles of waiver, see McLean v. Clark, 47 Ga. 24.

4. Damages.—The measure of damages is generally the difference in value between the property as it exists, and as it was represented to be. Woolman v. Wirtsbaugh, 22 Neb. 490.

Where the vendor represents that the land contains so many acres, on a bill in equity, filed by the vendee, for abatement of the purchase-money, on account of deficiency in the quantity of the land, the true rule is, to allow the purchaser compensation for the deficiency, according to the average value of the lands sold at the time of purchase. Stow v. Bozeman, 29 Ala. 397.

5. In Williams v. Forbes, 47 Ill. 150, the court, by Walker, J., said: "In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the purchaser of real estate, who does not receive a deed, but simply a contract for a conveyance at a future day, is not entitled to the possession of the land thus purchased. The principle is well recognized, that the owner of the fee, as a general rule, is entitled to the possession of the land, as against all persons not in under some valid agreement from him. And not only so, but when vacant and unoccupied, the fee draws to it, in contemplation of law, the possession. The mere fact that a person enters into a contract for the purchase of land, does not entitle him to enter upon and hold it. It is true, the purchaser may acquire the right by the terms of the agreement or otherwise. But in the absence of some agreement to enter, his possession in such case would be unauthorized, and the vendor might recover possession."

In Chappell v. McKnight, 108 Ill. 575, the court, by Walker, J., said: "The mere purchase of land does not authorize the purchaser to enter into possession without license from the seller. Such license may be shown to have been express, or it may be implied from circumstances. . . . A mere contract for a sale of real property does not authorize an entry by the purchaser. An agreement or covenant to convey the title at a future time does not authorize the purchaser to enter without a license. This must be so on principle. The doctrine is uniformly recognized, and of general application, that the fee draws to it not only the right of, but the constructive, possession. These rights at law accompany the fee, and must be recognized and enforced at law."

In Druse v. Wheeler, 22 Mich. 442, the court, by Campbell, J., said: "There is no right of possession secured under a contract for the sale or exchange of land before the conveyance, unless directly provided for. In many cases to the vendee by an agreement of the parties, either expressly made or resulting by implication.¹ If the vendee thus enters by license, his possession is not adverse, but is really that of his vendor.² He does not hold as a tenant and cannot be compelled such provision is made but it is not implied from the agreement to sell." See also Suffern v. Townsend, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 35; Erwin v. Olmstead, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 229; Smith v. Patten, 1 S. & R. (Pa.) 84; Baum v. Dubois, 43 Pa. St. 260.

In Irvin v. Bleakley, 67 Pa. St. 28, the court, by Thompson, C. J., said: "The law is, where the contract is silent on the subject of possession, the vendor retains it, until he has received his purchase-money."

A vendee of land, holding only a bond for title, cannot resist recovery at law when the vendor sues for possession. His remedy is by a bill to redeem; and a purchaser of the vendee is in no better condition. Chapman v. Glassell, 13 Ala. 50; 48 Am. Dec. 41.

A vendee, in a contract for the sale of land, cannot recover possession from the vendor in an action at law. His only remedy at law is for damages for a breach of contract. Hawkins v. Wilson, 1 W. Va. 117. But see, contra, Drake v. Barton, 18 Minn. 463, where the court, by Ripley, C. J., said: "Upon a sale of real property the purchaser, if the contract is silent on the subject, is entitled to possession, and the vendor to interest on the purchase-money."

1. Chappell v. McKnight, 108 Ill. 570.

If the contract reserves to the vendor the right of re-entry, in case of default in payments, and a right of distress for arrears of interest, and provides that, on such default, the purchaser may be regarded as a tenant holding over wrongfully, and that suit may be brought for the recovery of damages for waste, the vendee has the right of possession by necessary implication. Martin v. Scofield, 41 Wis. 167.

In Miller v. Ball, 64 N. Y. 293, the court, by Earl, J., said: "It may be stated, as a general rule, that in all cases where the contract for the sale of land is silent as to the possession, the land being vacant, and the vendee has paid the entire consideration, and fully performed on his part, and all that remains for the vendor to do is to give the deed, there must be an implied agreement or license that the vendee may at once take possession and have the use of the land." See also Sherman v. Savery, 2 Fed. Rep. 505.

Where a purchaser has a right to the possession, and relinquishes it to the vendor, by mistake or through the latter's misrepresentation, he may recover in an action for use and occupation. Hull v. Vaughan, 6 Price 173; Winterbottom v. Ingham, 7 Q. B. 611; 33 E. C. L. 611.

The defendant and another person conveyed to the plaintiff an undivided moiety of several houses, of which they were seised as devisees in trust. Of one of these houses the defendant had long been in possession, and continued to occupy it after the conveyance. It was held that such occupation did not itself entitle the plaintiff to sue him for use and occupation. Tew v. Jones, 13 M. & W. 12.

Where a contract requires payment of the purchase price before entry and erection of improvements by the vendee, but the latter, nevertheless, enters and makes improvements with the knowledge of the vendor, and thereafter continues to occupy the premises without objection, a presumption by the court that the condition in respect to payment before entry is waived, is justifiable. Minneapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Chisholm (Minn. 1893), 57 N. W. Rep. 63.

2. In Hale v. Gladfelder, 52 Ill. 97, the court, by Walker, C. J., said: "The relation of vendor and purchaser is such that, when the latter enters into possession under the contract to purchase, the possession is that of the vendor; by the purchase he recognized the vendor's title, and like a tenant, in all proceedings for the recovery of possession by the vendor, he is estopped from disputing his title. He enters and holds under the title of the vendor, and his occupancy is subservient and subordinate to that title. And from this relation and for the same reason, his possession becomes as fully that of the vendor, as does that of a tenant become that of a landlord."

Where possession is given upon the

to pay rent,¹ unless, perhaps, the contract was void or is not carried out for some reason other than the inability or unwillingness of the vendor, in which case he is, by some authorities, regarded payment of part of the purchase-money, and interest is paid upon the remainder, twenty years possession by the purchaser is no bar in ejectment, because such possession is not adverse. Doe v. Edgar, 2 Bing. N. Cas. 498; 29 E. C. L. 402.

Although the vendee goes beyond his rights, as in cutting timber, such acts do not make his possession adverse. Doe v. Caperton, 9 C. & P. 112; 38 E. C. L. 59. See also Harral v. Leverly, 50 Conn. 46; 47 Am. Rep. 608; Jarboe v. McAtee, 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 279.

1. Fall v. Hazelrigg, 45 Ind. 576; 15 Am. Rep. 278. If the vendor cannot make title, or for any other reason cannot or will not comply with his contract, he cannot recover rent for the occupation of the vendee, Hearn v. Tomlin, Peake 192; Thompson v. Bower, 60 Barb. (N. Y.) 463; even though the occupation was profitable to the vendee. Kirtland v. Pounsett, 2 Taunt. 145; Winterbottom v. Ingham, 7 Q. B. 611; 53 E. C. L. 611; Blackburn v. Smith, 2 Ex. 783; Vanderheurel v. Storrs, 3 Conn. 203.

In Doe v. Cochran, 2 Ill. 209, the court, by Smith, J., said: "We think it cannot be denied that, in the case of a parol purchase of land, if the vendee enters into possession, and refuses afterward to affirm the contract, he would be liable to the vendor for use and occupation, and could not dispute his title by setting up an outstanding title in a third person."

In McNair v. Schwartz, 16 Ill. 24, the court, by Treat, J., said: "If a party acquires the possession of land under a contract of sale, and afterwards refuses to perform the contract, the vendor cannot maintain assumpsit against him for use and occupation, but must resort to an action of ejectment to recover mesne profits. The relation between the parties is that of vendor and vendee, and not of landlord and tenant. The holding is under a purchase and not under a demise."

In Greenup v. Vernon, 16 Ill. 26, the court, by Treat, C. J., said: "There is nothing in the mere circumstance of a vendor remaining in possession of premises after a sale from which a tenancy can be implied, so far as to enable the vendee to maintain an action for use and occupation."

In Jones v. Tipton, 2 Dana (Ky.) 295, the court, by Robertson, C. J., said: "The law will not imply a contract to pay rent when the occupant held as a vendee, because he held the land as his own; and, therefore, the relation of landlord and tenant, so far as rent may be involved, cannot be inferred." Rogers v. Wiggs, 12 B. Mon. (Ky.) 504; Gould v. Thompson, 4 Met. (Mass.) 224; Hogsett v. Ellis, 17 Mich. 365; Smith v. Stewart, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 46; Carson v. Baker, 4 Dev. (N. Car.) 220; 25 Am. Dec. 706; Jones v. Jones, 2 Rich. (S. Car.) 542; Hough v. Birge, 11 Vt. 190; 34 Am. Dec. 682.

If the relation of vendor and vendee no longer exists, as where the contract has been abandoned and the vendee notified that he must pay rent, he will be liable for that accruing subsequently. Howard v. Shaw, 8 M. & W. 118; Dwight v. Cutler, 3 Mich. 566; 64 Am. Dec. 105.

The converse of the rule is true where a tenant makes a contract to purchase the land demised; he will be liable for rent up to the time of the contract, but not after that. Nestel v. Schmid, 39 N. J. L. 686.

Where it was stipulated clearly that, until conveyance, the vendee should pay the vendor at the rate of a fixed sum per annum, in half yearly payments, it was held that a tenancy was created and that the payments might be recovered as rent. Saunders v. Musgrave, 6 B. & C. 524; 13 E. C. L. 243.

But a mere stipulation for interest, until the completion of the contract, does not have that effect. Davidson v. Ernest, 7 Ala. 817; Dwight v. Cutler, 3 Mich. 566; 64 Am. Dec. 105; Clough v. Hosford, 6 N. H. 234; Smith v. Stewart, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 46.

If the contract provides that the vendee may take possession, and that upon payment of the price it shall become his, but in the case of default, he shall pay for the use of the same, a relation of landlord and tenant is created. Fairbank v. Phelps, 22 Pick. (Mass.) 535. And see LANDLORD AND TENANT, vol. 12, p. 662.

as a tenant at will.¹ As, however, he is the equitable owner, if he holds under a valid contract, he cannot be turned out of possession unless in default,² when he loses all right and cannot successfully defend a possessory action brought by his vendor.³

If a vendee, by express or implied agreement, has the right of possession, he may take actual possession either by himself or by a licensee, against whom he may maintain trespass, in case the license is abused.⁴ He may also let the premises and recover for use and occupation by suit.⁵

In Woodbury v. Woodbury, 47 N. H. 22; 90 Am. Dec. 555, the court, by Sargent, J., said: "If the purchaser refuses to complete the contract, the vendor has the right, we think, to treat him as a trespasser or as a tenant at will, at his election." Bancroft v. Wardwell, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 489; 7 Am. Dec. 396.

Thus, where the contract, being in parol, was void by the Statute of Frauds, but there was no default and no revocation by the vendor, and the vendee planted crops and was then turned out of possession, it was held that, being a tenant at will, the vendee was entitled to the crops as emblements and could bring an action for their conversion. Harris v. Frink, 49 N. Y. 24; 10 Am. Rep. 318.

If the vendee makes default of performance of his part, he is liable for rent. Davidson v. Ernest, 7 Ala. 817; Smith v. Wooding, 20 Ala. 324; Seabury v. Doe, 22 Ala. 207; 58 Am. Dec. 254; Vanderheuel v. Storrs, 3 Conn. 203; Johnson v. Beaucamp, 9 Dana (Ky.) 124.

Where the defendant, under a verbal agreement to purchase certain real estate of the plaintiff, went into possession thereof, but failed to pay at the time stipulated, and afterward voluntarily abandoned the premises, though there was no agreement to pay rent, it was held that he sustained the relation to the plaintiff of tenant at will. Patterson v. Stoddard, 47 Me. 355; 74 Am. Dec. 490; Clough v. Hosford, 6 N. H. 234; Alton v. Pickering, 9 N. H. 494, 496; Ayer v. Hawks, 11 N. H. 148; Hough v. Birge, 11 Vt. 190; 34 Am. Dec. 682.

Where the contract was not completed, owing to the destruction of a house by fire, it was held that a recovery for use and occupation might be obtained. Gould v. Thompson, 4 Met. (Mass.) 224.

3. In Whiteman v. Castlebury, 8 Tex. 443, the court, by Hemphill, C. J., said: "It will be seen that it is the settled doctrine that the vendee, if he be in default, cannot defend himself in the possession of the land, against the suit of the vendor."

The rule is the same if the vendor holds the vendee's note for the unpaid part of the purchase-money. Williams v. Murphy, 21 Minn. 534.

But being rightfully in possession, ejectment will not lie against him unless there be a demand for possession. Doe v. Jackson, 1 B. & C. 448; 8 E. C. L. 191; Right v. Beard, 13 East 210; Hegan v. Johnson, 2 Taunt. 148; White v. Livingston, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 259.

Where it was agreed between the parties, that if the purchaser should make default, then the agreement should be void, and the vendor was to be at liberty "to immediately enter into possession and occupancy of the premises, and was to be forever discharged from the agreement," it was held that if the contract was broken by the purchaser, the vendor had a right to enter without notice or demand of possession. Stone v. Sprague, 20 Barb. (N. Y.) 513.

in possession after the sale, he must manage the estate in such a way as not to injure the purchaser.¹ He is not liable for ordinary deterioration, is not bound to keep the premises in good repair or guard against the decay which is due to time and ordinary use,² and, it has been held, need not use even reasonable care.³ He is, however, liable if he willfully injures the estate by removing trees, shrubs, or articles of personal property permanently annexed to it.⁴

c. RIGHTS OF VENDEE IN POSSESSION.—If the vendee is in possession, he is treated as owner of the property. He may mortgage it⁵ or create an easement upon it.⁶ The estates or rights thus created are complete as against himself, but are liable to be defeated by the assertion of the vendor's rights if they have been infringed upon.⁷ A vendee in possession must, however, do nothing to diminish the security of his vendor, either by committing waste⁸ or removing annexations of a permanent character.⁹

1. Liability for Rents and Profits.—A vendor who has retained the title and possession, but has bound himself to convey on payment of the price, is accountable to the vendee for rents and profits, to the same extent as a mortgagee in possession. Ashurst v. Peck (Ala. 1894), 14 So. Rep. 541.

2. In Hellreigel v. Manning, 97 N. Y. 61, the court, by Earl, J., said: "A party agreeing to sell and convey premises at a future day, does not, in the absence of stipulations to that effect, owe the vendee any duty to keep them in good repair or to guard against the decay which is due to time and ordinary use."

3. Hellreigel v. Manning, 97 N. Y. 56. See, contra, Lysaght v. Edwards, 2 Ch. Div. 507, where Jessel, M. R., in giving judgment, said: "There is a correlative liability on the part of the vendor in possession. He is not entitled to treat the estate as his own. If he willfully damages or injures it, he is liable to the purchaser; and more than that, he is liable if he does not take reasonable care of it."

8. Taylor v. Porter, 1 Dana (Ky.) 421; 25 Am. Dec. 155; Williams v. Rogers, 2 Dana (Ky.) 375; Lowry v. Cox, 2 Dana (Ky.) 469. See also Jennison v. Stone, 33 Mich. 99, where the act of waste consisted in removing timber.

But one in possession of land, under a contract to purchase which has become forfeited, is not responsible to a subsequent purchaser for timber cut by him on the land before the latter's purchase. Walker v. Cole, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 179.

9. In Smith v. Moore, 26 Ill. 393, the court, by Walker, J., said: "The adjudged cases are numerous, and seem to be uniform, with the exception of Raymond v. White, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 319, that a purchaser, under an executed contract, occupying the relation of mortgagor to the premises, has no authority to remove annexations of a permanent character from the land. And this seems to be the settled doctrine, whatever be the reason or justice of the rule. At the ancient common law, all additions to the freehold became a part of it, and could not be removed by the tenant, or anyone but the owner of the fee, or by his license. But in Poole's Case, 1 Salk. 368, the rule was relaxed in favor of trade fixtures, which has since obtained and been recognized by the courts, both of Great Britain and the United States. But we apprehend the true reason why a purchaser, before the completion of the contract, has no authority to remove improvements which he may have placed upon the land, is not because he is a mortgagor, but because the law presumes they were annexed with the design of being permanent. The exception in favor of trade fixtures is made, because the annexations are supposed to be accessory to the calling of the tenant, and not to the land. That they were made, not with the design of being permanent, but of being severed at the end of the term. Whilst with the purchaser the presumption is, that they are made with the design of their permanent engagement in connection with the land, and as an accessory to it. He makes them in view of their becoming his, when he shall have acquired the absolute ownership of the land by conveyance. But until that time, he has only the same right to them which he has to the freehold. In any event, the doctrine seems to be too well settled to disturb." See also Raymond v. White, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 319.

If the contract is rescinded, he is not responsible for the ordinary wear and tear of the property and the decay of buildings and other improvements.¹ If he permanently annexes personal property to the land, it remains a part of the land and cannot be removed by him.²

If the vendee, under the contract, is entitled to the possession, but allows the vendor to remain in occupation, the former is entitled to the rents and profits.³

1. Sugden on Vendor and Purchaser (8th Am. ed.), p. 747. In Taylor v. Porter, 1 Dana (Ky.) 421; 25 Am. Dec. 155, the court, by Underwood, J., said: "The vendee in possession is the quasi tenant of the vendor where the contract is executory. But still the vendee holds so far in his own right as to incur no legal obligation to make repairs, or to warrant or insure against casualties. How can it be told, that the same kind of casualty, or one more destructive, might not have happened, if the vendor had continued in possession, and not made the sale? Would he keep the property in better repair than his vendee? If casualties happened while he was possessed and the owner, or if he failed to repair and the property went to destruction, the loss would be his. There is no certainty that the property would be safer remaining in the hands of the vendor, than in the possession of the vendee; and, therefore, unless the injury can be traced to some culpable act or omission of the vendee, producing the loss in the value of the improvements, we perceive no ground on which to charge him. If he set fire to them and consumed them, or if he removed and sold them, in these and similar cases, as the deterioration would result from his voluntary act, he should be held responsible, on the rescission of the contract, for the value of the property he has thus destroyed, or used. But when, without his fault, a loss happens, it should fall on the vendor who has been faithless to his contract."

In Williams v. Rogers, 2 Dana (Ky.) 376, the court, by Robertson, J., said: "For the natural wear and tear, or such deterioration only as may have resulted from the prudent and ordinary use, he should not be required to account, but should be held responsible only for waste, or any damage which shall have been the consequence of his improvidence, culpable negligence, or wantonness; or from his having made an unusual, or unexpected, or extraordinary use of the land, or any of its appurtenances."

2. Smith v. Moore, 26 Ill. 392; Oakman v. Dorchester Mut. F. Ins. Co., 98 Mass. 57. But where the purchaser, under an oral contract of sale, built a frame house, and the vendor afterward repudiated the contract and took possession, it was held that the purchaser could maintain replevin for the building. Waters v. Reuber, 16 Neb. 99; 49 Am. Rep. 710.

3. Mason v. Chambers, 3 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 323.

If the contract is not ultimately carried into effect, the vendee may recover for improvements made in good faith, in case the failure did not happen through his own fault.¹ If it was through his fault, or if he made the improvements knowing that through a defect of title, or for some other reason, the contract could not be consummated, there can be no recovery.²

d. PAYMENT OF TAXES AND ASSESSMENTS.—The question of who is primarily liable to pay taxes and assessments, depends

1. 2 Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers (8th Am. ed.), p. 747; Bright v. Boyd, 1 Story (U. S.) 494; In Goodwin v. Lyon, 4 Port. (Ala.) 314, the court, by Collier, J., said: "Where it appears that a contract for the sale and purchase of lands was made, upon the faith of which the vendee took possession and made valuable and permanent improvements, though he cannot coerce its specific execution in equity, either because the agreement is imperfect or its precise terms cannot be shown, the bill should be retained, to decree a pecuniary compensation equivalent to the improvements. If equity did not afford this redress, the vendee would sustain an injury for which he would be remediless, or else have a remedy at law, at best doubtful and inadequate."

The following cases also support the text: Glass v. Abbott, 6 Bush (Ky.) 622; Williams v. Rogers, 2 Dana (Ky.) 375; Lowry v. Cox, 2 Dana (Ky.) 469; Ewing v. Handley, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 370; 14 Am. Dec. 140; Parkhurst v. VanCortlandt, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 273; Albea v. Griffin, 2 Dev. & B. Eq. (N. Car.) 9.

The measure of the amount which may be recovered, is the enhancement of the value of the property and not the cost of the improvements. Smoot v. Smoot, 12 Lea (Tenn.) 274; Smithson v. Imnan, 58 Tenn. 88; Tyler v. Fickett, 75 Me. 211. But see McCracken v. McCracken, 88 N. Car. 272, which held that, if the vendor fails to carry out a parol contract for the sale of land, the vendee can recover nothing for improvements made by him upon the land, the defendant making no use of them, and not objecting to their removal.

2. In Kenney v. Brown, 3 Ridgw. P. C. 578, the court, by the Lord Chancellor, said: "As to the equity arising from lasting and valuable improvements, I do not consider a man, who is conscious of a defect in his title, and with that conviction in his mind expends a sum of money in improvements, as entitled in any sort to avail himself of it. If the person really entitled to the estate will encourage the possessor of it to expend his money in improvements, or he will look on and suffer such an expenditure without apprising the party of his intention to dispute his title, and will afterwards endeavor to avail himself of such fraud, upon the ground of fraud, the jurisdiction of a court of equity will clearly attach upon the case. But does it follow from thence, that if a man has acquired an estate by rank and abominable fraud, and shall afterwards expend his money in improving the estate, that, therefore, he shall retain it in his hands against the lawful proprietor? If such a rule should prevail, it will certainly fully justify a proposition which I once heard stated at the bar of the court of chancery, that the common equity of this country was, to improve the right owner out of the possession of his estate."

The following cases support the statement of the text: Boeken v. Alderman, 26 Kan. 738; Patrick v. Marshall, 2 Bibb (Ky.) 45; 4 Am. Dec. 670; Ormsby v. Hutton, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 298; Barlow v. Bell, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 246; 10 Am. Dec. 731; Howe v. Logwood, 3 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 389; Pugh v. Bell, 1 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 404; Baltimore v. McKim, 3 Bland (Md.) 453; Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 602; 7 Am. Dec. 559.

A fraudulent possessor is never allowed for beneficial improvements. Van Horne v. Fonda, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 416; Long v. Finger, 74 N. Car. 502.

In Rainer v. Huddleston, 4 Heisk. (Tenn.) 226, the court, by Nicholson, C. J., said: "It is well settled that, when a bona fide possessor of land has made improvements thereon, and the owner comes into a court of equity for an account of the rents and profits, the upon the terms of the statute providing for their levy and collection. Unless there be special provisions to the contrary, it is the one who holds the legal title.¹ As between the parties, however, the one in possession—whether vendor or vendee—is liable,² unless defendant will be allowed to deduct therefrom the full amount of all ameliorations and improvements which he has beneficially made upon the estate." See also McKim v. Moody, 1 Rand. (Va.) 58.

Where the vendee refuses to carry out the contract, the vendor not being in fault, the former cannot offset the value of his improvements against the latter's claim for use and occupation. Guthrie v. Holt, 9 Baxt. (Tenn.) 527. See also IMPROVEMENTS, vol. 10, p. 242.

1. Burroughs on Taxation (1877), § 98; Perry on Trusts (4th ed.), § 331.

In Latrobe v. Baltimore, 19 Md. 21, the court, by Cochran, J., said: "That taxes assessed upon a trust estate constitute a legal cause of action against the holder of the legal title, we do not doubt, for at law the legal estate in the hands of a trustee has the legal incidents and obligations of an absolute title, subject only to the claims in equity of the cestui que trust."

The following cases also support the text: Miner v. Pingree, 110 Mass. 47; Wright v. Cradelbaugh, 3 Nev. 341; Greene v. Mumford, 4 R. I. 313; Webb v. Burlington, 28 Vt. 188.

In Willard v. Blount, 11 Ired. (N. Car.) 624, the court, by Pearson, J., said: "Land, then, is taxed according to its fee-simple value, and whoever is owner of land for the time being is bound to pay the tax. If the estate is divided by giving a particular estate to one—the remainder to another—as, if an estate is limited to A for life or for ten years, remainder to B and his heirs, the valuation is assessed without reference to this division, and each must pay the tax, during the time he is owner and enjoys possession and pertainancy of the profits."

Under a statute, providing that "the owner of property on the first day of April, in any year, shall be liable for the taxes of that year, and the purchaser of property on the first day of April shall be considered as the owner on that day, a vendor who sells real estate after the first day of April, in the absence of a special contract to the contrary, is liable for taxes for that year. McClure v. Campbell, 25 Neb. 57.

2. Cooley on Taxation (2d ed.), p. 467; Lathers v. Keogh, 109 N. Y. 583.

In Hall v. Denckla, 28 Ark. 515, the court, by Bennett, J., said: "The land was sold in 1859 for taxes of 1858. Lyon bought the land and took possession October 5, 1857. By law he was bound for the taxes, and it was an attempted fraud to suffer them to be sold and to buy them in. That would be to take advantage of his own wrong. A vendee is bound to pay all tax assessments on land after sale. But it is urged that the vendor, by terms of his bond, was bound, upon payment of the purchase-money, to make and execute 'a good and sufficient deed, clear of all incumbrances,' and that this could not be done while the taxes accruing after making the bond and before the execution of the deed, remained unpaid. These taxes, however, arose after, and were liens or incumbrances subsequent to the sale. The obligation of the vendor was to convey the property clear of any incumbrance placed thereon by himself or on his account, and not those arising on the account of the vendee. Taxes against the property existing at the time of the sale; mortgages made by the vendor, whether before or after; judgments against him or any former owner, he, of course, would have to meet and satisfy; but not mortgages made by the vendee, nor judgments against him or other liens created by his act, or failure to discharge his liabilities. The vendor is not responsible for anything done or omitted in relation to the title by the vendee, nor is he bound to covenant against liens arising by reason of his failure to discharge his duty." In Fitzgerald v. Spain, 30 Ark. 100, the court, by Williams, J., said: "A vendee in possession under a title bond, in the enjoyment of rents and profits, or having power to enjoy them, is so far bound to pay taxes, as to preclude him from acquiring title, directly or indirectly, from or under a sale for taxes, which accrued while he was so under obligation to pay."

In July, 1864, A sold his real estate to B upon the following terms: A was to give B possession on the last day of March, 1865, and to give a good and sufficient title unincumbered. There it is otherwise stipulated,¹ and, if the one not in possession is compelled to pay them, he has a remedy over against the other. A vendor who has thus been forced to pay taxes may withhold conveyance until reimbursed.² He is liable himself in any event, however, for taxes due which had become a lien previous to the contract of sale.³

were to be several payments, the last to be on the last day of March, 1865. In November, 1864, a township county tax was levied on the land in the name of A, and in January, 1865, other taxes were levied. In December, 1865, A paid all these taxes, and afterward sought to recover the amounts paid from B. The court said that A "was liable for the taxes, and that they could have been recovered from him by due course of law. He was the legal owner of the estate when they were levied, and he was the equitable or real owner during the same period, receiving the rents and profits up to the last day of March, 1865, when he was to give a good and sufficient title, and deliver possession. The title was to be unincumbered, and this could only be done by his paying these liens, which he finally did. He has, therefore, no claim, either legal, equitable, or moral, upon this defendant for the liens so paid him." Densmore v. Haggerty, 59 Pa. St. 189.

The vendee in possession is liable for all taxes assessed on the land, although the vendor agrees to give him, at a certain time, a good deed. Farber v. Purdy, 69 Mo. 601.

Where the land is vacant, a vendee who has fully performed everything to be done on his part, must pay the taxes. Sherman v. Savery, 2 Fed. Rep. 505.

1. The law determines the taxes to be paid by each party, when real estate is sold, in the absence of any special agreement between the parties concerning them. Everett v. Dilley, 39 Kan. 73.

In an agreement to exchange real estate for bank stock, the stipulation, "taxes of 1875 to be paid by owners respectively," applies to the property each is selling, and not to what each is receiving. Morrison v. Wasson, 79 Ind. 477.

A purchaser, on accepting the deed of an ungraded lot in a city, said to the vendor: "You have to pay for the filling in;" to which the reply was: "All right, I will pay it." In an action by the purchaser, to recover the amount of an assessment subsequently laid for the filling, and paid by the plaintiff, it was held that the defendant was liable, whether the proceedings under which the assessment was laid were regular or not. McCormick v. Cheevers, 124 Mass. 262.

Where the owner of a lot subject to a street assessment, conveys a part by a warranty deed, and subsequently conveys the remainder by a warranty deed, except as to such assessment, the liability for such assessment rests on the part last conveyed. Michaels v. Keane (Wash. 1894), 36 Pac. Rep. 681.

A contract made August fourth, provided that the deed which was executed August twenty-third should convey certain property, "free and clear from all incumbrances," except certain mortgages, and that "the calculations and adjustments of the exact amounts, to be paid as to rents, interest, etc., shall be made the same as if this contract were actually carried out on September first, at 12 M." An annual tax was assessed at the time of the execution of the contract, but was not confirmed until August twenty-ninth. On the day of the execution of the deed, an adjustment of rents, interest, gas charges, and insurance premiums was made without regard to any taxes. It was held that the vendor was under no obligation as to this tax. Lathers v. Keogh, 109 N. Y. 583.

Where a party who purchased land at a clerk and master's sale, has afterward been compelled to pay the taxes then due upon the property, such payment not being considered voluntary or officious in the sense of the law, the purchaser may recover of the former owner the amount so expended in

The one who thus pays taxes due, as between the parties, by the other, has only a personal remedy; he has no lien on the land.¹

2. ACQUIRING ADVERSE INTERESTS.—The relation between the vendor and purchaser is so far confidential, that neither can assert against the other an adverse title to the property.² Where a vendee or vendor, not in possession, thus attempts to set up an adverse title, the case rests upon the general principles of estoppel, and facts must exist to sufficiently bring it within them.³

The relation of a vendee in possession to his vendor, is closely analogous to that of landlord and tenant. Having been put into possession, he is estopped to deny the title of the vendor under whom he holds,⁴ unless such a step is necessary to prevent eviction,

Parties who have obtained possession of lands from their grantor, cannot afterward repudiate his title, and all releases thereafter procured by them to cure defects in the title of such grantor must be held to have been obtained in support of, and not for the destruction of, such title. Wilkinson v. Green, 34 Mich. 221.

A, having taken possession under B, is not at liberty to repudiate his title afterward; and all releases obtained by A to cover defects in the title, must be held to have been obtained in support of B's title, and not for its destruction. Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank v. Bronson, 14 Mich. 369.

In Cromwell v. Craft, 47 Miss. 60, the court, by Tarbell, J., said: "No doctrine is better settled than that, having recognized a title by purchase and the acceptance of possession thereunder, the purchaser shall do nothing to the prejudice thereof, so long as the relation continues." See also Aston v. Robinson, 49 Miss. 353.

In Kirkpatrick v. Miller, 50 Miss. 521, the court, by Simrall, J., said: "If, in good faith, the purchaser has laid out his money to extinguish an incumbrance, or to procure a conveyance of paramount title, while he cannot assert such incumbrance or conveyance to defeat the title accepted from his vendor, yet, since the outlay was necessary for the support and protection of his right and possession, the vendor shall pay it back. The doctrine rests upon this footing; the vendor is under a covenant to warrant and defend the title to the vendee, his heirs and assigns. Such covenant includes the idea of quiet enjoyment. But the vendee, by timely interposition, has bought in a title or incumbrance which would have swept away his possession, and has thereby kept the covenant of the vendor unbroken. He has done what was necessary for his own safety, and what was incumbent primarily on the vendor. If he had waited until a recovery had, then he could have pursued his covenant, and recovered the price paid for the land." See also Wade v. Thompson, 52 Miss. 367.

In Austin v. McKinney, 5 Lea (Tenn.) 499, the court, by Freeman, J., said: "If a vendee is in possession, either by deed or by contract to convey, and has not been evicted, but purchases in a better outstanding title, it inures to the benefit of the vendor, and all he can ask is to be reimbursed his outlay in obtaining the title, not exceeding the value of the land." See also Casey v. Hanrick, 69 Tex. 44.

An after-acquired title in the name of the vendee, will inure to the benefit of the vendor. The former is, however, entitled to recover what he paid for it with interest, if it was needed to protect and perfect his title. Thredgill v. Pintard, 12 How. (U. S.) 24; Lewis v. Boskins, 27 Ark. 61; Peay v. Capps, 27 Ark. 160; Stephens v. Black, 77 Pa. St. 138.

3. ESTOPPEL, vol. 7, p. 1.

4. In Roe v. Doe, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 290, the court, by Swayne, J., said: "If a contract stipulates for possession by the vendee, or the vendor puts him in possession, he holds as a licensee. The relation of landlord and tenant does in which case he may attorn to a stranger.¹ These principles hold, however, only in cases involving the right of possession; not subsist between the parties. The characteristic feature of that relation is wanting. The vendee pays nothing for the enjoyment of the property. The case comes within the category of a license. In such cases the vendee cannot dispute the title of the vendor, any more than the lessee can question the title of his lessor. The assignee of the vendee is as much bound by the estoppel as the vendee himself."

In Ormond v. Martin, 37 Ala. 602, the court, by Walker, J., said: "Where a party enters into the possession of land, under a bond conditioned to make titles when the purchase-money is paid, his possession, so long as the purchase-money remains unpaid, is held to be in subordination to the title of the vendor, and in an action by the latter for the recovery of the land, the vendee cannot claim the protection of the Statute of Limitations on the ground of adverse possession under color of title. But when the vendee has complied with the terms of the contract on his part, by paying the purchase-money, such a bond is color of title; and if he thereafter remain in possession, claiming the land as his own, for the period prescribed by the Statute of Limitations, the legal title will be barred." See also Harris v. King, 16 Ark. 122; Harral v. Levery, 50 Conn. 46; 47 Am. Rep. 608.

He who has the title to land, is to be deemed to be in the seisin and possession of it, and to continue so until ousted thereof by an actual possession in another under a claim of right. The possession of one who enters disclaiming title, is to be considered as a possession by the consent of him who has the title; nor will a continuance of this possession avail to mature a title under the Statute of Limitations, until the character of the possession has been changed, either by a declaration to that effect, communicated to him who has the title, or by the exercise of acts of ownership, inconsistent with a tenancy by the consent of him who has the title. Stamper v. Griffin, 20 Ga. 312. See also Greeno v. Munson, 9 Vt. 37; 31 Am. Dec. 605.

In Ripley v. Yale, 18 Vt. 220, the court, by Williams, C. J., said: "While there subsists any contract, express or implied, for the purchase of the title, between the parties in and out of possession, the possession cannot be adverse.

The extent of the possessor's claim is measured by his contract; he cannot dispute the title of the person under whom he purchases, but holds subservient to him; and until he does some unequivocal act, to manifest a repudiation of the contract and bring this home to the knowledge of the other party, he cannot be considered as holding adverse to the person under whom he took possession; at least, nothing short of this unequivocal act and notice can be considered as constituting an adverse possession in him."

But see, contra, Bright v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 548, where the court, by Marshall, C. J., said: "The vendee acquires the property for himself, and his faith is not pledged to maintain the title of the vendor. The rights of the vendor are intended to be extinguished by the sale, and he has no continuing interest in the maintenance of his title, unless he should be called upon, in consequence of some covenant or warranty in his deed. The property having become, by the sale, the property of the vendee, he has a right to fortify that title by the purchase of any other which may protect him in the quiet enjoyment of the premises. No principle of morality restrains him from doing this; nor is either the letter or spirit of the contract violated by it."

In Green v. Dietrich, 114 Ill. 636, the court, by Scott, J., said: "The vendee is under no obligation to maintain his vendor's title, and there is no policy of law that forbids the vendee in possession to buy an outstanding title to the premises, and assert it against his vendor, otherwise it might be asserted by the owner, or a stranger might buy it, and it would be lost to both." To the same effect is Jackson v. Johnson, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 74; 15 Am. Dec. 433.

A vendee in possession, whose vendor conveys to another in violation of his contract, is absolved, and may deny the title he entered under, and purchase and defend under any other claim. Logan v. Steele, 7 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 102; 86 Am. Dec. 83. This applies to a purchase at tax sale, although the one buying in the title was not bound to pay the tax. Johnston v. Smith, 70 Ala. 108; Harkreader v. Clayton, 56 Miss. 383; 31 Am. Rep. 369.

they have no application, for instance, where suit is brought to recover the purchase-money, where want of title may be a complete defense.¹

f. FURNISHING ABSTRACT—(See also ABSTRACT OF TITLE, vol. 1, p. 46; TITLE (REAL PROPERTY), vol. 26, p. 20).—It is a common custom, in the carrying out of sales of land, to furnish an abstract of title.² In England it may be required by the vendee, but in the United States the law is otherwise.³ Even if it is customary to furnish one, it cannot be legally demanded, unless provided for in the contract,⁴ as in case the parties stipulate that furnishing it shall be a condition precedent.⁵ The difference in the law in this regard, in the two countries, probably proceeds out of the fact that in England, the burden of proving title is on the vendor, while in the United States, invalidity of title is on a matter of defense, to be alleged and proved by the purchaser.⁶

1. A covenant, by the vendors, that they would execute to the purchaser, on a certain day "a good and sufficient conveyance" of a certain lot of land, was held to bind the vendors to convey a good title to the purchaser; and the title of the vendors having been extinguished before the conveyance by sale under a mortgage, although the mortgage existed and was upon record at the time of making the contract, it was held that the purchaser had a right to treat the contract as rescinded, without demanding a conveyance; and that this failure of the vendor's title was a good defense to an action brought to enforce payment of a judgment, obtained upon a note given in part payment of the first installment of the purchase-money; such judgment having been rendered before the extinguishment of the vendor's title by a sale under the mortgage, and consequently at a time when the purchaser had no valid defense. Burwell v. Jackson, 9 N. Y. 535.

2. Abstracts of Title.—In New York, it is customary for the abstract to be made at the vendor's expense. Connelly v. Pierce, 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 131; Carpenter v. Brown, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 149.

3. ABSTRACT OF TITLE, vol. 1, p. 46. In England, it is customary to give an abstract of title to the vendee, but this is not the custom in the United States. It is common, however, to recite the claim of title in the preamble of the deed. Espy v. Anderson, 14 Pa. St. 308.

4. In Alabama, however, an abstract may be demanded in the absence of special agreement. Wade v. Killough, 5 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 450; Chapman v. Lee, 55 Ala. 623.

Where a contract contains the following stipulation, "title to be good, or the money to be refunded, party of the first part to furnish abstract of title to said land," and an abstract is furnished which fails to show good title, money paid by the purchaser may be recovered, even though, as a matter of fact, the title is perfect. Boas v. Farrington, 85 Cal. 535.

A vendor, who has agreed to furnish an abstract as a condition precedent to a part payment of the purchase-money, is absolved from the necessity of doing so, if the purchaser notifies him that he is unable, for want of funds, to comply with the contract. Johnston v. Johnson, 43 Minn. 5.

5. It was held in Howe v. Hutchison, 105 Ill. 501, that if the furnishing of an abstract is made a condition precedent, failure in this regard will justify the purchaser in considering the contract at an end, and the vendor cannot legally demand an extension of time, in order to prepare a second abstract, the first one failing to disclose the title agreed upon.

Where the abstract is placed in the hands of a third party, and notice given to the purchaser that it may be seen there, and no objection is made at the time, the failure to furnish the abstract directly to the purchaser cannot be successfully claimed as a ground of rescission. Papin v. Goodrich, 103 Ill. 86.

6. Martindale on Abstracts of Title (2d ed.), § 5; Blackburn v. Smith, 2

If a "good and sufficient" or "merchantable" abstract is called for by the contract, the one furnished must be in orderly form for perusal, and certified by some person of recognized skill and financial responsibility.¹

If practicable, the abstract should deduce title from the United States or a state government. With the exception of titles derived from Indian tribes and foreign nations, and subsequently ratified by treaty or statute, the government patent or grant is regarded as the ultimate source of the title.² If impracticable to go back to the original source, as is frequently the case in the older communities, the abstract must begin at a point far enough remote to make sure that the Statute of Limitations has run against all adverse interests, bearing in mind that it is generally suspended to preserve the rights of persons under disability. A common period is forty years.³

g. PRODUCTION OF TITLE DEEDS.—While, owing to the registration system, the original title papers are now of minor importance, the right to them is in the vendee, on the completion of the contract, and he can compel their production by a suit in equity.⁴

h. PREPARATION OF THE DEED OF CONVEYANCE.—In England, the duty of preparing the deed and transferring the title rests upon the purchaser;⁵ in the United States, upon the vendor.⁶ Until Exch. 792; Daily v. Litchfield, 10 Mich. 38; Little v. Paddleford, 13 N. H. 167. In Espy v. Anderson, 14 Pa. St. 312, the court, by Coulter, J., said: "The rule is caveat emptor. It is the duty, therefore, of a purchaser to examine for himself. The defendant is not bound to accept a doubtful title, but it is his business to show that it is doubtful or positively bad. In England, it is customary to give to the vendee an abstract of title, but that is not usual here. It is common, however, to recite the chain of title in the preamble to the deed."

1. Warvelle on Vendor and Purchaser, p. 328.

If the agreement be to furnish a "satisfactory" abstract, the word "satisfactory" applies to the abstract only, and constitutes no agreement as to title. This is very clearly so where only a quit-claim deed is called for. Fitch v. Willard, 73 Ill. 92.

A "perfect" abstract is one properly prepared, although it be of a defective title. Blackburn v. Smith, 2 Exch. 792.

2. A title derived from an Indian or Indian tribe, merely extinguishes the rights of the original grantor, but is inoperative for other purposes until confirmed by the government. Such title is held subject to the laws of the Indians, and if they choose to again take the property and to make a different disposition of it, the courts cannot protect the rights before granted. Jackson v. Porter, 1 Paine (U. S.) 457; Johnson v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 543; Mitchel v. U. S., 9 Pet. (U. S.) 711; U. S. v. Fernandez, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 303; U. S. v. Rillieux, 14 How. (U. Titles derived from foreign governments are inchoate until confirmed by our own. U. S. v. Percheman, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 51; U. S. v. Clarke, 9 Pet. (U. S.) 168; Smith v. U. S., 10 Pet. (U. S.) 326; U. S. v. Clarke, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 228; Les Bois v. Bramell, 4 How. (U. S.) 449.

In Cooper v. Brown, 2 McLean (U. S.) 500, the court said: "The rule of the common law, as to the preparation of the deed by the vendee, has not, generally, been adopted in this country. It is not in force in this state (Illinois). The vendor who binds himself to make the conveyance must make it."

In Headley v. Shaw, 39 Ill. 354, the court, by Breese, J., said: "A party contracting to execute and deliver a deed, is bound to prepare the deed, if there be no agreement it shall be prepared by the other party, and the vendor must tender it to the vendee before he can demand the purchase-money. This seems to be the rule as established in all courts of law in this country." In Connelly v. Pierce, 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 131, the court, by Savage, C. J., said: "It may be considered the rule of this court, that when a party covenants to convey, he is not in default until the party who is to receive the conveyance, being entitled thereto, has demanded it, and having waited a reasonable time to have it drawn and executed has made a second demand. In England, the party entitled to the deed is bound to have it drawn and presented for execution; we have not gone so far; the party who is to give the deed, certainly should have it drawn at his own expense. . . . The purchaser, no doubt, may prepare the deed and tender it for execution."

In Sweitzer v. Hummel, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 231, the court, by Tilghman, J., said: "In the present situation of the country, there is no difficulty in preparing a deed of conveyance, and therefore, no pretense for dispensing with what appears to be the plain meaning of the parties; that is to say, that when the seller covenants that he will convey the title to the purchaser (without any mention of such conveyance as the purchaser shall devise, etc.), he shall himself prepare and tender the deed of conveyance." But see, contra, Wade v. Killough, 5 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 450; Chapman v. Lee, 55 Ala. 623; Winter v. Jones, 10 Ga. 190; 54 Am. Dec. 379; Foulson v. Ellis, 60 Pa. St. 134.

But, unless the contract so provides, a vendee has not the right to inspect the vendor's deed before paying the purchase-money. Papin v. Goodrich, 103 Ill. 86.

If a mortgage is to be given back for the purchase-money, the purchaser must draw and proffer the mortgage deed as a part of the necessary tender on his part. Longfellow v. Moore, 102 Ill. 289.

Y.) 48; Adams v. Williams, 2 W. & S. (Pa.) 227; Brown v. Metz, 5 Watts (Pa.) 164; Davidson v. Van Pelt, 15 Wis. 341.

In Thomas v. Lanier, 23 Ark. 639, the court, by Compton, J., said: "It is well settled that where, upon an agreement for the sale and purchase of land, the stipulations by which the vendor undertakes to make title, and the vendee to pay the purchase-money, are dependent, the vendor cannot maintain an action for the purchase-money until he has performed, or offered to perform, his part of the contract."

The plaintiff gave a bond to convey to the defendant a parcel of land, which the defendant had agreed to purchase, and the defendant gave a promissory note on demand, not negotiable, for the amount of the agreed consideration, but took from the plaintiff a receipt stating that if the bargain should be rescinded, the note should be given up, upon the defendant's giving up the ment has been excused by the vendee's words or acts.¹ The vendor must tender a separate deed of each lot sold.²

X. COMPLIANCE WITH THE CONTRACT—1. In General.—The contract for the sale of land is completed by the execution and delivery of a deed by the vendor, and its acceptance by the purchaser.³ These acts annul the antecedent executory agreement, upon which no action can be brought afterward, even though the amount of land conveyed turns out to be less than was stated in the agreement.⁴ In order to have this effect, the deed must be operative.

bond. The bond, note and receipt bore the same date. It was held that these papers constituted one contract; that the contract was valid; and that an action would not lie on the note, without a previous tender of a deed of the land. Hunt v. Livermore, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 395.

A promise to pay a certain price for a lot of land "upon the presentation of the deed," implies tender of deed as a condition precedent to payment. Welch v. Matthews, 98 Mass. 131.

1. Taylor v. Perry, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 599; Jackson v. Speed, 2 Duv. (Ky.) 426. As by giving notice of his refusal to carry out the contract. Crary v. Smith, 2 N. Y. 160.

Where there is a covenant for the sale and purchase of a farm, the conveyance to be made, and the consideration to be paid at a future day, if, previous to the stipulated day, the purchaser gives notice to the vendor that he has made up his mind to abandon the contract, and not accept a deed, it is enough to support an action of covenant by the vendor to allege such notice; and it is not necessary in such case to aver a tender of a deed or readiness to perform. North v. Pepper, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 636.

2. Van Eps v. Schenectady, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 436; 7 Am. Dec. 330.

3. In Herbmont v. Sharp, 2 McCord (S. Car.) 264, the court, by Huger, J., said: "In no case can a sale of lands be regarded as completed, until the purchaser has paid his money and the seller conveyed the land."

An assignment indorsed upon a deed is not sufficient. Bentley v. Defourt, 2 Ohio 221; 15 Am. Dec. 546.

The sale is made at the time the deed is executed and delivered, and notes for, and a mortgage to secure, the price are taken by the grantor, though an oral agreement was reached by the parties thereto. Joseph v. Decatur

In Carter v. Beck, 40 Ala. 606, the court, by Walker, C. J., said: "The acceptance of the defendant's deed by the plaintiff, was a complete execution of the antecedent agreement to convey, and annulled it; and no action at law can be sustained upon it."

In Houghtaling v. Lewis, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 299, the court, by Thompson, J., said: "Articles of agreement for the conveyance of land, are, in their nature, executory, and the acceptance of a deed, in pursuance thereof, is to be deemed, prima facie, an execution of the contract, and the agreement thereby becomes void and of no further effect. Parties may, no doubt, enter into covenants collateral to the deed, or cases may be supposed when the deed would be deemed only a part execution of the contract, if the provisions in the two instruments clearly manifested such to have been the intention of the parties. But the prima facie presumption of law arising from the acceptance of a deed, is that it is an execution of the whole contract; and the rights and remedies of the parties, in relation to such contract, are to be determined by such deed, and the original agreement becomes null and void. This appears to be a sound and salutary rule."

Articles of agreement for the purchase of land become merged in the conveyance, and are thenceforth null and void; there being no allegation of fraud or mistake in the execution of the conveyance. Creigh v. Beelin, 1 W. & S. (Pa.) 83.

In Shontz v. Brown, 27 Pa. St. 131, the court, by Woodward, J., said: "A

If insufficient, the vendee is not precluded by it from afterward objecting to it on this ground.¹ If it merely fails to conform to the contract, he cannot afterward object if he said nothing at the time, or refused to carry out the contract upon another ground.² If the contract is not carried out through the refusal of the purchaser to accept a deed of such part of the land as the vendor can convey, the vendor may transfer the land to another, the purchaser's only remedy being a suit for damages against his vendor.³

2. Execution and Delivery of the Deed—(See also ACKNOWLEDGMENT, vol. 1, p. 143; DEEDS OF CONVEYANCE, vol. 5, p. 423).—The deed, having been prepared by the vendor,⁴ must be duly title bond that looks to a future conveyance, is executed by a conveyance made in good faith and to the satisfaction of the parties—does the bond survive? Clearly not. When a condition is performed it is thenceforth merged and gone. The presumption of law is that the acceptance of a deed in pursuance of articles is a satisfaction of all previous covenants, and where the conveyance contains none of the usual covenants, the law supposes that the grantee agreed to take the title at his risk. And though, in special circumstances, a deed may be considered, not as a merger of prior articles, but only as part performance, yet the general rule is that a purchase is consummated by the conveyance; after which the parties have no recourse to each other except for imposition, or fraud, or upon the covenants in the deed.⁵

A covenant in an agreement to sell and convey land, that the premises "shall be free and clear from all incumbrances," is merged in the deed delivered and accepted in accordance with the agreement, and the only remedy for breach of the contract is upon the covenant in the deed; and this is true, though the agreement is made by one person and the deed by another. Carr v. Roach, 2 Duer (N. Y.) 20.

But a guaranty of title is not merged in a subsequent conveyance which contains only a special warranty. Drinker v. Byers, 2 P. & W. (Pa.) 528.

A contract, by the vendor, to give immediate possession, is distinct from the covenants of the deed thereafter made, and is not merged therein. Williams v. Frybarger (Ind. App. 1894), 37 N. E. Rep. 302.

A deed of conveyance of real estate does not merge in a second deed between the same parties for the same estate. Kenrick v. Smick, 7 W. & S. (Pa.) 41.

The title of the obligor, in a bond for the conveyance of real estate, is not affected by a deed of such estate tendered by him, and which was never accepted by the purchaser nor delivered to him. Cole v. Gill, 14 Iowa 527.

1. The mere fact that the defendants, who were entitled, by the condition of a contract, to a legal conveyance of real estate, accepted a paper purporting to be a deed, would not constitute a performance of such condition by the plaintiff. They would not be concluded from objecting to its sufficiency. Thompson v. Richards, 14 Mich. 172.

2. Kenniston v. Blakie, 121 Mass. 552; Stryker v. Vanderbilt, 25 N. J. L. 482.

Although a deed tendered may not conform to the terms of the contract, yet, if the vendee makes no objection to it, either for form or substance, but merely says that he is unable to pay for the land, he thereby waives all objections to the deed, and cannot take advantage of its failure to conform to the contract when he is sued for possession. Moak v. Bryant, 51 Miss. 560. See also Morgan v. Stearns, 40 Cal. 434; Dresel v. Jordan, 104 Mass. 407.

It has been held that, if the deed is objectionable in substance, or fails to conform to the agreement, the vendee must prepare a deed and tender it for execution before the vendor can be put in default. Hackett v. Huson, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 249.

3. Dorn v. Dunham, 24 Tex. 366.

A purchaser cannot be required to accept a deed for a tract of land when the vendee is without title, reasonably free from doubt, to one-half thereof. Black Hills Nat. Bank v. Kellogg (S. Dak. 1893), 56 N. W. Rep. 1071.

executed by him and delivered.¹ He has, if no time is stipulated, a reasonable time after demand.² The delivery of the deed and the payment of the purchase-money are to be, unless otherwise stipulated, contemporaneous acts,³ and neither party is in default without performance or tender on the part of the other.⁴

Where the contract was, on the part of one to convey, and on the other to pay at a future time, it was held that the former was bound on demand, and could not rightfully withhold the deed until the term of credit had elapsed. Eveleth v. Scribner, 12 Me. 24; 28 Am. Dec. 147.

In More v. Smedburgh, 8 Paige (N. Y.) 607, Walworth, Ch., said: "As a general rule, if a vendor receives payment of a part of the purchase-money, after the time of payment fixed by the terms of the agreement has expired, or if the vendee continues in possession, under the agreement, long after the time specified therein for giving the deed, a court of equity may consider a strict performance at the day as waived. And the party, who has thus waived a literal performance of the terms of the agreement, will not afterward be permitted to insist upon a forfeiture, without notice to the other party, and giving him a reasonable time to perform on his part." See also Porter v. Montgomery, 26 Minn. 118.

A promise to make a title in "a short time," is not fulfilled by tendering a deed nearly two years afterward, and after the purchaser had abandoned the land. Hussey v. Roquemore, 27 Ala. 281.

Where the vendor covenants to convey, "in a reasonable time after request," a request for the deed without the production of the bond will be good. Hill v. Hobart, 16 Me. 164.

The condition of a bond "that if, within one year from the date, upon request of the said B, etc., the said A B shall make and deliver to the said B a good and valid deed," etc., is broken by a refusal to convey within a reasonable time after such request, made at any time within the year. Brown v. Clough, 39 Me. 566.

The seller must offer to convey a perfect title by a deed tendered, in order to entitle him to recover the purchase-money. Small v. Reeves, 14 Ind. 163.

Where a contract clearly expresses the intention that payment of the price of land shall precede the conveyance, an action for the price may be brought without a conveyance or tender thereof. Loud v. Pomona Land, etc., Co., 153 U. S. 564.

In Headley v. Shaw, 39 Ill. 354, the court, by Breese, J., said: "A party contracting to execute and deliver a deed, is bound to prepare the deed, if there be no agreement it shall be prepared by the other party, and the vendor must tender it to the vendee before he can demand the purchase-money. This seems to be the rule as established in all courts of law in this country." See also Longworth v. Conwell, 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 469.

Hence, the vendee cannot claim that he is not in default on the ground that no time was given him for inspecting the deed.¹ He will not be held to have waived his right of objection to the deed, however, unless he has been given an opportunity for examination.² The deed becomes operative only on accept-

Where a bond has been executed by the vendor, to make a deed upon the payment of the purchase-money, he is not bound to make a deed until all the purchase-money is paid; and hence, if the purchase-money is payable in installments, falling due at different times, he may proceed in law or equity to collect any of the installments after they are due, except the last, without offering to make a deed. Terry v. George, 37 Miss. 539.

In Robb v. Montgomery, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 20, the court, by Spencer, J., said: "I consider the distinction to be clearly settled between dependent and independent covenants or promises. In the first case, the conveyance and payment are to be simultaneous acts, and there then must be an existing capacity in the one who is to convey, to give a good title; in the other case, where the payments are to precede the conveyance, it is no excuse for non-payment that there is not a present existing capacity to convey a good title, unless the one whose duty it is to pay, offers to do so on receiving a good title, and then it must be made to him, or the contract will be rescinded."

But if the vendee is beyond the jurisdiction, no tender is necessary. Watson v. Sawyers, 54 Miss. 64. So, also, if the vendee has incapacitated himself from performing certain conditions precedent. Miller v. Whittier, 32 Me. 203; Carpenter v. Brown, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 147.

If no place is fixed for the delivery of the deed, the vendor is bound to seek the vendee and tender it. Or, if the vendee appoints a place, the vendor may tender the deed there. Franchot v. Leach, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 506. The tender need not be absolute. If the deed be duly executed, it may be tendered on condition that the vendee executes the purchase-money notes and mortgage as agreed. Huff v. Lawler, 45 Ind. 80. The vendee, in order to maintain a suit against his vendor, must tender the purchase price, make a demand for a deed, and give the vendor a reasonable time to make it, and present himself to receive it. Eames

v. Savage, 14 Mass. 425; Newcomb v. Brackett, 16 Mass. 161; Fuller v. Hubbard, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 13; Fuller v. Williams, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 54. And when the vendor dies the same demand must be made, and time allowed to his representatives. Fuller v. Williams, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 54; 16 Am. Dec. 423.

1. Inspection of Deed.—In Papin v. Goodrich, 103 Ill. 86, it appeared that a vendor claimed to have his deed ready but refused to show it to the purchaser, who had the money with which to make payment, if on inspecting the deed it should prove to be satisfactory. The court said: "Had Papin, or those representing him, the right to inspect the deed of Goodrich for the property before paying the $35,000? It has been seen that the contract contains no provision to that effect, and that even the execution of a deed is not expressly provided for, but is simply inferred as a conclusion of law; but that inference is also that the money is first to be paid. Until after that is done, possession is not to be given, and no legal duty arises to execute a deed. Clearly there can be no right to inspect a deed before there is a legal duty on the opposite party to have it made, and ready to be delivered. An offer was made to prove that there was a custom in Chicago to afford purchasers an opportunity to inspect the deed before requiring them to make payment. This was properly excluded by the court. There was no offer to prove that it was uniform, long established, generally acquiesced in, and so well known as to induce the belief that the parties contracted with reference to it. Turner v. Dawson, 50 Ill. 85; Packard v. Van Schoick, 58 Ill. 81. Besides, it is impossible there could be a custom to allow a party to inspect a deed at a time when there is no legal duty to have such deed made and ready to be delivered."

2. The mere failure of the purchaser to object to the sufficiency of a deed, when informed by his vendor that the deed was ready for delivery on the appointed day, does not estop him from afterward insisting that the vendor was ance.¹ In order to be good, either as a compliance with the contract or as a tender, the deed must be that of the vendor, and not that of a third person.² Conveying title to the purchaser, or to another at his request,³ must be regular in form,⁴ and convey unable to comply with all the stipulations of his contract, when it is not shown that he ever saw the deed. McKleroy v. Tulane, 34 Ala. 78.

1. Thus, if delivered to a party to hold in escrow, and wrongfully placed by him on record, the rights of the vendor are not affected, even though the purchaser conveys the property, while in possession of the vendor, to a third party with notice. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. McCullough, 59 Ill. 166.

But an offer by a vendor, to convey other lands of the same kind as those he has agreed to convey, is not a compliance with the contract. Bell v. Hutchings, 86 Ga. 562.

2. Crabtree v. Levings, 53 Ill. 526. If the vendor, on discovering that he has no title to a portion of the land, promises to "make a valid deed" thereto, the vendee is not bound to accept the deed of a stranger, which, though it conveyed a good title, might yet involve the trouble and expense of an inquiry to ascertain its validity; he has a right to stand on the terms of his contract. Hussey v. Roquemore, 27 Ala. 282.

But the title to the property need not be in the obligor's name at the time he makes the contract, if, at the time for closing it, he was ready to transfer a good and valid title and deed. Flanagan v. Fox (City Ct.), 25 N. Y. Supp. 514.

A bond for "a deed of conveyance in fee of the legal title," means a "good and sufficient" conveyance with the usual covenants of the vendor, and not of a stranger. Equity will not, in contracts of this nature, compel a vendee to pay money when his vendor cannot make him a title. Rudd v. Savelli, 44 Ark. 145.

In Dresel v. Jordan, 104 Mass. 415, the court, by Wells, J., said: "The equitable rule is established by numerous authorities, that where time is not of the essence of the contract, and is not made material by the offer to fulfill by the other party, and request for a conveyance, the seller will be allowed reasonable time and opportunity to perfect his title, however defective it may have been at the time of the agreement. And in all cases it is sufficient for the seller, upon a contract made in good faith, if he is able to make the stipulated title at the time when, by the terms of his agreement or by the equities of the particular case, he is required to make the conveyance, in order to entitle himself to the consideration." But see Bateman v. Johnson, 10 Wis. 1.

A contract to convey, or cause it to be done, is the same, in legal effect, as a contract to convey by the obligor, unless it is stipulated that the title is to be made by a third party. Gaar v. Lockridge, 9 Ind. 92.

Where the agreement is that the deed shall be executed by another, it must be made by that other. Carpenter v. Bailey, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 244.

Where the obligation is to be void if the principal obligor and E, his wife, in a convenient time after she comes of age, shall execute and deliver the title to certain lands which, in the condition, are recited as land of the wife, sold by the husband, the agreement binds the obligors to procure a conveyance in fee by the wife, and not merely her dower estate. Pinkston v. Hine, 9 Ala. 252.

3. Athens v. Nale, 25 Ill. 195.

Under a bond to convey lands to the obligee, his heirs or assigns, a conveyance to a third party, upon the verbal request of the obligee to that effect, is a performance of the condition of the bond, and will be so held, notwithstanding that, after such conveyance, the obligee assigns the bond to a fourth party. Burt v. Henry, 10 Ala. 874.

Deed to Assignees.—The vendor in an agreement for the sale of land, is not required to search for the assignees of the purchaser to tender a deed of conveyance. It is sufficient if he tenders it to the purchaser. If the agreement is assigned, the assignee should make a demand of the vendor for a conveyance within a reasonable time; if they do not do so, they cannot claim specific performance. Hedenberg v. Jones, 73 Ill. 149.

The vendor, having given a bond for title, received the money, and placed the vendee in possession, has no concern with the subsequent transactions of the vendee, or those who represent him. He may refuse to convey to any one unless he shows a regular chain of assignments. Wright v. Thompson, 14 Tex. 558.

4. In Hoffman v. Fett, 39 Cal. 112, the estate agreed upon.¹ It must be free from conditions and restrictions,² and must be executed by all the obligors,³ in favor of all the obligees.⁴ It is immaterial, so far as the requisites of the deed are concerned, whether it is to be made to the original vendee or his assignee.⁵

a. COVENANTS — (See also COVENANT, vol. 4, p. 463; IMPLIED COVENANTS, vol. 9, p. 960; INCUMBRANCES, vol. 10, p. 361; REAL COVENANTS, vol. 19, p. 973). — As to what covenants, if any, must be contained in the deed of conveyance, the decisions in the various states differ. A quitclaim deed passes all the right, title, and interest, as effectually, in one sense, as a technical deed of bargain and sale,⁶ and some authorities consider that it is the court, by Temple, J., said: "If there was a sale, and the conditions of the sale have been fully performed on the part of the purchaser, it will be presumed that the vendor undertook to make such a conveyance as will render the sale effectual."

It must be sufficient under the statutes defining what is necessarily contained in a deed. Parker v. McAllister, 14 Ind. 12. See also Moore v. Bickham, 4 Binn. (Pa.) 1.

1. A tender by the plaintiff, of a deed conveying an estate by metes and bounds, but not containing the words, "all my right, title, interest and enjoyments," which words were in a previous agreement to convey, is sufficient. Brown v. Bellows, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 179.

A covenant to convey a farm of land means the whole farm, and will not be satisfied by a conveyance of part only. Jones v. Gardner, 10 Johns. (N.Y.) 266.

A covenant to convey land, together with a right to erect a dam and overflow land of the vendor, is not satisfied by a deed of the land making no mention of the easement. Wilson v. McNeal, 10 Watts (Pa.) 422.

2. McGlynn v. Maynz, 104 Mass. 263. An agreement to convey land subject to a mortgage, to be assumed by the grantee as part of the consideration, is not complied with by conveying subject to a condition that the grantee shall indemnify the grantor against the mortgage. Dresel v. Jordan, 104 Mass. 407.

3. Johnson v. Collins, 20 Ala. 435. Even though the title is in one alone. Hill v. Hobart, 16 Me. 164.

An agreement by tenants in common of land, to give "a good and sufficient warranty deed" thereof, is complied with by a deed in which each warrants his title to his own share only. Coe v. Harahan, 8 Gray (Mass.) 198.

4. An agreement to execute and deliver a deed to A, B and C, is not satisfied by the tender of a deed in favor of A, B. & Co. McMurray v. Fletcher, 24 Kan. 574.

5. When the vendee has contracted for the purchase of land, and sold it to another, the latter will be entitled to receive from the first vendor the same kind of deed which he contracted to give his vendee, if the latter purchaser elects to resort to him for conveyance. Gibbs v. Blackwell, 37 Ill. 191.

6. COVENANTS. — Butterfield v. Smith, 11 Ill. 485; Brady v. Spurck, 27 Ill. 478; Delavan v. Duncan, 49 N. Y. 487; Carter v. Wise, 39 Tex. 273.

In Morgan v. Clayton, 61 Ill. 40, the court, by Scott, J., said: "A quitclaim deed will as effectually pass the title, and covenants running with the land, as a deed of bargain and sale, if the deed itself contains no words restricting its meaning."

In Rowe v. Beckett, 30 Ind. 162; 95 Am. Dec. 676, the court, by Gregory, J., said: "A quitclaim deed is as effectual to convey land, as a deed with full covenants."

In Nicholson v. Caress, 45 Ind. 485, the court, by Buskirk, J., said: "The general principle is well settled that a grantor, conveying by deed of bargain and sale, and by way of release or quitclaim of all his right and title to a tract of land, if made in good faith and without any fraudulent representations, is not responsible for the goodness of the title beyond the covenants in his deed; and that a deed of this character purports to convey, and is understood to convey, nothing more than the interest or estate of which the grantor is seised or possessed at the all that can be demanded under a contract which does not specify any particular kind of deed,¹ or which merely provides that the conveyance shall be by "good and sufficient deed."² But a quitclaim deed only passes the present title of the grantor, who can hold beneficially any after-acquired estate.³ Other authorities, therefore, require that there shall be tendered a general warranty,⁴ time, and does not operate to pass or bind an interest not then in existence. The principle deducible from the authorities seems to be that, whatever may be the form or nature of the conveyance used to pass real property, if the grantor sets forth on the face of the instrument, by way of recital or averment, that he is seised or possessed of a particular estate in the premises, and which estate the deed purports to convey, or, what is the same thing, if the seisin or possession of a particular estate is affirmed in the deed, either in express terms or by necessary implication, the grantor and all persons in privity with him shall be estopped from ever afterward denying that he was so seised and possessed at the time he made the conveyance."

In Kyle v. Kavanagh, 103 Mass. 356; 4 Am. Rep. 360, the agreement was that the vendor should give a good title. The purchaser insisted that, under this agreement, he was entitled to a warranty deed. The court thought otherwise, and said that, under the statute a deed of quitclaim passed all the estate which the grantor would convey by a deed of bargain and sale, and that if the grantor had in fact a good title, it was conveyed by his deed of quitclaim as effectually as by a deed of warranty; and cited Gazley v. Price, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 267; Ketchum v. Evertson, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 359; Potter v. Tuttle, 22 Conn. 512. See also Freeman v. McGaw, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 82; Russell v. Coffin, 8 Pick. In Bagley v. Fletcher, 44 Ark. 160, the court, by Smith, J., said: "In England, we understand the law to be that a deed of release can never operate technically as a conveyance per se, but only by way of enlargement of a previous estate. . . . But in this country, a quitclaim deed is a substantive mode of conveyance, and is as effectual to carry all the right, title, interest, claim and estate of the grantor, as a deed of full covenants, although the grantee has no possession or prior interest in the land. It is almost the only mode in practice where the vendor does not wish to warrant the title." But see notes immediately following.

In Church v. Brown, 15 Ves. 263, the court, by Eldon, L. Ch., said: "If a man covenants to sell a fee-simple estate, free from all incumbrances, and says no more, it is clear that covenant carries in gremio, and in the bosom of it, the right to proper covenants. Why? Because that sort of engagement has, in all time, been carried into execution in a form and mode, which alters almost materially, substantially and importantly the effect of the mere conveyance. If no more is done than the agreement imports, the conveyance contains express covenants; the words operating warranties and obligations, which it was not understood between the person's contracting that the one was to undertake, and and still others, either a general or special warranty deed.¹ Another class of decisions takes the view that all contracts should be construed in the light of surrounding circumstances and in view of local customs, and holds that the deed must contain the covenants usual in instruments passing the fee in use in the vicinity of the land.² Special agreements as to what covenants are to be contained in the deed are to be given full effect.³ If for "usual covenants" they call for a deed with covenants of seisin, that the

the other to have the benefit of; and accordingly, it is perfectly settled by the law what are the covenants as applied to the case of a vendor, who was himself a purchaser for valuable consideration."

In Herryford v. Turner, 67 Mo. 298, the court, by Hough, J., said: "It seems to be generally maintained by the authorities that, upon an agreement for the sale of lands, in the absence of express stipulations to the contrary, the vendor is to be considered as contracting for a general warranty."

In Tarenner v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 681, the court, by Green, J., said: "The undisputed law is that, as a general rule, upon an agreement for the sale of land, the vendor, though nothing be said in the contract on the subject, is considered as contracting for a general warranty. 'With respect to the persons who are bound to enter into these covenants, it may be observed, in general, that all persons who convey lands whereof they are seised to their own use, are bound to enter into the usual covenants for the title of the land conveyed. But where the estate is sold by trustees under a will, a purchaser is not entitled to covenants for the title. And the same rule applies where an estate is sold under an order of a court of equity.'"

According to this line of authorities, an agreement for a "good and sufficient deed," entitles the vendee to a warranty deed. Clute v. Robinson, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 595; Van Eps v. Schenectady, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 436; 7 Am. Dec. 330; Tremain v. Liming, Wright (Ohio) 644.

So if the contract is for a "sufficient conveyance." Clark v. Lyons, 25 Ill. 90.

The rule applies only where the grantor sells his own land. A mortgagee or trustee, who offers to sell under a mortgage or deed of trust, is expected only to covenant against the grantor's own acts. Faircloth v. Isler, 75 N. Car. 551.

1. In Lloyd v. Farrell, 48 Pa. St. 78; 86 Am. Dec. 83, the court, by Strong, J., said: "The purchaser of a perfect right is not entitled to anything more than a covenant against the acts of the grantor and his heirs—that is, a covenant of special warranty."

A contract for the sale of land, by which the vendor agrees to "make a sufficient title, as far as his claim extends on said lands," binds the vendor to warrant, especially against his own acts. Gilchrist v. Buie, 1 Dev. & B. Eq. (N. Car.) 346.

A covenant to make "a good and lawful deed, clear of all incumbrances," is satisfied by a deed of special warranty, where the parties express their meaning to be "only a warranty deed subject to all the demands of the Commonwealth." Withers v. Baird, 7 Watts (Pa.) 227; 32 Am. Dec. 754.

An agreement to convey by "warranty deed" has been construed to mean a special warranty deed. Espy v. Anderson, 14 Pa. St. 312.

In Cadwalader v. Tryon, 37 Pa. St. 322, the court, by Thompson, J., said: "The grant of a fee does not necessarily imply a general warranty of title. It does, however, include a special warranty, that is to say, against the grantors and his heirs."

2. Dwight v. Cutler, 3 Mich. 566; 64 Am. Dec. 105; Allen v. Hazen, 26 Mich. 146.

A purchaser, under a land contract, that does not specify what sort of deed he is entitled to, may demand a deed with customary covenants; but what is customary, is determined by the lex rei sitæ. Gault v. Van Zile, 37 Mich. 22.

3. A deed with a personal covenant to indemnify, is not a deed in performance of an agreement to convey free of incumbrances. Young v. Paul, 10 N. J. Eq. 401; 64 Am. Dec. 456.

grantor has a right to convey, against incumbrances, quiet enjoyment, and warranty.¹

The effect of agreements for warranty deeds is considered in the note.² Whatever the covenants of the deed are, they relate to the estate conveyed, and neither enlarge nor restrict it.³

XI. EFFECT OF THE CONVEYANCE—(See also IMPLIED COVENANTS, vol. 9, p. 960)—1. In General—a. UPON THE PARTIES.—The conveyance is the consummation of the contract. With it all rights of the vendor in the land cease, and by it there is vested in the purchaser the full legal and equitable title to the property, subject only to the vendor's lien for purchase-money.⁴ The former should deliver to the latter possession of the property. This may be done by the delivery of a key or other symbolic act, although no formality is necessary.⁵

If the vendor refuses to give up the possession, he may be proceeded against as a trespasser, or treated as a tenant at will, and sued for the rent. In such event he cannot, by parol evidence, show a reservation of possessory rights in himself.⁶ If he remains

2. Agreements Calling Expressly for Warranty Deed.—The contract, "to give a good and sufficient deed of warranty of all and fully the promisor's interest in M lot, meaning all and fully the same right, title, and interest deeded to him by P, by deed dated May 28, 1835," requires only a conveyance, with warranty of the same title received from P, and not a warranty of P's title. Babcock v. Wilson, 17 Me. 372.

A contract to convey, by a "good and sufficient deed of general warranty," does not, by itself, include a covenant against incumbrances, nor bind the vendor to procure a release of his wife's dower. It amounts to no more than an engagement that it should bar the vendor and his heirs from claiming the land, and that he and his heirs should defend it, when assailed by a paramount title. Bostwick v. Williams, 36 Ill. 65; 85 Am. Dec. 385.

A stipulation that the vendor shall make a sufficient deed for conveying and assuring, containing the usual full covenants of warranty of title free from all liens and incumbrances, binds him to make deeds with substantial covenants of seisin, freedom from incumbrances, and general warranty. McKleroy v. Tulane, 34 Ala. 78.

An agreement to convey by warranty deed is not satisfied by a deed of the grantor's "right, title, and interest," with a warranty to defend "the aforesaid premises." Such an agreement intends the usual covenants of seisin, and against incumbrances. Bowen v. Thrall, 28 Vt. 382.

Under an agreement to give a warranty deed, "such an one as he had taken from his vendor," which, in fact, contained only a warranty against the grantor's acts, and which was shown to the vendee without his discovering this fact, the vendee understanding that the agreement was for a warranty deed, and the vendor knowing that he so understood, the vendor must convey by a warranty deed, as that term is usually understood. Barlow v. Scott, 24 N. Y. 40.

"Where the contract provides for a warranty deed, this is generally understood as meaning the five covenants now usually inserted in deeds of bargain and sale." Warvelle on Vendor and Purchaser, p. 349.

But it has been held that an agreement to give a warranty deed, does not call for a covenant against incumbrances. Wilsey v. Dennis, 44 Barb. (N. Y.) 354.

in possession, his holding will not be treated as adverse, unless the ordinary presumption of license, raised by the fact of the relation of the parties, is rebutted by evidence.¹ Some authorities have held that even such evidence will not avail, if the vendor has made a warranty deed, but that the doctrine of estoppel will prevent him from asserting a title by adverse possession.²

The vendor of land is estopped by a covenant of warranty from setting up an after-acquired title to the land.³

b. UPON THIRD PARTIES.—The deed, in order to affect third parties, should be recorded, for it is generally provided by the recording acts of the various states that a deed shall only be valid

In Jones v. Miller, 3 Fed. Rep. 386, the court, by McCrary, C. J., said: "I do not say that in no case a grantor, who has given a warranty deed, can hold adversely to his grantee, but I am clearly of the opinion that such holding must be established by clear and undoubted testimony, showing a change in the relations of the parties toward the land."

In Horbach v. Miller, 4 Neb. 31, the court, by Gantt, J., said: "It is, however, insisted that there must not merely be possession, but that this possession must be under a claim of right for the whole statutory period. This is true, but the question is, what constitutes such a claim of right? In answer to this, it is only necessary to observe that the rule seems to be well settled that acts of notoriety, such as building a fence around the land, entering upon the land and making improvements thereon, are presumptive evidence and evincive of intention to assert ownership over and possession of the property; and taxation of the land for a series of years to the person claiming it, and the payment of taxes by him, are competent evidence tending to show ownership."

In Huntington v. Whaley, 29 Conn. 398, the court, by Sanford, J., said: "The doctrine of adverse possession is to be taken strictly. An adverse possession is not to be made out by inference, but by clear and positive proof.

Every presumption is in favor of possession in subordination to the title of the true owner."

In Kennebeck Purchase v. Springer, 4 Mass. 417; 3 Am. Dec. 227, the court, by Parsons, C. J., said: "The law upon this subject seems to be well settled. When a man is once seized of land, his seisin is presumed to continue until a disseisin is proved. When a man enters on land, claiming a right of title to the same, and acquires a seisin by his entry, his seisin shall extend to the whole parcel, to which he has right; for in this case an entry on part is an entry on the whole. When a man not claiming any right or title to the land shall enter on it, he acquires no seisin, but by the ouster of him who was seized, and he is himself a disseisor. To constitute an ouster of him who was seized, the disseisor must have the actual exclusive occupation of the land, claiming to hold it against him who was seized, or he must actually turn him out of possession. When a disseisor claims to be seized by his entry and occupation, his seisin cannot extend further than his actual exclusive occupation; for no further can the party seized be considered as ousted; for the acts of a wrong doer must be construed strictly, when he claims a benefit from his own wrong."

against subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers for value, and without notice, from the time it is duly admitted to record.¹

XII. DEFENSES—1. Performance by Defendants.—(See supra, this title, Compliance with the Contract.)

2. Failure to Perform on Part of the Plaintiff.—The mode of complying with the contract, and the duties of the parties, have been considered already.² Each must either perform, or offer to perform, everything that it is his duty to do, which does not depend upon some other act to be performed by another, which act is a condition precedent to it.³ This is necessary, not only that he may successfully resist a suit, but in order to lay a foundation for an action against the other party for breach of contract.

The performance must conform substantially to the terms of the agreement.⁴ It must be made at the proper time. This will be

1. Recording.—It is not essential to the validity of a deed that it be recorded. At common law, such a thing was unnecessary and the requirement is entirely statutory. An unrecorded deed is perfectly valid as between the parties to it, and is only postponed to the claims of those subsequently acquiring an interest in the land for value and without notice. See Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. v. Chandler, 9 Allen (Mass.) 169; Ellison v. Wilson, 36 Vt. 60; Galland v. Jackman, 26 Cal. 87; 85 Am. Dec. 172; Wilkins v. May, 3 Head (Tenn.) 176. And see, generally, DEEDS, vol. 5, p. 451; NOTICE, vol. 16, p. 787; RECORDING ACTS, vol. 20, p. 527.

Recordation is notice only to those who would otherwise be entitled to take advantage of the statute to protect themselves. Dennis v. Burrutt, 6 Cal. 670; Leach v. Beattie, 33 Vt. 195. It is notice only to those who are bound to search for it. It is not publication to the world at large. Maul v. Rider, 59 Pa. St. 167. It is constructive notice only to after purchasers under the same grantor. Bates v. Norcross, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 224. The subsequent purchaser must be in the same line of record title, for a purchaser is not bound to take notice of the registered lien or incumbrance created by any person, other than the one through whom he is compelled to de-rain his title. Harper v. Bibb, 34 Miss. 472; 69 Am. Dec. 397. And see Digman v. McCollum, 47 Mo. 372; Odle v. Odle, 73 Mo. 289; Blake v. Graham, 6 Ohio St. 580; 67 Am. Dec. 360.

2. See supra, this title, Compliance with the Contract.

3. In Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 318, the court, by Harrison, J., said: "The general rule, in the absence of special provisions, is, that the vendee is not entitled to a conveyance until the full payment of the purchase-money, and that the acts of payment and conveyance being mutual and dependent, neither party is in default until after tender and demand by the other."

Where a covenant, in an agreement to convey land, provided that, on non-compliance by the purchasers with the terms as to payment, the seller should be free from any obligation to convey, and the purchasers forfeit all right thereto, time being made of the essence of the contract, it was held that the seller was authorized to avoid the contract or not, at his option, and was not bound to tender a deed except on payment of the price. Freeman v. Griswold (Cal. 1893), 34 Pac. Rep. 327.

If the vendor or his tenants commit waste, between the time of the agreement and the time for making the conveyance and delivery of possession, the vendor must tender compensation with the deed, or the purchaser may refuse to receive it. Durrott v. Simpson, 3 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 517; 7 Am. Rep. 428.

4. Davis v. Sabita, 63 Pa. St. 90.

The tender of all that was due, and payment into court, will not avail where the defendants failed to break and sow the land, as required by the contract. Wallace v. Maples, 79 Cal. 433.

Where one sells land to another, with a stipulation in the act of sale, that the that named, if time is of the essence of the contract ;¹ if not—as is generally the case²—within a reasonable time thereafter.³ If time is essential, the provision as to it may be waived by one who has knowledge of the facts.⁴

The principal acts to be performed by the vendor and purchaser, respectively, are the conveyance of the land, and the payment of the purchase price. As has been said already, if the contract is silent on the subject, the agreements to perform these acts are vendee is to have a right of way and other servitudes belonging to the land, he cannot enforce the payment of the price, until he has complied with that obligation. Fortier v. Burthe, 19 La. Ann. 510; Rucker v. Liddell, 5 La. Ann. 577.

Where a party buys land on a proposed street, under an agreement that the vendor shall complete the street in accordance with plans and directions which may be designated by certain commissioners, and these plans and directions have already been prescribed, but with an express reservation of the right to alter them, and they are altered, the vendor sufficiently performs his contract by completing the street under the new plans and directions. Gardner v. Boston Water Power Co., 9 Allen (Mass.) 466.

A tender of payment of a promissory note, two days before it becomes due, is a sufficient performance, by the obligee, of the condition of a bond to convey real estate on the payment of such note according to its tenor. Eaton v. Emerson, 14 Me. 335.

A, by a written agreement, in consideration of a sum of money, admitted to have been paid by B, agreed to execute to him "a good and sufficient deed" of a particular pew in a church. It appeared that the church was built pursuant to the articles of subscription, by the terms of which the pews were all to be leased in perpetuity, subject to an annual rent, and that the religious society gave no title to pews, other than such leases, reserving rent, and that B, at the time the agreement was made, had knowledge of these facts. It was held, notwithstanding, that B was not obliged to accept such lease as a performance of A's agreement. Foote v. West, 1 Den. (N. Y.) 544.

1. Axford v. Thomas, 160 Pa. St. 8.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE, vol. 22, p. 1043. Hence, a vendee who has been in possession, cannot sustain his refusal to take a deed, by the fact that it was not tendered promptly. Curran v. Rogers, 35 Mich. 221.

But where, in an action by the vendor for the breach of a contract to purchase land, the vendee alleges that it incurred expenses on the faith of the vendor's promise to execute a deed on the date fixed in the contract, and that its scheme to resell the land at public auction miscarried owing to such default by the vendor, it is error not to submit to the jury the question whether the time fixed for the delivery of the deed was of the essence of the contract. Cozart v. West Oxford Land Co. (N. Car. 1893), 18 S. E. Rep. 337.

3. See supra, this title, Compliance with the Contract.

4. Wheeler v. Mather, 56 Ill. 241; 8 Am. Rep. 683; Truesdail v. Ward, 24 Mich. 117; Robbins v. Morgan (Minn. 1894), 57 N. W. Rep. 799; Campbell v. Worthington, 6 Vt. 448.

One who has waived a failure to comply with the requirements, may, nevertheless, put an end to the waiver, and make time material by demand of payment and notice of intended rescission; ordinarily, some such affirmative act is necessary to take advantage of the default. Green v. Chandler, 25 Tex. 148; Scarborough v. Arrant, 25 Tex. 129.

Under a contract for the sale of land, providing for surrender of possession on default, extension of the time of payment of the purchase price is not shown by the vendor's reply to a suggestion of the purchaser, after default, as to an alteration of the contract, in regard to payment which she might be able to make, that he presumed he would be only too glad to agree to it. Shaw v. Kellogg, 74 Hun (N. Y.) 256.

A vendor, who has agreed in writing to make title in thirty days, may show that the same day the vendee orally agreed to accept his bond for title instead. Cooke v. Cook (Ala. 1893), 14 So. Rep. 171.

mutual covenants.¹ Any given case is likely to be an exception to this rule, however, either because of the express stipulation of the parties, or an agreement implied from the terms used,² the whole matter being largely one of intention.³ The construction put by the courts upon a number of special agreements are given in the notes.⁴ In any case, however, in which time is not of the essence of the contract, mere neglect to act will not put the vendor or

2. Where no time is limited for the conveyance of the property, but the payment is to be made on a certain day, the payment is a condition to the conveyance, but not vice versa. Baily v. Clay, 4 Rand. (Va.) 346.

A contract to convey a title to land, within a reasonable time after the sale, is not a condition precedent; nor is it necessary to be performed, in order to enable a recovery on a bill single, given for the purchase-money, payable at a certain time. Stone v. Gover, 1 Ala. 287.

But see Hardy v. McKesson, 6 Jones (N. Car.) 554, in which it was held that, where the vendor and purchaser of a tract of land covenanted that the latter should pay a certain sum at a given day, and the seller to make title whenever the money was paid, the seller, in order to entitle himself to recover the purchase-money, is bound to aver his readiness and ability to make title on the day set for payment of the money.

3. Where the vendor of land executes his bond to make title on the payment of the note given by the purchaser for the purchase-money, in respect to the security taken by each being a consideration, the one for the other, they are mutually dependent one upon the other. But in respect to performance, or payment, or times of either, they may be dependent, conditional, or independent, one to the other, according to the intention of the parties, as manifested in the terms of the instruments evidencing the trade. Scarborough v. Arrant, 25 Tex. 129.

4. Mutual Conditions.—In the following cases, conveyance and payments have been held to be concurrent conditions. Neither the vendor nor purchaser can maintain his suit without performance or tender on his own part:

Where, by an agreement in writing, the purchaser promised to pay to the vendor of land a sum of money on a certain day, if the latter would make him a satisfactory deed "for two lots," when the money was paid. Ledyard v. Manning, 1 Ala. 153.

Where a vendor binds himself to execute and deliver a certain deed, on condition that the purchaser shall make certain stipulated payments, and "as soon as the full sum shall be paid." Hill v. Grigsby, 35 Cal. 656.

Where an agreement was made for the sale and purchase of land, in which it was stipulated that five hundred dollars should be paid in cash, and a like sum by a note at ninety days, with a satisfactory indorsement, and the remainder secured by bond and mortgage. Van Schaick v. Winne, 16 Barb. (N. Y.) 89.

Where the vendor gave his bond for title, containing a condition to make title upon payment of the purchase-money. Arther v. Pearson, 32 Miss. 131.

Where the agreement is to sell land at a price to be determined at a future time by third persons, one fourth of the purchase-money to be paid in cash, on delivery of the deed of conveyance, and the remainder to be paid subsequently, secured by a mortgage of the land, and the deed to be executed on notice of the price fixed by such third parties. Howe v. Huntington, 15 Me. 350.

The following cases also present illustrations: Smith v. McCluskey, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 610; Halloway v. Davis, Wright (Ohio) 129; Tharin v. Fickling, 2 Rich. (S. Car.) 361; Breithaupt v. Thurmond, 3 Rich. (S. Car.) 216.

In Thomas v. Lanier, 23 Ark. 640, the court, by Compton, J., said: "The stipulation to make title, on the one part, and the undertaking to pay the purchase-money, on the other, stand upon the same legal footing; and where the one is a condition precedent to the other, and the time and not the place of performance, is fixed, the vendor must seek the vendee, if within the state, but if he be absent from the state, then the vendor may proceed against him, by attachment for the purchase-money."

When, upon a sale of land, a bond is given for a conveyance upon payment of the purchase-money, which is agreed to be paid by a series of notes, if the first notes are paid, the payment of the last note and the conveyance of the land, are mutual and dependent acts. Headley v. Shaw, 39 Ill. 354.

Independent Covenants.—In the following cases the payment and performance were held to be independent covenants:

The failure of one furnishes no defense to the other party, nor need any performance or tender be alleged or proven by the plaintiff, who sues to recover for a breach of contract on the part of the defendant. Hageman v. Sharkey, 1 How. (Miss.) 277; 29 Am. Dec. 627; Hazlip v. Noland, 6 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 294; Armfield v. Tate, 7 Ired. (N. Car.) 258.

Where three notes were given to secure payment of the purchase-money of land, and the first was paid before conveyance, it was held that the agreement to convey and the agreements to pay, were independent, and that suit could be brought upon the second and third notes, without conveying title. Gibson v. Newman, 1 How. (Miss.) 341.

A failure to convey was held to be no defense to an action on a negotiable note given for the purchase-money. Woods v. Morgan, 1 Morr. (Iowa) 238.

Conveyance a Condition to Payment.—Where a vendor agrees to sell land, performance to be at a future time, he must prepare a sufficient deed, and tender it to the purchaser, before he can ask a court for rescission or specific performance. McWilliams v. Long, 32 Barb. (N. Y.) 194; Guthrie v. Thompson, 1 Oregon 353.

The vendor cannot maintain an action for the purchase-money, without having tendered a proper conveyance, where he binds himself to make a deed when the purchaser requires it, and, after all the money becomes due, payment is offered and a deed demanded. Davidson v. Van Pelt, 15 Wis. 341.

Where, upon an oral agreement for the conveyance of land, the vendor assigned to the purchasers a title bond, and agreed to make, within one month, a good title, and a part of the consideration was paid in money, and notes were given for the residue, it was held that the making of the title was a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to recover in a suit upon the notes. Lewis v. Davis, 21 Ark. 235.

An action on purchase-money notes payable at different times, under an agreement for conveyance of land, will not lie, unless there is a conditional tender of the deed. Hook v. Nebeker, 1 Ind. 257; Beecher v. Conradt, 13 N. Y. 108. See also Dennis v. Williams, 40 Ala. 633.

Conveyance Held Not a Condition to Payment.—Where, by a written agreement, the purchaser is to pay a portion of the purchase-money on a given day, and he does not offer to do so, it is not necessary for the vendor to tender a conveyance, before bringing an action for that amount. Devling v. Little, 26 Pa. St. 502. And see Harrington v. Birdsall (Neb. 1893), 56 N. W. Rep. 961.

Where one purchases land, at a sheriff's sale in South Carolina, to which the defendant, in the execution, has no title, the sheriff may, by suit, compel him to pay the purchase-money, and he need not first have tendered the sheriff's titles. It is otherwise, if the sheriff has refused to make titles. Moore v. Akin, 2 Hill (S. Car.) 403.

Under a bond conditioned to convey title to land, if the obligee should duly pay the first installment of the purchase-money, and give a mortgage on the land to secure the payment of the remainder, the tendering of such a mortgage is not a condition precedent to the conveyance. Russell v. Copeland, 30 Me. 332.

A vendor, who has agreed to convey title upon payment of the purchase-money, need not give the deed until payment in full, and, therefore, can sue for installments, except the last, without making tender of a deed. Terry v. George, 37 Miss. 539.

Where a bond for a title recited that the obligor had, in consideration of a certain sum, for which the obligee had given his promissory note, sold a tract of land described in the bond; and the obligor bound himself to make a good warranty deed "when the purchase-money should be paid, or when a patent for the land should be obtained from the government," it was held, in an action upon the note, that the conveyance was not a condition precedent to payment. Perry v. Rice, 10 Tex. 367.

Payment a Condition to Conveyance.—In the following cases it was held that the purchaser must make or tender payment before he is entitled to a conveyance: Byers v. Aiken, 5 Ark. 419; vendee in default; there must be a demand on the part of the other.¹ Some authorities call for a second demand.²

Mayers v. Rogers, 5 Ark. 417; Drennen v. Boyer, 5 Ark. 497; Doe dem Miller v. Roe, 39 Ga. 91; Browning v. Clymer, 1 Ind. 579; Davis v. Heady, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 261; Burrows v. Yount, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 458; 39 Am. Dec. 439; Waterman v. Gibson, 5 La. Ann. 672; Sewall v. Wilkins, 14 Me. 168; Stockton v. George, 7 How. (Miss.) 172; Leftwich v. Coleman, 3 How. (Miss.) 167; Paine v. Brown, 37 N. Y. 228; Adams v. Wadhams, 40 Barb. (N. Y.) 225; Grace v. Regal, 11 S. & R. (Pa.) 351; Pinkus v. Hamaker, 11 S. & R. (Pa.) 200; Baum v. Dubois, 43 Pa. St. 260; Bridge v. Young, 9 Tex. 401; Gale v. Best, 20 Wis. 44.

Where, by an agreement for the sale of land, the vendor was to give a deed, or a bond for a deed, on receiving the first payment of the purchase-money, and approved security for the remainder given, payment was held to be a condition to conveyance. Appleton v. Chase, 19 Me. 74.

The same rule was applied where, upon a sale of land, the purchaser paid a part of the price in cash, and gave two notes for the residue, payable in one and two years, and the vendor gave a bond for title when he should receive a patent from the United States, which did not arrive before the last note became due. Duncan v. Jeter, 5 Ala. 604; 39 Am. Dec. 342.

If the obligee of a bond obtains titles in his own name, for part of the lands, the assignment of which to the obligor was the consideration of the bond, and suffers the titles to the residue of the lands to be lost by non-payment of taxes, a court of equity will not lend its aid to carry into effect a judgment at law upon the bond. Skilern v. May, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 137.

Payment Not a Condition to Conveyance.—When the defendant bound himself to convey, on or before a certain day, and the complainant agreed to pay at the time of the giving of the deed, the complainant is not in laches in not tendering payment, if the deed has not been executed or tendered. Huffman v. Hummer, 18 N. J. Eq. 83.

When, in a covenant to convey land, it is provided that the vendor is "to make a deed when called for," the purchaser may require a deed before the purchase-money is paid. But if the purchaser has sought the aid of the court, and the purchase-money is not paid, the court may, in its discretion, permit the deed to be withheld until it has been paid or tendered. Simmons v. Spruill, 3 Jones Eq. (N. Car.) 9.

Warranty and Promise to Pay Independent Covenants.—Where land is sold with a covenant of warranty, and possession has been delivered, and the purchaser gives a note for the purchase-money, the promise to pay and the warranty are independent covenants, and the enforcement of the one is not dependent upon the performance of the other. Norton v. Jackson, 5 Cal. 263.

1. Fuller v. Hubbard, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 1; 16 Am. Dec. 423; Hackett v. Huson, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 249; Connelly v. Pierce, 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 129; Dye v. Montague, 10 Wis. 18.

Where a conveyance for a tract of land is, according to contract, to be made on demand, the pleadings should contain a request precisely alleged in point of time and place; the general allegation "that the defendant has often been required, etc.," being insufficient. Bridges v. Hardgrove, Sneed (Ky.) 131.

In debt on a bond to make title on payment of the purchase-money, by the purchaser against the vendor, for a failure to make title, the declaration is defective if it neither avers that "the vendee demanded a deed of the vendor," nor that "the vendee prepared a deed and tendered it to the vendor, and demanded its execution." Johnston v. Beard, 7 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 214. See also Sheets v. Andrews, 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 274; Brown v. Hart, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 429; Mullin v. Bloomer, 11 Iowa 360.

When an equitable title to land, by reason of a contract for the same, is set up as against the legal owner, and it appears that payment for the land was to be made in bricks, it is incumbent upon the person claiming under such contract, to show an offer to perform it on his part, without waiting for a demand to be made. Allen v. Woods, 24 Pa. St. 76.

Want of title in the vendor will excuse demand for a deed from him. Bowen v. Jackson, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 203; Morange v. Morris, 34 Barb. (N. Y.) 311.

2. Johnston v. Beard, 7 Smed. & M.

Tender, at least, must be always either made or excused, as by waiver,¹ or its being rendered impossible by the other party, or made unnecessary by his repudiation of the contract and refusal to perform his part of it,² or his known inability so to perform.³

The failure to make proper tender does not put an end to the contract so as to make it void; it gives the other party the right to rescind it, or to waive the default and continue it in force.⁴

It gives no such right, however, to the party in default. He cannot take advantage of his own wrong, but must abide by his agreement.⁵

(Miss.) 217; Standifer v. Davis, 13 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 48; Connelly v. Pierce, 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 131.

In Lutweller v. Linnell, 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 515, the court, by Welles, J., said: "Where a party covenants to convey, he is not in default until the party who is to receive the conveyance, being entitled thereto, has demanded it; and having waited a reasonable time to have it drawn and executed, has made a second demand."

In Hudson v. Watson, 26 Miss. 360, the court, by Handy, J., said: "The vendee should make demand for the deed from the vendor, who is entitled to a reasonable time thereafter to have the deed executed; after which the vendee should make a second demand, and in default thereof, the right of action to the vendee becomes complete." But this is a rule of evidence, and not of pleading. Pearson v. Frazer, 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 564.

1. The tender must be of a deed properly acknowledged. Smith v. Smeltzer, 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 287.

If the obligee in a bond for a deed, on the last day of performance, says to the obligor that the money is ready for him whenever he will give a deed, but produces no money, and the other party replies that he will procure him a deed, but immediately goes away, this is no waiver of tender. Drummond v. Churchill, 17 Me. 325.

Implied Waiver.—Where the condition of an obligation is to make title on a day certain, and on a contingency which, if it happens, is more within the knowledge of the obligor than the obligee, in a plea of readiness to perform, it is necessary for the obligor to aver notice of contingent fact to the obligee, else the plea will be bad. Williams v. Harper, 1 Ala. 502.

2. Skinner v. Tinker, 34 Barb. (N. Y.) 333; Crary v. Smith, 2 N. Y. 60.

In Gray v. Dougherty, 25 Cal. 280, the court, by Sanderson, C. J., said: "If the vendor refuses to receive the purchase-money when tendered, thereby repudiating his contract, or by his own act prevents the vendee from performing his part of the agreement, or by any adversary steps makes it known that he does not intend to observe and perform his covenant, except upon compulsion, thus, in effect, refusing in advance of a demand, neither law nor equity imposes upon the vendee the observance of a ceremony thus made idle and fruitless."

In Turner v. Berry, 27 Ind. 163, the court, by Gregory, J., said: "When a party to an agreement gives notice to the other of his determination not to perform the contract on his part, performance by the party receiving such notice is unnecessary."

If the vendor offers to take the money tendered, but refuses to make the deed, this is a refusal of the offer, and it is a useless ceremony to count out the money after that. Blunt v. Tomlin, 27 Ill. 93.

Where a purchaser of real estate, being entitled to a conveyance in fee, demanded it of the vendor, who offered him a perpetual lease, reserving rent, and refused to give any other, it was held that the purchaser might sue at once on the agreement, without waiting to have a conveyance prepared, and presenting himself to receive it. Foot v. West, 1 Den. (N. Y.) 544.

3. The inability of a vendor to make title according to the condition of his bond, is sufficient to excuse the purchaser from preparing and tendering him a deed. Johnson v. Collins, 17 Ala. 318. See also Holmes v. Holmes, 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 137.

4. Scarborough v. Emerson, 25 Tex. 129; Walker v. Emerson, 20 Tex. 706; 73 Am. Dec. 207.

5. Mancius v. Sergeant, 5 Cow. (N.

The breach of a contract, in order to give rise to a cause of action, must be such as to affect the right of the party suing. Hence, a vendee cannot maintain an action against his vendor, for conveying the land wrongfully to a second purchaser with notice.¹

The breach of the vendee's agreement to pay the purchase price, exonerates the vendor from all obligation to him,² and entitles him to refuse to convey,³ and to recover possession of the land,⁴ without refunding any money that the purchaser may have paid in part performance of the contract.⁵ The acceptance of a worth-

Y.) 271; Church v. Ayres, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 272.

In an agreement for the sale of land, the purchaser covenanted to pay, and the vendor to convey upon payment, it being agreed that, if the purchaser failed in his covenant, the contract should be void. On an action by the vendor for the purchase-money, no part of which had been paid, it was held that the vendor could recover, and that the contract was void only at the election of the vendor. This is true, if the contract contains only a general stipulation that if the purchaser does not pay it shall be void. Canfield v. Westcott, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 270.

A condition, in a title bond, that the sale shall be null and void if the purchase-money is not paid when due, is for the benefit of the vendor alone, who may take advantage of it, or waive it at his election. Caruthers v. McBurney, 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 590.

The purchaser of land upon condition cannot take advantage of a breach of the condition by himself, to abandon the purchase. Mundine v. Crenshaw, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 87.

Where a bond for title, upon the payment of certain notes, contained a condition by which, if the obligee should fail to pay the sum specified in his notes by a certain time, he should forfeit all money which he had paid, and the bond should be void, it was held that, under this condition, the obligee could not annul the contract at his option, so as to defeat a recovery upon his notes; but the condition was to be considered as providing a penalty, to insure a prompt performance by the obligee. Mason v. Caldwell, 10 Ill. 196.

A clause, in a bond for conveyance of land, that "if said vendee fail to make good the above payments, in that case the above tract to revert back to the vendor," does not authorize the vendee to throw back the land on the vendor and rescind the contract. Barbour v. Brookie, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 511.

1. Marshall v. Robert, 22 Minn. 49.

2. Where a purchaser, who has advanced money in part performance of a contract for the purchase of land, refuses to pay the remainder, the vendor may rescind the contract, and convey the land to another. Ketchum v. Evertson, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 359; 7 Am. Dec. 384.

In McPherson v. Johnson, 69 Tex. 487, the court, by Gaines, J., said: "The vendee in an executory contract, who has not paid the purchase-money, must, at least, offer to pay, in order to enforce the agreement. The vendor's right of action on his debt may be barred, and his privilege of election thereby lost, but the vendee is not relieved of his obligation to pay the debt if he would hold the land. The debt remains though the right of action be barred, and without an offer to pay it, the vendee, if in possession, cannot defeat the suit of the vendor for the recovery of the land; nor, if out of possession, can he recover against the vendor or any one holding under him."

3. For the first payment under an agreement for the purchase and sale of land, the vendee drew a draft, payable at the time of conveyance. The draft was dishonored at maturity, and the vendee was then insolvent. It was held that the vendor might rescind the contract, and refuse to convey; and having done so, the personal representative of the vendor could not revive the contract. Todd v. Caldwell, 10 Tex. 236.

4. Williams v. Noiseux, 43 N. H. 388.

Where the price of land is to be paid in installments, the vendor may sue for rescission of the sale at once, upon the failure of the purchaser to pay the first installment. Thompson v. Kilcrease, 14 La. Ann. 340.

5. Simon v. Kaliske, 6 Abb. Pr. N.

less note does not prevent the vendor from rescinding, unless he has made an agreement that it shall be in discharge of the price.¹

a. WAIVER OF THE BREACH.—A breach of contract may be waived by the innocent party,² but he must act with knowledge

S. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 224; 37 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 249; Ketchum v. Evertson, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 359; 7 Am. Dec. 384.

In Rounds v. Baxter, 4 Me. 454, the court, by Mellen, J., said: "It is a proverbial principle that a man is not permitted, in a court of justice, to take advantage of his own wrong or neglect. The principle is founded in the highest reason. If a man, after he has made a fair contract, and partially fulfilled it, may, without the consent, or any fault, on the part of him with whom he has contracted, rescind the agreement, excuse himself at once from all further concern about it, and recover back whatever he has paid, he may speculate, and disappoint and injure his neighbor, whenever his interest or his passions may dictate; and thus triumph over him in security, and enjoy, himself, a complete indemnity. Justice will not sanction such a proceeding. The cases in which one of the parties to a contract may lawfully disaffirm and rescind it, are those in which the other party has been in fault, or where, by the terms of the contract, a right to rescind it is reserved."

In Green v. Green, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 51, the court, by Savage, C. J., said: "It may be asserted with confidence, that a party who has advanced money, or done an act in part performance of an agreement, and then stops short and refuses to proceed to the ultimate conclusion of the agreement, the other party being ready and willing to proceed and fulfill all his stipulations according to the contract, has never been suffered to recover for what has thus been advanced or done."

1. Giving a receipt reciting that it is taken "as payment," is not conclusive evidence that such was the agreement between the parties. Dunlap v. Shanklin, 10 W. Va. 662.

2. Waiver.—Griggs v. Woodruff, 14 Ala. 9.

When the acts of a vendor of land are inconsistent with his intention to enforce strictly the conditions of the contract, as by accepting the residue of the purchase-money after the purchaser has broken the condition, he is considered thereby to have waived the condition. Grigg v. Landis, 21 N. J. Eq. 494.

Where a contract, in which time is of the essence, is fully performed by one party, he may require performance by the other after the time. Robbins v. Morgan (Minn. 1894), 57 N. W. Rep. 799.

Where a vendor received purchase-money notes, it being agreed that he should be allowed to declare a forfeiture in case there was any default in their payment, the fact that he transferred one of them to a bona fide holder, without knowledge that there had been a default in the payment of one of the others, operates as a waiver of his right to declare the forfeiture. Inglehart v. Gibson, 56 Ill. 81.

Upon the death of the vendor before the time for completion of the contract, his executors may waive his right to declare a forfeiture, because the contract was not performed within the time specified. Williams v. Haddock (Supreme Ct.), 29 N. Y. Supp. 199.

The purchaser cannot claim a termination of the contract by his failure to pay in full an installment of the price, part payment having been accepted, and both parties having treated the contract as subsisting. Loud v. Pomona Land, etc., Co., 153 U. S. 564.

Where a vendor of land binds himself to convey title on the payment of the purchase-money by the purchaser, indulges him, after he has failed to pay at the stipulated time, by neglecting to demand the purchase-money for an indefinite time, he cannot elect to consider the contract as rescinded, either against the purchaser or his assignee, without making a demand for payment and being refused, though the condition in the bond declared it to be void if the money was not duly paid. Stewart v. Gates, 30 Miss. 100.

A vendor who refuses to rescind for non-payment at the agreed time, when an offer to that effect is made by the purchaser, waives the right of forfeiture until he demands payment. Prophit v. Robinson, 34 Miss. 141. See, as to what does not amount to a waiver, Kountze v. Helmuth, 140 N. Y. 432.

of the facts, and must intend that his act shall constitute a waiver.¹ The fact that the waiver has been relied on by the party in default, and that acts have been done by him on the faith of such reliance, is always material.²

3. Defects and Deficiencies in the Subject-Matter—a. DEFECTS OF TITLE—(See also TITLE (REAL PROPERTY), vol. 26, p. 20).—It is frequently claimed, by way of defense, that the title of the vendor is defective. The effect of such a condition of title depends upon the nature of the action and whether the contract is executed or executory.

When suit is brought by the vendor, seeking the specific performance of an executory agreement, invalidity of title furnishes a complete and perfect defense to the action.³ If the suit is by the vendee, defect of title is not a defense, unless such defect is fatal, in which case the vendor will not be compelled to do an unlawful act, by executing a conveyance purporting to grant that which is another's.⁴

Where the contract is executed, and the purchaser has entered into possession, he cannot, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation, successfully defend, on the ground that the title is defective,

1. The fact that the obligee of a bond for a deed of land platted refused to accept it when it was tendered him, because the southerly boundary was described as "contemplated Field street," but agreed to take it with the word "contemplated" omitted, will not constitute a waiver of a misdescription in the deed of conveyance, the effect of which would be to restrict his land to the north line of "Field street," where his bond was for land extending to the middle of the street, unless he knew of such misdescription and intended to waive his rights under the bond. Holds-worth v. Tucker, 143 Mass. 369.

2. Where a vendor stated to the purchaser of real estate that he would not insist on the forfeiture stipulated in the contract, in case payments were not promptly made, it was held that the statement constituted a waiver of his right to declare a forfeiture; the purchaser in the meantime having made valuable improvements upon the land. Blair v. Blair, 48 Iowa 393.

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE, vol. 22, p. 948. And see Fisher v. Wilcox (Supreme Ct.), 28 N. Y. Supp. 327.

In an action by the vendor of land for the price, where the defendant, by reason of probable defects of title, set up in his answer, requires the plaintiff to exhibit his title, and avers his willingness to take the land if the plaintiff exhibits a perfect title, the court should not rescind the contract, but should require the plaintiff to exhibit such title as he has, and, if defective, require him to perfect it if he can, and give him a reasonable time in which to do so. Bailey v. Conley (Ky. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 391.

Where one contracts to give a deed without warranty, to land standing in his wife's name, he cannot enforce bonds given by the purchaser for the price, on tender of his and his wife's deed, subject to judgment liens discovered by the purchaser after giving the bonds. Leach v. Johnson (N. Car. 1894), 19 S. E. Rep. 239.

But where the vendors of land, having agreed to make a "good and sufficient conveyance," conveyed their interests, and stipulated that the vendees might retain part of the price till they perfected the title to an eighth of the land, by obtaining a deed from certain heirs, and the heirs were afterward paid for their interest, but died without having made a deed, it was held that when the vendees had had peaceful adverse possession long enough to perfect their title, the vendors were entitled to the balance of the price, without obtaining the deed from the said heirs. Moyers v. Arthur (Ky. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 276.

4. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE, vol. 22, p. 944; Bispham's Principles of Equity

when suit is brought to recover the purchase-money,¹ but must look to the covenants in his deed.²

If the element of fraud is present, the defense is good, but in order that it be available, the vendee must do everything that he can to put the vendor in the same position as before the contract was made.³

If the contract is executory, and the possession is held under a title bond, instead of a deed, a defective title will be a sufficient defense to a suit on the purchase-money notes.⁴ The purchaser here, as in the case of fraud, must restore the land to the vendor.⁵

Knowledge, on the part of the purchaser, of defects of title, at the time of making the contract, will generally be construed as constituting a waiver of the right to complain.⁶

b. DEFICIENCIES IN QUANTITY.—Where the sale is in gross and the contract is executed, and there has been no fraud or

But an intending purchaser of land is not necessarily guilty of laches in failing to examine the records, where the owner of an interest in the land expressly states to him, with the fraudulent purpose of inducing the purchase, that he has no interest therein, but the question of negligence, on the part of the purchaser, is for the jury. Blakelee v. Sincepaugh, 71 Hun (N. Y.) 412. And where a deed by a warrantor contains a stipulation of no warranty, and the buyer is not aware of the danger of eviction, he is entitled to recover the price paid. Montgomery v. Marydale Land, etc., Co. (La. 1894), 15 So. Rep. 63.

Failure of title in the vendor, is no defense to an action on a purchase-money note, and to foreclose the mortgage security, so long as the vendee holds the vendor's warranty deed and retains possession of the land. Black v. Thompson (Ind. 1894), 36 N. E. Rep. 643.

But where a deed provided that if title to any of the land should be defective, and the vendor should be unable to remove the defect after reasonable notice, such land should be quitclaimed to the vendor, and the vendee should have a credit therefor on the amount of the purchase-money, it was held that the vendee could enforce such provision, if the vendor's title to a part of the land was through a remote grantor, in whom the record failed to show title, though no one had asserted title thereto adverse to the vendor, for twenty years. Ragsdale v. Meridian Land, etc., Co. (Miss. 1893), 14 So. Rep. 193.

misrepresentation, it cannot be opened upon the ground of a deficiency in the quantity of the land sold.¹

If the quantity be fraudulently misrepresented, an abatement in the price may be had in case of deficiency;² and some authorities have applied the same rule, in case of mistake so gross as to warrant the conclusion that the grantee would not have contracted had he known the truth.³

If the sale is by the acre, an abatement in the price may be had in case the acreage is short.⁴

XIII. REMEDIES.—(See also ACTIONS, vol. 1, p. 178; ASSUMPSIT, vol. 1, p. 882; COVENANT (ACTION OF), vol. 4, p. 463)—1. Specific Performance.—The specific performance of a contract is left to the sound discretion of the chancellor, guided by general principles of equity.⁵ But where a contract relating to the sale of land is fair and definite in all its terms, and is supported by a sufficient consideration, specific performance will be decreed as a matter of course.⁶

1. Deficiency in Quantity.—Terrell v. Kirksey, 14 Ala. 209; Josselyn v. Edwards, 57 Ind. 212; Child v. Burton, 6 Bush (Ky.) 617; Tyson v. Hardesty, 29 Md. 309; Kerr v. Dickinson, 51 Iowa 244; Jenks v. Fritz, 7 W. & S. (Pa.) 201; 13 Am. Dec. 227. And see Ragsdale v. Meridian Land, etc., Co. (Miss. 1893), 14 So. Rep. 193, where there was a special contract. Such is the case where the conveyance is by metes and bounds, although the supposed acreage is recited. King v. Brown, 54 Ind. 368. See also Melick v. Dayton, 34 N. J. Eq. 245.

In a conveyance of land sold by the tract, the words "more or less" will, under Georgia Code, § 2642, cover any deficiency which does not justify a suspicion of willful deception, or mistake equivalent thereto. Estes v. Odom, 91 Ga. 600.

2. Tyler v. Anderson, 106 Ind. 185. And see Dibby v. Dickey, 85 Me. 362.

3. Melick v. Dayton, 34 N. J. Eq. 245.

4. English v. Arbuckle, 125 Ind. 77.

But in a sale of one hundred and ninety-six acres, "more or less," a deficiency of one and thirty-seven hundredths acres, does not, in the absence of fraud, entitle the purchaser to a deduction from the price. The Chancellor v. French (N. J. 1893), 27 Atl. Rep. 140.

A deficiency of a few acres, perhaps a dozen, or even fifty, in such a large parcel as eight hundred acres, "more or less," may be allowed by the words "more or less," but not a deficiency of four hundred acres. Libby v. Dickey, 85 Me. 362; Board v. Wilson, 34 W. Va. 609.

The price is not reduced, however, in the precise proportion of the deficient quantity to the quantity purchased. Natural differences and improvements are to be considered. The question is, how much more was to be given because of the supposed additional quantity? Wilcoxson v. Calloway, 67 N. Car. 463.

5. Specific Performance.—Shriver v. Seiss, 49 Md. 388; Smoot v. Rea, 19 Md. 398; Shaw v. Livermore, 2 Greene (Iowa) 338.

In such cases relief is not granted as a matter of right in either party, but is granted or withheld according to the circumstances. Young v. Daniels, 2 Iowa 126; 63 Am. Dec. 477.

Though the jurisdiction of the court to enforce specific performance, is said to rest in judicial discretion, it is exercised according to sound and fixed rules, and within certain definite limits, and is controlled largely by the circumstances of the individual cases. Aston v. Robinson, 49 Miss. 348.

2. Reformation—(See REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS, vol. 20, p. 713).—Where, in reducing the contract to writing, through some mistake, inadvertence, or fraud, it fails to express the real agreement of the parties, a court of equity will reform the instrument so that it shall truly represent the contract as agreed upon.¹

3. Rescission—(See RESCISSION, vol. 21, p. 24).—All contracts and transactions in the transfer of land, may be rescinded where either of the parties was laboring under disability,² or where the contract was the result of mistake, accident, or surprise,³ or was

9 Minn. 157; McClure v. Otrich, 118 Ill. 320; Johnson v. Dodge, 17 Ill. 433; Hester v. Hooker, 7 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 768; Clement v. Reid, 9 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 535.

When a contract respecting lands is in writing, is certain and fair in all its parts, founded on an adequate consideration, and capable of being specifically performed, specific performance is a matter of right, and it is as much a matter of course for a court of equity to decree it, as for a court of law to award damages for its breach. Chambers v. Alabama Iron Co., 67 Ala. 353; Bogan v. Daughdrill, 51 Ala. 312.

But he who asks specific performance should show the facts which make such decree equitable, and the failure to do this justifies a refusal of the decree, Fowler v. Marshall, 29 Kan. 665; for specific performance is never enforced by a court of equity, unless the contract is fair, certain, reasonable, and capable of being performed. Shriver v. Seiss, 49 Md. 384.

The performance must be necessary; there must be a valuable consideration; it must be practicable, and the agreement must be certain and mutual. Aston v. Robinson, 49 Miss. 348.

If the party seeking specific performance, has been guilty of gross laches or inexcusably negligent in performing on his part, or if there has been a material change of circumstances affecting the rights of the parties, courts of equity will refuse to decree a specific performance. Young v. Daniels, 2 Iowa 126; 63 Am. Dec. 477.

Equity will not enforce a contract for the conveyance of land if it be unconscionable, unfair, obtained by the party seeking to enforce it by fraud or undue influence, or is not supported by an adequate consideration, or is ambiguous. Throckmorton v. Davidson, 68 Iowa 643. See also SPECIFIC PER-FORMANCE, vol. 22, p. 941, where this subject is fully treated.

1. Reformation.—Clark v. Hart, 57 Ala. 390; Knapp v. White, 23 Conn. 529; Sanford v. Washburn, 2 Root (Conn.) 499; Pomeroy's Eq. Jur., § 870; Story's Eq. Jur., § 468; REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS, vol. 20, p. 713.

Where, through mistake or misapprehension of its true meaning, a contract departs from the intention of the parties, the power of a court of equity, to correct it and make it conform to the intention of the parties, is unquestionable. Pickett v. Merchant's Nat. Bank, 32 Ark. 346. Thus, where by mistake of a draughtsman, some of the terms of agreement are omitted in reducing to writing, it will be reformed by the court and enforced as reformed. Murphy v. Rooney, 45 Cal. 78.

But equity will exercise its power sparingly and with great caution, and only upon the clearest proof of the intention of the party, and of the action or mistake upon which the jurisdiction is invoked. Reese v. Wyman, 9 Ga. 430; Stricker v. Tinkham, 35 Ga. 176; 89 Am. Dec. 280.

2. Rescission.—Such as coverture, infancy, insanity, drunkenness, duress, stress of necessity, etc. See supra, this title, Persons Under Disability; DURESS, vol. 6, p. 57; INFANTS, vol. 10, p. 649; INSANITY, vol. 11, p. 149; INTOXICATION AS A DEFENSE TO CONTRACTS, vol. 11, p. 773; MARRIED WOMEN, vol. 14, p. 626.

If one deeply in debt, in order to obtain a loan, agrees to purchase a tract of land at more than double its value, and gives a mortgage upon other property to secure the loan and a part of the purchase-money, the vendor knowing of the purchaser's necessities, equity will rescind the contract. Hough v. Hunt, 2 Ohio 495; 15 Am. Dec. 569.

brought about by fraud,¹ or there has been a failure of consideration.²

4. Action to Recover Possession—(See EJECTMENT, vol. 6, p. 195). Where a vendee of land is placed in possession in pursuance of a contract of purchase, and fails to perform his portion of the agreement, an action of ejectment will lie against him at the suit of the vendor.³ And, conversely, the vendee in such contract may maintain an action of ejectment, to enforce specific performance by the vendor, whenever a bill in equity will lie for that purpose.⁴

(N. Y.) 174; Hunter v. Goudy, 1 Ohio 449; MISTAKE, vol. 15, p. 625.

Mutual mistake, in a contract to purchase school land, is ground for rescission, regardless of the motives of the party innocently making the representations relied upon, and afterward found to be untrue. Culbertson v. Blanchard, 79 Tex. 486. But where one with full knowledge, or means of full and accurate knowledge, executes a deed, a court of equity cannot release him. Wier v. Johns, 14 Colo. 493.

1. Where parties conspire together to perpetrate a fraud upon another, and thereby obtain the title to real estate, equity will set aside the conveyance and restore the title. Castle v. Kemp, 124 Ill. 307. And see FRAUD, vol. 8, p. 635. But unless fraud has been practiced, or some device or artifice resorted to by which one of the parties has been taken advantage of, equity will not rescind a contract for the sale and exchange of land. Fuller v. Buice, 80 Ga. 395.

2. Curtis v. Clark, 133 Mass. 509. And see generally, on this subject, RESCISSIION, vol. 21, p. 63 et seq.

Where a contract for the sale of land is executed by a conveyance, in which by oversight, a material part of the land is not embraced, and the vendor has no legal title to that part, but only at most an equitable right to obtain it, the purchaser is entitled to a rescission, unless the title is perfected before decree. Winfrey v. Drake, 4 Lea (Tenn.) 293.

3. Action To Recover Possession.—Baker v. Gittings, 16 Ohio 485; Fears v. Merrill, 9 Ark. 559; 50 Am. Dec. 226; Jackson v. Moncrief, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 26. And see EJECTMENT, vol. 6, p. 195.

It is immaterial that the vendor did not, before bringing suit, tender a deed. Wright v. Moore, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 230.

The action of ejectment may be maintained by the vendor without any previous notice to quit. Baker v. Gittings, 16 Ohio 485; Jackson v. Moncrief, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 26; Whiteside v. Jackson, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 418; Wright v. Moore, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 230; Den v. Webster, 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 513; Smith v. Robinson, 13 Ark. 533; overruling, on this point, Fears v. Merrill, 9 Ark. 559; 50 Am. Dec. 226.

The case of a vendor and vendee is an exception to the general rule, and though the latter enters into possession, under a contract of purchase, with the consent of the former, yet the vendor may maintain ejectment without previous notice to quit. Jackson v. Miller, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 747. But it seems there must have been some previous demand of possession, Venable v. McDonald, 4 Dana (Ky.) 336; some notice, express or implied, of the vendor's election to avoid the contract and make reclamation. Dennis v. Warder, 3 B. Mon. (Ky.) 175.

In Jackson v. Rowan, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 330, it was held that the vendee was entitled to notice to quit or a demand of possession before suit brought.

In Harle v. McCoy, 7 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 318; 23 Am. Dec. 407, it was held that one entering upon land, under an executory contract of purchase, cannot be evicted from possession by the vendor, unless he shall, by some act, have converted his possession into a tortious one, as by denying the title of his vendor, or refusing to quit upon sufficient notice or demand; and that mere non-payment of the purchase-money will not be sufficient.

4. Henderson v. Hays, 2 Watts. (Pa.) 148; Hawn v. Norris, 4 Binn. (Pa.) 77. But where the plaintiff cannot enforce specific execution of his contract against the defendant, he cannot recover in ejectment. Vincent v. Huff, 4 S. & R. (Pa.) 298.

5. Action for Purchase-Money.—The vendor of land may recover the purchase-money in an action of assumpsit.¹ Similarly, if the contract is rescinded, the purchaser may recover the part payments previously made, in a suit for money had and received,² but proved obedient and followed all his directions, to make him the heir of his whole estate, is not such a contract whereof specific execution should be enforced. Stein v. North, 3 Yeates (Pa.) 324.

1. Pomeroy v. Winship, 12 Mass. 514; 7 Am. Dec. 91; Shepard v. Little, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 210.

Where the vendor, in an action for the purchase price of land, tenders a deed, and alleges ability and readiness to make title, the answer of the vendee, which merely denies that the vendor is able to make a good and sufficient deed, is defective, in that it neither points out a defect in the title, nor makes an averment requiring an exhibition of title. Burchett v. Dailey (Ky. 1893), 23 S. W. Rep. 874.

2. Bryson v. Crawford, 68 Ill. 362; Eaton v. Redick, 1 Neb. 305; Reddington v. Henry, 48 N. H. 273; Beaman v. Simmons, 76 N. Car. 43; Colburn v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (Mont. 1893), 34 Pac. Rep. 1017.

If the vendor is unable, through his own actions or operation of law, to perform, the vendee need not tender the purchase-money and demand a deed to enable him to bring the action. Wilhelm v. Fimple, 31 Iowa 131; 7 Am. Rep. 117.

Where the vendor, in a deed with covenant of seisin, has neither title nor possession of the land described, the grantee may immediately, on discovering such facts, sue for the price paid, though the grantor has in the meantime acquired title to the land. Rombough v. Koons (Wash. 1893), 34 Pac. Rep. 135.

The vendee may recover money paid in anticipation of performance by the vendor, where the title is doubtful. Zorn v. McFarland (Super. Ct.), 28 N. Y. Supp. 485.

Upon failure of title, the vendee is not entitled to have other land of the vendor set aside to him, but should look to the covenant of warranty for money compensation. Wilbarger County v. Robinson, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 10.

The existence of liens on land subject to a contract of sale, is sufficient proof of the vendor's default to authorize the purchaser to rescind the contract, and sue for money paid under the contract, without making a formal tender of performance on his part. Ziehn v. Smith (Rockland County Ct.), 24 N. Y. Supp. 922; 2 Misc. Rep. 487; following Morange v. Morris, 3 Keyes (N. Y.) 48; Hewison v. Hoffman (C. Pl.), 4 N. Y. Supp. 621.

Where a vendor has executed a bond to convey title to land which is subject to a mortgage, for the payment of which a third party is liable primarily, of which the vendee has notice, and which is not due for more than a year after the time when a deed is due under the contract, he will, upon being sued by the vendee to recover the purchase-money paid, be allowed to perfect his title within a reasonable time, and having acted with due diligence, and so perfected it, and tendered a proper conveyance thereof, even after suit brought, but before trial, he is entitled to a judgment. Bell v. Sternberg (Kan. 1894), 36 Pac. Rep. 1058.

Interest on the part payments may be recovered. Gillet v. Maynard, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 85; 4 Am. Dec. 329.

In Baston v. Clifford, 68 Ill. 67, the cases where the action may be sustained are thus stated by the court, speaking through McAllister, J: "The cases wherein the vendee may maintain an action to recover back money paid by him, under a contract, for the purchase of real estate, where the contract has been rescinded, are: First. Where the rescission is voluntary, and with the mutual consent of the parties, and without default on either side. Second. Where the vendor cannot, or will not, perform the contract on his part. Third. Where the vendor has been guilty of fraud in making the contract. . . . Fourth. Where, by the terms of the contract, it is left in the purchaser's power to rescind it by any act on his part, and he does it. . . . Fifth. Where neither party is ready to complete the contract at the stipulated time, but each is in default."

If no land exists corresponding to the description, the purchase-money paid may be recovered by the vendee. D'Utricht v. Melchor, 1 Dall. (U. S.)

not if the vendor is in no default, and is ready and willing to perform the contract on his part.¹

The agreement for consideration may be enforced, even though not made in writing,² or though a different consideration was recited in the deed, or it was there stated that it had been paid,³ a promise to pay the price of the land not being within the Statute of Frauds.⁴

6. Other Remedies.—The other remedies open to the vendor and purchaser have been considered already, under the various heads of this title.

I. VENDOR'S IMPLIED LIEN FOR PURCHASE-MONEY OF LAND—1. Definition.—The implied lien of the vendor of land for the unpaid purchase-money has been recognized from an early period by the English chancery courts, and has been adopted in some of the states of the Union. It may exist in the absence of distinct agreement or separate security, and even though the deed of conveyance recites that the consideration has been paid.¹

2. Origin and Principle of the Doctrine.—There is a great diversity of opinion as to the origin² and grounds of the doctrine. It on Interpretation of Deeds; Hilliard on Vendors and Purchasers; Martindale on Abstracts; Rawle on Covenants; Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers; Tiedeman on Real Property; Warvelle on Vendor and Purchaser; Washburn on Real Property; Williams on Real Property.

1. In the leading English case of Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329, Lord Eldon defined the doctrine as follows: "Where the vendor conveys, without more, though the consideration is upon the face of the instrument expressed to be paid, and by a receipt indorsed upon the back, if it is the simple case of a conveyance, the money, or part of it, not being paid, as between the vendor and the vendee, and persons claiming as volunteers, upon the doctrine of this court, which, when it is settled, has the effect of contract, though perhaps no actual contract has taken place, a lien shall prevail; in the one case, for the whole consideration; in the other, for that part of the money which was not paid."

This implied, equitable lien should be distinguished carefully from the vendor's lien by express contract or reservation. See infra, this title, Vendor's Lien by Express Reservation.

In White v. Downs, 40 Tex. 225, the court, by Gray, J., said: "The vendor's lien, however, properly understood, is not, in all respects, the same as the express lien often reserved in deeds of conveyance for payment of purchase-money, nor as strict mortgages or deeds of trust for it, nor yet as the security held by a vendor who has only given a bond for the title. These are often confounded with the vendor's lien, because security of the purchase-money is common to all of them. But the vendor's lien arises wholly from inference or implication which is invisible and cannot be recorded; the others are from express contract, visible to all, and may be recorded. All of the same consequences do not, therefore necessarily result, as to assignees or holders of the debt secured by the vendor's lien, nor as to purchasers of the land liable to it, as between the original parties and privies, as do often occur in the cases of express lien by contract."

For other illustrations of the differences between the two kinds of liens, see Carpenter v. Mitchell, 54 Ill. 126, where it was held that the express lien by contract was not waived by the grantor's taking other security; and Markoe v. Andras, 67 Ill. 34, which decided that such a lien passed in equity, by an assignment of the note which it secured to the assignee. That the rule is otherwise in the case of the implied lien, see infra, this title, In Whose Favor the Lien Exists; Waiver of Lien.

2. The earliest recorded English case is Heard v. Botellers, Cary 35, decided in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The case of Chapman v. Tanner, 1 Vern. 267, decided in 1684, shows that at that time the doctrine was recognized as binding in equity. See also Bond v. Kent, 2 Vern. 281. The earliest reported American case is Garson v. Green, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 308.

In Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329, Lord Eldon said: "I take it to have been the settled doctrine at the time of the decision of Blackburn v. Gregson, 1 Bro. C. C. 420, which case so far shook the authority of Fawell v. Heells, Amb. 724, as to relieve me from any apprehension that Lord Bathurst's doctrine can be considered as affording the rule to be applied as between the vendor and vendee themselves, and persons claiming under them." The Lord Chancellor further observed that: "The doctrine is probably derived from the civil law as to goods, which goes has been asserted to rest on a natural equity;¹ a supposed intention of the parties;² a constructive trust arising out of the injustice of allowing the vendee to hold the land without paying therefor;³ and on the ground that it was a contrivance of the English court of chancery to evade the unjust rule of the common law, further than our law; by which, though the right of stoppage in transitu is founded upon natural justice and equity, yet, if possession, either actual or constructive, was taken by the vendee, the lien is gone."

1. Chapman v. Tanner, 1 Vern. 267; Warren v. Fenn, 28 Barb. (N. Y.) 333. In the latter case Potter, J., said: "It has become one of the best established principles of natural equity, that estates are to be regarded as unconscientiously obtained when the consideration is not paid." See also Hiscock v. Norton, 42 Mich. 320; Beal v. Harrington, 116 Ill. 113; Phillips v. Schall, 21 Mo. App. 38; Pratt v. Clark, 57 Mo. 191; Bennett v. Shipley, 82 Mo. 448; Barrett v. Lewis, 106 Ind. 120; Poe v. Paxton, 26 W. Va. 607; Pintard v. Goodloe, Hempst. (U. S.) 527.

This explanation of the grounds of the doctrine has not, however, been generally accepted. In the important case of Ahrend v. Odiorne, 118 Mass. 261; 19 Am. Rep. 449, Gray, C. J., rejected it altogether, and observed: "It was forcibly argued by counsel in Blackburn v. Gregson, 1 Bro. C. C. 420, and not answered by the court. 'As to the general question of the lien, it is called a natural lien; but it certainly is not so with respect to personalty, which, if once delivered, it is conclusive, though concealed from all mankind; and there seems as much natural equity in the case of personalty as realty.'"

2. This theory has never received much support. It is summarily disposed of, by Gibson, C. J., in Kauffelt v. Bower, 7 S. & R. (Pa.) 76; 10 Am. Dec. 428, who said: "The implication that there is an intention to reserve a lien for the purchase-money, in all cases in which the parties do not, by express acts, evince a contrary intention, is, in almost every case, inconsistent with the truth of the fact, and in all instances, without exception, in contradiction of the express terms of the contract, which purport to be a conveyance of everything that can pass." See also Ahrend v. Odiorne, 118 Mass. 261; 19 Am. Rep. 449; 3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (3d ed.), § 1250.

3. The generally accepted opinion appears to be that the lien is based upon the doctrine of trusts, and is itself a species of constructive trusts. Blackburn v. Gregson, 1 Bro. C. C. 420; Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329; Ringgold v. Bryan, 3 Md. Ch. 488; Moreton v. Harrison, 1 Bland (Md.) 491; 2 Story's Eq. Jur. (13th ed.), § 1218 et seq.; 1 Perry on Trusts (4th ed.), § 232.

In Blackburn v. Gregson, 1 Bro. C. C. 420, Lord Loughborough, said: "Lord Bathurst doubted whether there was such an equitable lien. Fawell v. Heelis, Ambl. 724. It becomes, therefore, of great consequence that it should be spoken of. It struck me always that there was such a lien, and that it was so from the foundation of the court. A bargain and sale must be for money paid; otherwise, it is in trust for the bargainor. If an estate is sold, and no part of the money paid, the vendee is a trustee; then, if part be paid, is it not the same as to that which is unpaid?"

On the other hand, Gray, C. J., in Ahrend v. Odiorne, 118 Mass. 264; 19 Am. Rep. 449, took a diametrically opposite view and said: "The theory that a trust arises out of the unconscientiousness of the purchaser, would construe the nonperformance of every promise, made in consideration of a conveyance of property to the promisor, into a breach of trust; and would attach the trust, not merely to the purchase-money which he agreed to pay, but to the land which he never agreed to hold for the benefit of the supposed cestui que trust."

So, also, in Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence we find the following statement: "Notwithstanding the weight of authority in support of this opinion (that the lien is a trust), it is the one, as it seems to me, having the least foundation of fact, of principle, or of analogy. It is an instance of the tendency, frequently mentioned in previous chapters, to refer all equitable rights and interests to the doctrine of trusts, a tendency which has produced much unnecessary confusion throughout the whole domain of equity jurisprudence.

freeing land from the claims of simple contract creditors, and to charge the land as security for the unpaid purchase-money.¹

It is agreed that the implied lien is of a purely equitable nature, and has no existence until established by the decree of a court in the particular case.²

3. How Far Adopted in the United States.—In the United States, the doctrine of a vendor's implied lien exists in more than half of the states.³ In several states it has been recognized by statute. In those states where it does not exist now, it has either

There is, in fact, not a single element really in common between this or any other equitable lien and a trust." 3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d ed.), § 1250, n. 1.

1. This is the explanation of the doctrine offered by the court in Ahrend v. Odiorne, 118 Mass. 261; 19 Am. Rep. 449, where Gray, C. J., after examining the theories mentioned in the text, said: "The most plausible foundation of the English doctrine, would seem to be that justice required that the vendor should be enabled, by some form of judicial process, to charge the land in the hands of the vendee as security for the unpaid purchase-money. And the restriction of the doctrine to real estate suggests the inference that the court of chancery was induced to interpose, by the consideration, that, by the law of England, real estate could neither be attached on mesne process, nor, except in certain cases or to a limited extent, taken in execution for debt." This view is also supported by the American editors of the Leading Cases in Equity (4th Am. ed.) 500.

It is interesting to note, as showing the diversity of opinion on the subject, that Mr. Pomeroy (3 Eq. Jur. (2d ed.), § 1250), rejects all of the theories above stated, and considers the lien to be "one of the many instances to be found in the early English jurisprudence, whether legal or equitable, of the higher importance, consideration and value given to real than to personal property."

The doctrine has, however, been criticised, Pierson v. David, 1 Iowa 23; and now, by a statute, the lien must be reserved in the deed in order to avail against a conveyance by the grantee. Iowa Code of 1873, § 1940; Stuart v. Harrison, 52 Iowa 511; Tinsley v. Tinsley, 52 Iowa 14; Dean v. Scott, 67 Iowa 233; Prouty v. Clark, 73 Iowa 55.

Kentucky.—Fowler v. Rust, 2 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 294; Thornton v. Knox, 6 B. Mon. (Ky.) 74; Muir v. Cross, 10 B. Mon. (Ky.) 277; Tiernan v. Thurman, 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 224; Gritton v. But it is now provided by statute that the "grantor shall not have a lien against bona fide creditors and purchasers, unless it is stated in the deed what part of the consideration remains unpaid." Kentucky Gen. Stat. 1873, p. 589; Kentucky Gen. Stat. 1883, ch. 63, art. 1, § 24; Ross v. Adams, 13 Bush (Ky.) 370; Ashbrook v. Roberts, 82 Ky. 298; Brown v. Ferrell, 83 Ky. 417.

Louisiana.—The Louisiana Rev. Civ. Code of 1870, provides that the vendor shall have a privilege "on the estate by him sold, for the payment of the price, or so much of it as is unpaid, whether it was sold on or without a credit," and that the privilege shall extend to the beasts and agricultural implements attached to the estate. Arts. 3249, 3250. But no privilege has any effect against third persons, "unless recorded in the manner required by law in the parish where the property to be affected is situated." Art. 3274. See also Louisiana Rev. Laws 1884, §§ 2876-2878; Pedesciaux v. Legaré, 32 La. Ann. 380; Succession of Clay, 34 La. Ann. 1131; Labouisse v. Rope Co., 43 La. Ann. 245.

The Doctrine Has Not Been Adopted, nor Rejected in the Following States.—In Connecticut, it has not been adopted, and may be considered in doubt. Watson v. Wells, 5 Conn. 468; Dean v. Dean, 6 Conn. 285; Meigs v. Dimock, 6 Conn. 458; Atwood v. Vincent, 17 Conn. 575; Chapman v. Beardsley, 31 Conn. 115; Hall v. Hall, 50 Conn. 104.

In Delaware, it has not been adopted.

Budd v. Busti, 1 Harr. (Del.) 69; Rice v. Rice, 36 Fed. Rep. 860.

In Georgia, it has been abolished by statute, Georgia Code 1882, § 1997; Jones v. Janes, 56 Ga. 325; Broach v. Smith, 75 Ga. 159; though it formerly existed. Mounce v. Byars, 16 Ga. 469; Still v. Griffin, 27 Ga. 504.

In Kansas, it has been denied. Simpson v. Mundee, 3 Kan. 172; Brown v. Simpson, 4 Kan. 76; Smith v. Rowland, 13 Kan. 245; Greeno v. Barnard, 18 Kan. 518.

In Maine, the doctrine has been rejected. Gilman v. Brown, 1 Mason (U. S.) 219; Philbrook v. Delano, 29 Me. 415.

In Massachusetts, it has been denied. Gilman v. Brown, 1 Mason (U. S.) 191; and rejected in Ahrend v. Odiorne, 118 Mass. 261; 19 Am. Rep. 449.

In Nebraska, it has been rejected. Edminster v. Higgins, 6 Neb. 265.

In New Hampshire, it has never been adopted for its existence was doubted. Buntin v. French, 16 N. H. 592; Arlin v. Brown, 44 N. H. 102.

In North Carolina, its existence is denied. Womble v. Battle, 3 Ired. Eq. (N. Car.) 182; Henderson v. Burton, 3 Ired. Eq. (N. Car.) 259; Cameron v. Mason, 7 Ired. Eq. (N. Car.) 180; Smith v. High, 85 N. Car. 93; Moore v. Ingram, 91 N. Car. 376; White v. Jones, 92 N. Car. 388; Peck v. Culbertson, 104 N. Car. 426; though the doctrine was adopted in the earlier cases.

In Pennsylvania, also, its existence is denied. Kauffelt v. Bower, 7 S. & R. (Pa.) 64; 10 Am. Dec. 428; Hepburn v. Snyder, 3 Pa. St. 72; Stephen's Appeal, 38 Pa. St. 9; Hiester v. Green, 48 Pa. St. 96; 86 Am. Dec. 569.

In South Carolina, it is denied. Wragg v. Comptroller Gen'l, 2 DeSaus. Eq. (S. Car.) 520.

In Vermont, it was adopted by the court in Manly v. Hason, 21 Vt. 271; 52 Am. Dec. 60; but was abolished by statute. Vermont Gen. Stat. 1862, ch. 65, § 33.

In Virginia, it has been abolished by statute, Virginia Code 1873, ch. 115, § 1; though it had formerly been recognized by the courts. Tompkins v. Mitchell, 2 Rand. (Va.) 428; Kyles v. Tait, 6 Gratt. (Va.) 44.

the United States the doctrine has been recognized wherever established by the local law of the particular state where the land is situated.¹

The same diversity of opinion which exists as to the true origin and reason of the doctrine, also exists as to its scope and operation, and even as to its soundness and wisdom.² There are few fixed rules regarding it, and they cannot be formulated so as to represent a general American doctrine.³ To ascertain the law of a given jurisdiction, it is necessary to examine carefully its decisions, and they are not always reconcilable.

4. When and to What Extent the Lien Exists.—As this lien does not, in any way, depend upon a specific agreement for its creation, it is presumed to exist in every case, unless an intention to the contrary is shown clearly; and the burden of repelling this presumption is on the vendee.⁴

In West Virginia, also, it has been abolished by statute. West Virginia Code 1870, ch. 75, § 1; Poe v. Paxton, 26 W. Va. 607; McNeil v. Miller, 29 W. Va. 480.

1. Bayley v. Greenleaf, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 46; M'Learn v. M'Lellan, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 640; Chilton v. Braiden, 2 Black (U. S.) 458; Galloway v. Finley, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 264; Cardova v. Hood, 17 Wall. (U. S.) 1; Coos Bay Wagon Road Co. v. Crocker, 6 Sawy. (U. S.) 574; Green v. Betts, 1 Fed. Rep. 289; First Nat. Bank v. Salem Capital Flour Mills Co., 39 Fed. Rep. 89.

In Rice v. Rice, 36 Fed. Rep. 860, the court said: "It has been generally understood that the Supreme Court of the United States will not consider the lien as existing in any state, unless it has been previously adopted by the law, or is recognized by the courts of the state in which the land sought to be charged is situated."

2. In 3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d ed.), § 1251, it is said: "No other single topic belonging to the equity jurisprudence, has occasioned such a diversity and even discord of opinion, among the American courts, as this of the grantor's lien. Upon nearly every question that has arisen as to its operation, its waiver or discharge, the parties against whom it avails, and the parties in whose favor it exists, the decisions in different states, and sometimes even in the same state, are directly conflicting. It is practically impossible to formulate any general rules representing the doctrine as established throughout the whole country." For a similar description of the condition of the doctrine in the United States, see the opinion of Potter, J., in Fisk v. Potter, 41 N. Y. 64.

The lien has frequently been criticised, sometimes in jurisdictions where it exists, as being a "secret trust," and so not in accord with our registry system. Bayley v. Greenleaf, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 51; Philbrook v. Delano, 29 Me. 410; Kauffelt v. Bower, 7 S. & R. (Pa.) 64; 10 Am. Dec. 428; Candlish v. Keen, 13 Gratt. (Va.) 621; Hammond v. Peyton, 34 Minn. 529. The criticism of the lien, going as it does to the very basis of the doctrine, together with the fact, as shown by the foregoing table, that it has recently been abolished by a number of states, makes it doubtful whether the doctrine will ultimately survive.

3. This does not arise wholly from the fact that the decisions in the different states are conflicting, although that is the case. The very nature of this equitable right, depending as it does upon the peculiar facts and circumstances surrounding each particular case—upon whether the equity is established, and whether it is the highest equity, and whether it has not been waived or postponed to another equity, or lost by laches—render it impossible to formulate any settled rules. Fisk v. Potter, 41 N. Y. 64.

4. Gilman v. Brown, 1 Mason (U. S.) 191; Coos Bay Wagon Road Co. v. Crocker, 6 Sawy. (U. S.) 574; Garson v. Green, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 308; Clark v. Hall, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 382; *Schnebley v. The lien is allowed only as security for the unpaid purchase-money and interest thereon.¹ It cannot be extended to cover

Where the vendor delivers possession to the purchaser without receiving the purchase-money, the vendor is entitled in equity to a lien for the purchase-money. Walrath v. Abbott, 27 N. Y. Supp. 529.

The rule stated in the text has been criticised often as a hardship to the vendee. In his judgment in Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329, Lord Eldon said: "What shall be sufficient to make a case, in which the lien can be said not to exist? It has always struck me, considering this subject, that it would have been better at once to have held that the lien should exist in no case, and the vendor should suffer the consequences of his want of caution; or to have laid down the rule the other way so distinctly, that a purchaser might be able to know, without the judgment of a court, in what cases it would, and in what it would not, exist."

For a recent case, where it was held that the evidence of a contrary intent was sufficient to rebut the general presumption, see Springfield, etc., R. Co. v. Stewart, 51 Ark. 285.

In Houston v. Dickson, 66 Tex. 79, it was held that if the vendor has no valid right to, or interest in, the land, which will vest in the vendee, he cannot claim a lien. The same case also decided that the absence of knowledge that the law gives such a security, or a secret intention not to claim it, does not affect the right.

Statute of Frauds.—In Gallagher v. Mars, 50 Cal. 23, the vendee, when he received the conveyance, verbally agreed to reconvey the land to the vendor, if the purchase-money was not paid when demanded. This agreement was void under the Statute of Frauds, and was held not to prevent the enforcement of a vendor's lien.

It is important to notice that any right to charge land with the payment of purchase-money, dependent on the agreement of the parties, and not arising out of the implied lien, is within the Statute of Frauds, and must be supported by written evidence. Stringfellow v. Ivie, 73 Ala. 209.

1. Richardson's Succession, 10 La. Ann. 616; Davis v. Wheeler (Tex. Civ. App. 1893), 23 S. W. Rep. 435. See, however, Fietsam v. Kropp, 6 Ill. App. 144, where a decree for a lien, which included in the amount due, not only the original purchase price, but a subsequent note given for unpaid interest thereon, was held erroneous.

Where, in lieu of the original notes given for the price of land, another is given, and it is afterward agreed that the grantee shall pay the interest upon the original notes in lieu of the latter, the grantor retains the equitable lien on the land for the payment of such interest. Johnson v. Betterton (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 1050.

Attorney's Fees.—It has been held that, where the note given for the purchase-money contains a stipulation by the vendee to pay the attorney's fees in case of a suit on the note, such fees can be recovered in a suit to enforce the vendor's lien. Johnson v. Durner, 88 Ala. 580; Neese v. Riley, 77 Tex. 348; Tinsley v. Moore (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 148.

Improvements by Vendor.—It has also been held that money, necessarily expended by the vendor for improvements, which, by the terms of the sale, the vendee was to make, may be regarded as unpaid purchase-money, for which the vendor may enforce a lien. Grove v. Miles, 71 Ill. 376.

Abatement of Lien.—The vendee is entitled to an abatement of the purchase price as to a portion of the land that had not come into his possession, and to which the plaintiff had no title at the time he made the conveyance. But he is not entitled to an abatement of the purchase price, where the description of the land is so indefinite that he will be presumed to know that it conveyed him no title to any land in the section. Dykes v. Bottoms (Ala. 1893), 13 So. Rep. 582.

Voluntary Conveyance.—A wife transferring her property to her husband, merely to enable him to raise funds thereon for his business, has no vendor's lien. Reynolds v. City Nat. Bank, 24 N. Y. Supp. 1134.

an indebtedness arising out of other transactions.¹ Nor does it exist in behalf of an uncertain or unliquidated demand. Thus, where the consideration for the sale of the land is an agreement to support the vendor for life, or to assume a debt or incumbrance, or to erect a building on the land, or to do certain other acts, the lien does not exist.² If, however, the land is sold for a definite Taxes.—But the vendor may pay the taxes when the vendee has allowed them to become delinquent, and recover them as a part of the lien debt. Brown v. Brown (Mo. 1894), 27 S. W. Rep. 552.

But where, as a part of the price of certain property, the grantees agreed to satisfy a charge upon the property due the plaintiff's intestate, and failed to do so, equity will enforce a vendor's lien for that amount in favor of such intestate. Waller v. Janney (Ala. 1894), 14 So. Rep. 876.

A conveyed land, subject to a mortgage, by an absolute deed to B, as security for a debt. B renewed the mortgage in his own name, and afterward, without having his debt paid, reconveyed it to A, with the understanding that he was to sell it and pay B. A conveyed it to his wife, who conveyed it to C, who had no notice of any vendor's lien on the land. All the conveyances were subject to the mortgage given by B. It was held that the deed to B, though absolute on its face, was merely a mortgage, and that he was not entitled to a vendor's lien on the land. Wenzel v. Schultz (Cal. 1893), 34 Pac. Rep. 696.

An agreement to support the vendor for life, has been held too uncertain to raise a lien. Chase v. Peck, 21 N. Y. 681; McKillip v. McKillip, 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 552; Camp v. Gifford, 67 Barb. (N. Am. St. Rep. 252; Meigs v. Dimock, 6 Conn. 458.

An agreement to assume a debt, or incumbrance, or other collateral obligation of the vendor, does not create a lien. Clarke v. Royle, 3 Sim. 499; Buckland v. Pocknell, 13 Sim. 406; Parrot v. Sweetland, 3 Myl. & K. 655; Chapman v. Beardsley, 31 Conn. 115; Lea v. Fabbri, 45 N. Y. Super. Ct. 361; Long v. Burke, 2 Bush (Ky.) 90; Patterson v. Edwards, 29 Miss. 67. But see, contra, Williams v. Crow, 84 Mo. 298; Woodall v. Kelly, 85 Ala. 368; 7 Am. St. Rep. 57; Elliott v. Plattor, 43 Ohio St. 198. So, also, an agreement to erect a building on the land creates no lien. McDonald v. Elyton Land Co., 78 Ala. 382. In this case the court said: "When the consideration of a deed is that the vendee shall enter into covenants to do specified acts, it has been held there is no lien, on the ground that the covenant is the consideration for which the vendor contracted, and having received that, he has been paid. In such case, the agreement, with the legal right to damages on breach, where the vendee is sui juris, is taken as payment." To the same effect, see Buckland v. Pocknell, 13 Sim. 406; Dixon v. Gayfere, 17 Beav. 421; Arlin v. Brown, 44 N. H. 102.

Delivery of Chattels.—On the same principle, when land is conveyed in consideration of the transfer and delivery to the vendor of chattels, choses in action, and the like, no lien exists. Harris v. Hanie, 37 Ark. 348; Bell v. Pelt, 51 Ark. 433.

In a recent Alabama case, however, it has been held that this rule does not prevail in that state, and that when the consideration is the delivery of chattels, which are capable of reduction to a money value, a lien exists for the collection of such value, upon a failure to deliver them in accordance with the terms of the contract. Cordova Coal Co. v. Long, 91 Ala. 538. See also Neel v. Clay, 48 Ala. 252; Smith v. Vaughan, 78 Ala. 201.

Complicated Agreement.—Where the price in money, which it is agreed shall be paid in personal services, or in the note of a third person, or in a certain kind of chattels, the lien may be enforced.¹

Where the note for the purchase-money is given in part for land and in part for other considerations, the lien cannot be enforced, unless the party claiming it can show precisely how much of the note represents the price of the land.²

consideration for the conveyance of the land, was a complicated agreement, on the part of the vendee, to build a house and to take a lease of it, and to do certain other acts, it was held that the lien was not sufficiently definite to enable the court to enforce it. Hiscock v. Norton, 42 Mich. 320.

An agreement to serve as minister, has also been held not to create a lien. Hudelson v. Wilson, 40 Ill. App. 29. In this case the court, by Sample, J., commenting upon the case of Harris v. Hanie, 37 Ark. 348, said: "This case makes the distinction that is to be observed in all the authorities. The consideration must be a fixed amount, determinate in and of itself, without extrinsic proof to measure its value in money. If the consideration is for the performance of an act, the nonperformance of which gives rise to a claim for unliquidated damages, there is no lien."

Purchase-Money Inseparable.—For the same reason, where the purchase price of one parcel of land is so blended, in a mortgage, with that of another, that it cannot be separated, no lien, beyond the mortgage itself, can be enforced. Ortmann v. Plummer, 52 Mich. 76. And where land and chattels are sold for a gross sum, without any separation of their values so that the consideration for which the land was sold may be determined, no lien can be enforced on the land. Suddeth v. Knight (Ala. 1894), 14 So. Rep. 475.

Annuities.—So, also, where the consideration for the conveyance is the entering into covenants for the payment of annuities, a lien is not created. Clarke v. Royle, 3 Sim. 499; Parrot v. Sweetland, 3 Myl. & K. 655.

Exchange of Lands.—For various decisions relating to the lien arising on an exchange of lands, see Drinkwater v. Moreman, 61 Ga. 395; Bryant v. Stephens, 58 Ala. 636; Betts v. Sykes, 82 Ala. 378; McDole v. Purdy, 23 Iowa 277; Hare v. Van Deusen, 32 Barb. (N. Y.) 92; Louisiana Nat. Bank v. Knapp, 61 Miss. 485; Beal v. Har- rington, 116 Ill. 113; Bennett v. Shipley, 82 Mo. 448; Claybrooks v. Kelly, 61 Tex. 634. The general rule is that, where a sum of money is due one party to the exchange for the excess in value of the land conveyed by him, he may enforce the lien to the extent of such excess.

Conveyances to Married Women.—With respect to the liens arising on conveyances to married women, see Haskell v. Scott, 56 Ind. 564; Moore v. Worthy, 56 Ala. 163; Carver v. Eads, 65 Ala. 190; Crampton v. Prince, 83 Ala. 246; 3 Am. St. Rep. 718; Davenport v. Murray, 68 Mo. 198; McLain v. Thompson, 52 Miss. 418; Martin v. Cauble, 72 Ind. 67; Ogle v. Ogle, 41 Ohio St. 359.

In Harvey v. Kelley, 41 Miss. 490; 93 Am. Dec. 267, the note given for the purchase-money contained an agreement that it should be paid in lumber. In Deason v. Taylor, 53 Miss. 697, the note was drawn payable in Mississippi certificates of indebtedness; in both cases, however, it was held that the lien existed. These cases are to be distinguished from cases like Harris v. Hanie, 37 Ark. 348, where the agreement to deliver cotton was the real consideration, and not the mode of paying a fixed sum in money. See, however, Hazeltine v. Moore, 21 Hun (N. Y.) 355.

2. Swain v. Cato, 34 Tex. 395; Sutton v. Sutton, 39 Tex. 549; Hicks v. Morris, 57 Tex. 658; Russell v. McCormick, 45 Ala. 587; 6 Am. Rep. 707; *Stringfellow v. Va. 287; Clark v. Curtis, 11 Leigh (Va.) 585. This rule has

The general rule, therefore, running through the cases, is that to create a lien there must be a fixed sum of money due from the vendee to the vendor, as the purchase-money for land conveyed; and the lien avails in favor of that debt, and that debt only.¹

5. What Property May Be Subjected to the Lien.—In general, the lien attaches to the interest of the vendor in the real estate, whatever the nature of that interest may be.² It attaches to an equitable, as well as a legal interest,³ to a lease-hold interest,⁴ to a right of way over the vendor's land,⁵ and to a preemption claim upon public lands.⁶ In England, it has been held to attach to copyholds as well as freeholds.⁷ The lien is, moreover, superior to rights of dower⁸ and homestead,⁹ and may be enforced against the separate estate of a married woman.¹⁰ been put on various grounds; the true principle is, that the court will never enforce a lien, unless "it can accurately ascertain and define the amount of the charge to be imposed upon the land and enforced out of it." Peters v. Tunell, 43 Minn. 475; 19 Am. St. Rep. 252.

1. Peters v. Tunell, 43 Minn. 473; 19 Am. St. Rep. 252; and see cases cited supra.

2. Where one's interest as an heir, in an estate consisting of personal and real property, is sold, the vendor's lien attaches to the undivided interest in the lands of the estate, and, on partition, follows the tracts set apart to the purchaser. Bergman v. Blackwell (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 23 S. W. Rep. 243.

Co., 3 McCrary (U.S.) 489. Contra, Strider v. King, 3 Cranch (C. C.) 67.

In Ortmann v. Plummer, 52 Mich. 76, the court, by Campbell, J., said: "The right of a vendor, to a lien, does not seem to be confined to the sale of a legal title or title in fee. The leading case of Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329, was one relating to what was treated as an equitable title. The doctrine has been applied to copyholds, and appears to be received as to all recognized titles. The lien on an equitable title may, no doubt, be more uncertain, by reason of the danger that bona fide purchasers from the legal holder may intervene and destroy it. But subject to that risk (which is not confined to equitable estates) it may be upheld."

In most of the cases above cited, the equitable interest conveyed was that of a person who had purchased and paid for real estate, and had a right to a deed under a title bond or certificate. In all such cases, it has been held that the lien exists in favor of the equitable owner.

In Russell v. Watt, 41 Miss. 602; 93 Am. Dec. 270, the equitable interest was that of a daughter, to whom her father had made a parol gift of land. The daughter sold her interest, and was held to have a lien for the purchase-money. But see Kelly v. Ruble, 11 Oregon 75.

The lien does not, however, attach to anything not real estate.¹ It cannot be enforced against the proceeds of the interest sold,² or against the rents and profits,³ or against anything which has become personalty by severance from the real estate.⁴ Nor does it extend to any land except that sold by the one seeking to enforce the lien,⁵ but it does extend to the whole and to every part of the latter.⁶

6. In Whose Favor the Lien Exists—a. GENERALLY.—The lien may be enforced, of course, by the vendor, and, upon his decease, by his personal representatives.⁷ This is the case, whatever the capacity in which the land was held by the vendor when conveyed. Thus, it may be enforced by guardians,⁸ and by mortgagees.⁹ So, also, it exists in favor of a partner, upon a sale of his interest in co-partnership lands to his co-partner, where there are no firm creditors;¹⁰ in favor of tenants in common, who sell their shares

4. Jamison v. Barelli, 20 La. Ann. 452; Manning v. Frazier, 96 Ill. 279. In the latter case, the owner of land sold and conveyed to another all the coal, limestone, and other mineral in the land, with an express license to the grantee to dig and remove them, for which grant the purchaser agreed to pay a stipulated price per ton for the minerals removed, payable in quarterly payments. It was held that the grantor had a lien on the coal and mineral not mined and removed, for the purchase-money, and that he could enforce it by a sale of the mineral not taken from the ground. It was held, also, that the lien did not attach to the coal and mineral removed from the land, because such coal and mineral had, by severance, become personal property.

5. Fietsam v. Kropp, 6 Ill. App. 144; Bishop v. Snell, 37 Ala. 90. In the latter case, it was held that the lien did not extend to land received by the vendee in exchange for the land bought. See, however, Child v. Burton, 6 Bush (Ky.) 617.

In Tiernan v. Beam, 2 Ohio 383; 15 Am. Dec. 557, the lien was enforced in favor of a devisee of the debt secured thereby. See also Lavender v. Abbott, 30 Ark. 172. And where a sale was made by an administrator, for the purpose of division among the heirs of the vendor, the heirs were allowed to maintain a bill to enforce the lien. Knight v. Blanton, 51 Ala. 333.

Where the widow and children of an intestate agree that the widow shall take a child's portion in lieu of dower, and join in conveying the land, receiving the purchaser's note in part payment, which is given to the widow as her distributive share, her heirs may enforce a vendor's lien on the land, since she did not convey a dower interest which terminated at her death, but, together with her children, conveyed a fee, in part payment of which the note was given. Oglesby v. Bingham, 69 Miss. 795.

severally,¹ and in favor of one to whom money has been allowed as owelty in partition.²

Although, as it hereafter appears, the tendency in the United States is to confine the right to enforce the lien to the vendor, where, by agreement between the vendor and vendee, the purchase-money, or a portion thereof, is payable to a third person, that person is held to have a lien;³ but the mere lending of money to pay for land does not create a lien in favor of the lender,⁴ even if he takes a mortgage or note reciting such a lien.⁵

b. ASSIGNMENT OF LIEN.—In England, the prevailing opinion does not confine the right to enforce the lien to the vendor. Other parties may avail themselves of it by way of subrogation, or as assignees.⁶ In the United States, on the other hand, the tendency of the courts has been in the opposite direction. The English doctrine has been followed in some of the states,⁷ but in

In Mississippi, a distinction has been drawn between a vendor and a grantor; the former may enforce the lien, if the note is payable to him, even if the land was not actually conveyed by him. Perkins v. Gibson, 51 Miss. 699; 24 Am. Rep. 644; Rutland v. Brister, 53 Miss. 683.

The rule is the same where one of two joint purchasers pays the whole purchase-money, and the estate is conveyed to them both. The one who pays has no lien. Brown v. Budd, 2 Ind. 442.

In Carey v. Boyle, 53 Wis. 574, A purchased one hundred and twenty acres of land for the benefit of B, and paid the purchase-money, and had the deed made to B. The deed was left with A, and, upon B's paying back to A part of the consideration money, and giving A his notes for the remainder, the deed was delivered to B, and he took possession of the land. It was held that A had a lien for the amount of the unpaid notes, and the court, by Orton, J., laid down the rule as follows: "It must be understood that the extension of this equity, to a third person, is strictly confined to those who furnish or advance the purchase-money to the purchaser, in such manner that they can be said either to have paid it to the vendor personally, or caused it to be paid, on behalf or for the benefit of the purchaser; and to this extent they become parties to the transaction. It must not be a general loan, to be used by the purchaser to pay the consideration of the purchase, or to be used for any other purpose at his pleasure. In such case, the simple fact that the money can be traced into the land as having been paid by the purchaser to the vendor, as the whole or part of the purchase-money, gives the person who loaned it no such right." The rule in Wisconsin, allowing subrogation in cases like that stated above, is not, however, supported by the weight of authority in this country. See cases cited supra.

7. The Lien Is Assignable in—Alabama.—The following cases hold that a most of them the lien is treated as a strictly personal right of the vendor, and is not assignable,¹ either by express language, or by transfer of the notes by indorsement carries with it the lien. Roper v. McCook, 7 Ala. 318; White v. Stover, 10 Ala. 441; Wells v. Morrow, 38 Ala. 125; Lang v. Wilkinson, 57 Ala. 259; Buford v. McCormick, 57 Ala. 428; Wilkinson v. May, 69 Ala. 33.

A transfer of the note given for the purchase-money, by delivery only, without recourse to the vendor or liability on his part, does not carry the lien. Bankhead v. Owen, 60 Ala. 457; Walker v. Carroll, 65 Ala. 61; Prickett v. Sibert, 71 Ala. 194; Preston v. Ellington, 74 Ala. 133; Weaver v. Brown, 87 Ala. 533.

But now it is provided by statute that "the transfer of a bond, bill, or note, given for the purchase-money of lands, whether the transfer be by delivery merely, or in writing, expressed to be with or without recourse on the transferrer," passes to the transferee the lien of the vendor on the lands." Alabama Code, § 1764.

In Jones v. Lockard, 89 Ala. 575, the court, in applying the statute, held that one who merely advanced money by way of loan to pay the notes, and did not purchase them, could not enforce the lien.

In Hicks v. Morris, 57 Tex. 658, and Oury v. Saunders, 77 Tex. 278, it is held that equity will subrogate the lender who advances money to pay a lien creditor, to the rights of such creditor under the lien, as effectually as if he had become the assignee of the notes for the purchase-money.

1. In the Following States the Lien Cannot Be Transferred Either by Assignment or by Subrogation—Arkansas.—Shall v. Biscoe, 18 Ark. 162; Williams v. Christian, 23 Ark. 255; *Hutton v. The lien, may, however, be assigned as collateral security. Crawley v. Riggs, 24 Ark. 563; Carlton v. Buckner, 28 Ark. 66; Chapman v. Liggett, 41 Ark. 292.

In Rodman v. Sanders, 44 Ark. 504, it was held that one who, at the request of the purchaser, paid the debt, and showed an intention to keep the lien alive for his protection, by retaining the purchase note and deed in his possession, with the assent of the debtor, was subrogated to the rights of the vendor.

implication, upon an assignment of the debt secured thereby.¹ In jurisdictions where the lien is not assignable, it cannot be enforced by the vendor, after a transfer of the debt to which it is incident, either for the benefit of the assignee of the debt,² or for the benefit of the vendor himself,³ unless he continues to have a pecuniary interest in the debt.⁴ If, however, the vendor is obliged to take up a note which he has transferred, by reason of its non-payment, the lien is revived,⁵ and in several jurisdictions, Minnesota.—Hammond v. Peyton, 34 Minn. 529.

Mississippi.—Skaggs v. Nelson, 25 Miss. 88; Walker v. Williams, 30 Miss. 165; Stratton v. Gold, 40 Miss. 778; Lindsey v. Bates, 42 Miss. 397; Pitts v. Parker, 44 Miss. 247; Murphree v. Countiss, 58 Miss. 716. See, however, the opinion of Tarbell, J., in Perkins v. Gibson, 51 Miss. 699; 24 Am. Rep. 644.

In Lindsey v. Bates, 42 Miss. 397, it was held that, if the vendor had assigned the note and was obliged to take it up, the lien revived in his favor. But the rule in Mississippi is now changed by a statute, which provides that the assignee of a claim for the purchase-money of land may enforce the vendor's lien "as the vendor could." See Mississippi Code of 1880, § 1124; Annot. Code 1892, § 3503; Louisiana Nat. Bank v. Knapp, 61 Miss. 485.

New York.—White v. Williams, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 502. In Smith v. Smith, 9 Abb. Pr. N. S. (Buffalo Super. Ct.), 420, it was held that, where the vendor continues to have a pecuniary interest in the payment of the debt, he may enforce the lien, even after an assignment of the debt.

Ohio.—Jackman v. Hallock, 1 Ohio 318; 13 Am. Dec. 627; Tiernan v. Beam, 2 Ohio 383; 15 Am. Dec. 557; Brush v. Kinsley, 14 Ohio 20; Horton v. Horner, 14 Ohio 437.

In Tiernan v. Beam, 2 Ohio 383; 15 Am. Dec. 557, it was held that one to whom the notes were devised, could enforce the lien.

Oregon.—First Nat. Bank v. Salem Capital Flour Mills Co., 39 Fed. Rep. 89.

Tennessee.—Tharpe v. Dunlap, 4 Heisk. (Tenn.) 674; Durant v. Davis, 10 Heisk. (Tenn.) 522; Cowan v. Sharp, 11 Heisk. (Tenn.) 450; Green v. Demoss, 10 Humph. (Tenn.) 371; Bowlin v. Pearson, 4 Baxt. (Tenn.) 341; McWhirter v. Swaffer, 6 Baxt. (Tenn.)

In Baum v. Grisby, 21 Cal. 173; 81 Am. Dec. 153, Field, C. J., speaking on the question where a lien is held not to be assignable, said: "It is simply a right to resort to the property upon a failure of payment by the vendee. It does not arise from any agreement of the parties, but is the creature of equity, and is established solely for the security of the vendor. It is founded upon the natural justice of allowing a party to reach the property, which he has transferred, to satisfy the debt which constitutes the consideration of the transfer. It is, therefore, the personal privilege of the vendor. The assignee of a note given for the purchase-money, stands in a very different position. He has not parted with the property which he seeks to reach in consideration of the note he has received. He has never held the property and has, therefore, no special claims upon equity to subject it to sale for his benefit. The particular equity of the vendor in this respect cannot, in the nature of things, be asserted by another." See also Hammond v. Peyton, 34 Minn. 529.

As the lien arises out of the relation of vendor and vendee, the theory is that an assignment of the debt destroying the relation, destroys the lien. Louisiana Nat. Bank v. Knapp, 61 Miss. 490.

It is also considered that general principles of public policy and expediency are opposed to any extension of the privilege. Hammond v. Peyton, 34 Minn. 529.

where the lien is not generally assignable, it, nevertheless, has been held by the courts, or provided by statute, that, where the transfer is in payment, or as security for a debt of the vendor, the lien is preserved.¹

In those states where the lien is assignable, it may be enforced by the assignee in his own name and for his own benefit, provided he is rightfully the owner of the claim for the purchase-money.² But if the vendor assigns the notes for the debt "without recourse,"³ or by delivery only,⁴ or in any other manner by which his own liability is destroyed, the lien does not pass. Where there are several notes for the purchase-money, and some of them are afterward transferred by indorsement, the indorsement of each is, pro tanto, an assignment of the vendor's lien;⁵ and the same is true where there is an assignment of part of a note.⁶

c. SUBROGATION.—In jurisdictions where the lien is not assign-

Lindsey v. Bates, 42 Miss. 397; Cotten v. McGehee, 54 Miss. 510; Rogers v. James, 33 Ark. 77. And a fortiori the rule is the same in jurisdictions where the lien is assignable. Kelly v. Payne, 18 Ala. 371; Preston v. Ellington, 74 Ala. 133. And see Smith v. Snowden (Ky. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 805.

1. Carlton v. Buckner, 28 Ark. 66; Chapman v. Liggett, 41 Ark. 292; Hallock v. Smith, 3 Barb. (N. Y.) 272; California Civ. Code, § 3047; Dakota Civ. Code, § 1802.

In Hallock v. Smith, 3 Barb. (N. Y.) 272, the reason for this exception is stated thus: "If the note or bond is assigned or transferred to a third person, for his benefit, the security is gone forever. The reason is, that there is no peculiar equity in favor of the third person. But that does not apply where, as in this case, the transfer is only for the purpose of paying the debt of the vendor, so far as may be available, and is, therefore, for his benefit. There the equity continues." The same rule, of course, obtains wherever the lien is assignable. Plowman v. Riddle, 14 Ala. 169; 48 Am. Dec. 92.

2. Wells v. Morrow, 38 Ala. 125; Burford v. McCormick, 57 Ala. 428; and see cases cited above in this section.

In Plowman v. Riddle, 14 Ala. 169; 48 Am. Dec. 92, it was held that, where the note secured by the lien was transferred as collateral security, the lien could be asserted only by the transferee jointly with the vendor, and that a bill filed by the vendor alone could not be maintained.

3. Bankhead v. Owen, 60 Ala. 457; Barnett v. Riser, 63 Ala. 347; Walker

v. Carroll, 65 Ala. 61; Schnebly v. Ragan, 7 Gill & J. (Md.) 120; 28 Am. Dec. 195. This rule has, however, been changed in Alabama by statute, Alabama Code, § 1764; and does not prevail in Texas, Neese v. Riley, 77 Tex. 348.

4. Prickett v. Sibert, 71 Ala. 194; Preston v. Ellington, 74 Ala. 133; Daily v. Reid, 74 Ala. 415.

5. Preston v. Ellington, 74 Ala. 133. In Robertson v. Guerin, 50 Tex. 317, it was held that the assignee was entitled to priority of payment, out of the proceeds of the sale of the land, before the notes retained by the vendor, without regard to the time of their maturity. But it has been held in Texas that the fact that one of several notes, all of which constituted a vendor's lien, was assigned first, confers on the holder no right to priority of payment as against assignees of other notes, Wooters v. Hollingsworth, 58 Tex. 371; Salmon v. Downs, 55 Tex. 243; contra, Griggsby v. Hair, 25 Ala. 327; or even as against the vendor who has retained other notes, unless it was clearly the intention that the assignee should be first paid. Salmon v. Downs, 55 Tex. 243. See also Whitehead v. Fisher, 64 Tex. 638; Andrews v. Hobgood, 1 Lea (Tenn.) 693; Davidson v. Allen, 36 Miss. 419; McClintic v. Wise, 25 Gratt. (Va.) 448; 18 Am. Rep. 694; 2 W. & T. Lead Cases (4th Am. ed.), p. 2009. In most cases where the point has arisen the lien has been a reserved lien. See infra, this title, Vendor's Lien by Express Reservation—Assignment.

6. Thomas v. Wyatt, 5 B. Mon. (Ky.) 132.

able, even by an express contract, it necessarily follows that there can be no equitable assignment by way of subrogation.¹ Where the lien is assignable, on the other hand, subrogation is possible, and will be allowed wherever the equities demand it.²

7. Against Whom the Lien May Be Enforced.—The lien, once established, avails against the vendee himself, his heirs, devisees, and other immediate successors in interest; and against the rights of dower and homestead of his widow.³ It also avails against all

1. See note, supra.

2. Subrogation.—There are various classes of cases in which subrogation is allowed. A surety on a note for the purchase-money, who has paid the debt, may be subrogated to the lien of the vendor, Lusk v. Hopper, 3 Bush (Ky.) 179; but not before he has paid the debt in full. McConnell v. Beattie, 34 Ark. 113.

Also, where one sold land on which there was a mortgage, which the vendee agreed to pay, and the vendee died insolvent after conveying the property to another, leaving the original vendor to pay the mortgage debt, it was held that the latter had a vendor's lien against the last purchaser. Lowry v. Smith, 97 Ind. 466.

Again, where a purchaser of property pays off a lien thereon, and it is attempted to subject the property in his hands to other incumbrances existing at the time of his purchase, he will be subrogated to the rights of the owner as against another incumbrance. Planter's Bank v. Dodson, 9 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 527.

On the same principle, one who has paid off the vendor's lien is entitled, as against a judgment creditor of the vendee, to be subrogated to the vendor's rights and equities. Peet v. Beers, 4 Ind. 46.

In Rodman v. Sanders, 44 Ark. 504, a third person paid the purchase-money debt at the request of the debtor-vendee, and, at the time of payment, showed an intention to keep the lien alive for his own benefit, by retaining the purchase note and deed in his possession with the consent of the vendee. It was held that he was a purchaser of the incumbrance, and would be subrogated to the rights of the vendor.

In Beck v. Tarrant, 61 Tex. 402, it was held that one whose land is bound equally with that of another for the satisfaction of a vendor's lien, and who pays off a judgment for the debt, is entitled to contribution from the other, and may be subrogated to all the rights of the vendor and enforce the lien.

It has been held that one who merely lends money to pay a lien creditor, may be subrogated to the rights of the latter under his lien, as effectually as if the purchase-money notes had been assigned to him, Hicks v. Morris, 57 Tex. 658; Carey v. Boyle, 53 Wis. 574; but it is believed that such is not the general doctrine, even in jurisdictions where the lien is assignable. Chapman v. Abrahams, 61 Ala. 108. In states where the lien is not assignable, the rule is quite the contrary. See note, supra, and cases there cited.

3. Shall v. Biscoe, 18 Ark. 142; Chapman v. Liggett, 41 Ark. 292; Burt v. Wilson, 28 Cal. 632; 87 Am. Dec. 142; Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329; Simpson v. McAllister, 56 Ala. 228; Bankhead v. Owen, 60 Ala. 457; Walton v. Hargroves, 42 Miss. 18; 97 Am. Dec. 429.

Against Homestead.—McHendry v. Reilly, 13 Cal. 75; Bradley v. Curtis, 79 Ky. 327; Claybrooks v. Kelly, 61 Tex. 634.

Coverture is no answer to a suit to enforce a vendor's lien. Crampton v. Prince, 83 Ala. 246; 3 Am. St. Rep. 718; Mims v. Macon, etc., R. Co., 3 Ga. 342.

subsequent purchasers who have notice that the purchase-money is unpaid,¹ or who are not purchasers for a valuable consideration.² In other words, the lien may be enforced against all persons claiming under the first vendee, whether as purchasers or incumbrancers, who paid no value, even although they had no notice of the non-payment of the purchase-money, and also against all such persons who had notice of the vendor's claim, although they paid value.³ That the lien does not prevail as against a subsequent bona fide purchaser, or mortgagee of the legal title for value and without notice, is also well established.⁴

1. Purchasers with Notice.—Graves v. Coutant, 31 N. J. Eq. 763; Whetsel v. Roberts, 31 Ohio St. 503; Merritt v. Wells, 18 Ind. 171; Watson v. Wells, 5 Conn. 468; Thornton v. Knox, 6 B. Mon. (Ky.) 74; Swan v. Benson, 31 Ark. 728 (here, the purchasers knew that part of the original purchase-money was not paid, and it was held sufficient notice); Chapman v. Liggett, 41 Ark. 292; Woodall v. Kelly, 85 Ala. 368; 7 Am. St. Rep. 57; Strohm v. Good, 113 Ind. 93; Beal v. Harrington, 116 Ill. 113; Koch v. Roth (Ill. 1894), 37 N. E. Rep. 317; Thomas v. Bridges, 73 Mo. 530; Orrick v. Durham, 79 Mo. 174 (here a lien was reserved in the deed, and it was held that "a purchaser is bound to take notice of all liens shown to exist by his vendor's title deeds"); Christopher v. Christopher, 64 Md. 583; Mitchell v. Dawson, 23 W. Va. 86.

Disposition of Proceeds of Sale.—But upon a sale of the land to enforce a vendor's lien, the subsequent purchaser from the vendee is entitled to the surplus, after satisfying the judgment and costs. Llano Improvement, etc., Co. v. May (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 24 S. W. Rep. 40.

2. Volunteers.—Bailey v. Tindall, 59 Tex. 540; Tucker v. Hadley, 52 Miss. 414; McLain v. Thompson, 52 Miss. 418; Pylant v. Reeves, 53 Ala. 132; 25 Am. Rep. 605; Carver v. Eads, 65 Ala. 190; Higgins v. Kendall, 73 Ind. 522; Dwenger v. Branigan, 95 Ind. 221; Mitchell v. Dawson, 23 W. Va. 86; Frail v. Ellis, 15 Beav. 350; Christopher v. Christopher, 64 Md. 583.

Part Payment.—It is held that where a subsequent purchaser has no notice of the lien, but has paid part only of the purchase-money, the original vendor may enforce his lien for the amount still due from such subsequent purchaser, but no further, upon the land in the hands of the latter. Rawles v. Perkey, 50 Tex. 311; Higgins v. Kendall, 73 Ind. 522; Craft v. Russell, 67 Ala. 9; Hunt v. Brand, 5 B. Mon. (Ky.) 562; Mitchell v. Dawson, 23 W. Va. 86. The general rule is that, to constitute a defense, the money must actually be paid before notice is received. Campbell v. Roach, 45 Ala. 667.

Assignees in Bankruptcy.—In Exchange, etc., Bank v. Stone, 80 Ky. 109, an assignee in bankruptcy was held not to be a purchaser for a valuable consideration, and the lien was enforced against him. See also 2 Story's Eq. Jur. (13th ed.), § 1228; Bayley v. Greenleaf, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 46; Corlies v. Howland, 26 N. J. Eq. 311; Phelps v. Curtis, 80 Ill. 109; Bowles v. Rogers, 6 Ves. 95.

Holthaus, 12 Mo. App. 526; Arledge v. Hail, 54 Tex. 398; Mitchell v. Dawson, 23 W. Va. 86.

The release of a vendor's lien, executed by the vendor after he has assigned the lien, is good as to a subsequent incumbrancer without notice of the assignment. Moran v. Wheeler (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 297.

Mortgages.—In the following cases, parties to whom the vendee mortgaged the land, as security for a debt contracted at the time, and who took without notice, were protected. Short v. Battle, 52 Ala. 456; Growing v. Behn, 10 B. Mon. (Ky.) 383; Poe v. Paxton, 26 W. Va. 607; Richards v. McPherson, 74 Ind. 158. And it even has been held that an equitable mortgagee is entitled to priority. Rice v. Rice, 2 Drew. 73.

Equitable Title.—A purchaser for value of the equitable title, whether with or without notice, takes subject to the vendor's lien. Walton v. Hargroves, 42 Miss. 18; 97 Am. Dec. 429; Stoner v. Harris, 81 Va. 451; Butler v. Douglass, 1 McCrary (U. S.) 630. The reason obviously is, that the protection extended in equity to a subsequent purchaser for value without notice, belongs only to the purchaser of the legal title. If, however, the equity of the purchaser, although later in time, is superior in merit to that of the vendor, it will be preferred. Hume v. Dixon, 37 Ohio St. 66.

Creditors and Assignees.—A creditor, or an assignee for the benefit of creditors, who takes the property as security for, or in payment of, a preëxisting debt, paying no new consideration, is not a purchaser for value, and takes subject to the lien. Walton v. Hargroves, 42 Miss. 18; 97 Am. Dec. 429; Shirley v. Congress Steam Sugar Refinery, 2 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 505; Brown v. Vanlier, 7 Humph. (Tenn.) 239; Bailey v. Tindall, 59 Tex. 540. But see Wert v. Naylor, 93 Ind. 431; Butterfield v. Okie, 36 N. J. Eq. 482.

Sale of Part of Land.—Where the vendee sells part of the premises, with notice to the purchaser of the lien, the vendor will be required to exhaust the property remaining in the hands of his vendee, before resorting to the part so sold. McLaurie v. Thomas, 39 Ill. 291.

Several Purchasers.—Where the vendee sells the land to different purchasers, all having notice of the rights of the original vendor, the lands will be charged ratably. Blight v. Banks, 6 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 192; 17 Am. Dec. 136; McLaurie v. Thomas, 39 Ill. 291. But where the purchaser from the first vendee, of a part of the premises, holds in such a manner that the first vendor's lien still exists as to him, and he purchased with knowledge that the residue of the premises had been sold to other parties discharged from that lien, the portion so purchased by him must bear the whole burden of the unpaid purchase-money due the first vendor. McLaurie v. Thomas, 39 Ill. 291.

In Alabama v. Stanton, 5 Lea (Tenn.) 423, where the vendee sold the land in separate lots, it was held that the lien should be enforced by a sale of the lots in the inverse order of their conveyance. See also Whitten v. Saunders, 75 Va. 563.

What Is Notice.—The knowledge that any part of the purchase-money is unpaid, is notice. Manly v. Slason, 21 Vt. 271; 52 Am. Dec. 60; Baum v. Grigsby, 21 Cal. 176; 81 Am. Dec. 153; Hawk v. Leverett, 71 Ga. 675; so is knowledge of unfinished negotiations, in regard to the land, between the original vendor and vendee, Hopkins v. Garard, 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 312; so, also, recitals in a vendor's deed, showing the non-payment of the purchase-money, constitute notice, Kilpatrick v. Kilpatrick, 23 Miss. 124; 55 Am. Dec. 79; McAlpine v. Burnett, 23 Tex. 649; Woodward v. Woodward, 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 116; Orrick v. Durham, 79 Mo. 174; and the fact that the original vendor remains in possession of the land is strong evidence of notice, Pell v. McElroy, 36 Cal. 268; Hamilton v. Fowlkes, 16 Ark. 340; and, in general, where a subsequent purchaser has knowledge of facts which would put a reasonable man on his inquiry as to the existence of a lien, and such inquiry would have discovered the lien, he is charged with notice. Cordova v. Hood, 17 Wall (U. S.) 1; Keith v. Wolf, 5 Bush (Ky.) 646; Autrey v. Whitmore, 31 Tex. 623; Rosette v. Wynn, 73 Ala. 146. It is not necessary that the purchaser should have notice that the debt for the purchase-money constitutes a lien. Brinkerhoff v. Van Sciven, 4 N. J. Eq. 251.

As to what must be alleged in the answer by a purchaser, who relies upon want of notice as a defense, see Pearce v. Foreman, 29 Ark. 563; Wells v. Morrow, 38 Ala. 125; Buford v. McCormick, 57 Ala. 428.

Improvements by Purchaser.—It has been held that where a purchaser has, in good faith and without notice of the lien, made improvements increasing the value of the land, he is entitled to compensation therefor, as against the one seeking to charge the land, although a conveyance of the legal estate has not been executed. Ware v. Curry, 67 Ala. 274. But a purchaser, or sub-purchaser, in possession when lands are sold to enforce a lien, is not entitled,

There is a direct conflict of opinion on the question of precedence as between the lien of the vendor and subsequent judgment liens recovered against the estate of the vendee for a valuable consideration and without notice. In some jurisdictions the vendor's lien is held to be superior;¹ in others, precedence is given to subsequent judgment liens, and even to attaching creditors of the vendee without notice.²

As between the lien of the vendor and a mortgage arising at the same time, it has been held that the lien of the mortgage will prevail.³

8. Waiver of Lien—a. GENERALLY.—The tendency of the courts is to restrict, rather than to extend the operation of the implied lien,⁴ and, although the lien is always presumed to exist, unless a contrary intention is shown,⁵ any act or declaration on the part of the vendor, which shows that he does not rely upon it, or has abandoned it, operates to prevent it from attaching, or to discharge it.⁶ The party alleging a waiver, must prove it by a clear as against a purchaser at the sale, to the crops planted and growing on the lands at the time of the sale. Johnston v. Smith, 70 Ala. 108.

1. Priority.—Tucker v. Hadley, 52 Miss. 414 (in this case the lien was held to prevail over a title acquired under execution sale); Walton v. Hargroves, 42 Miss. 18; 97 Am. Dec. 429; Parker v. Kelly, 10 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 184; Lamberton v. Van Voorhis, 15 Hun (N. Y.) 336; Lissa v. Posey, 64 Miss. 352; Bowman v. Faw, 5 Lea (Tenn.) 472; Dickerson v. Carroll, 76 Ala. 377; Messmore v. Stephens, 83 Ind. 524. In Texas, it is held that a judgment creditor, who purchases at an execution sale, and has the amount of his bid credited on the execution, may be considered a bona fide purchaser. Wallace v. Campbell, 54 Tex. 87. But see Bailey v. Tindall, 59 Tex. 540; Ayres v. Duprey, 27 Tex. 606; 86 Am. Dec. 657, showing that it is an exception to the general rule.

2. Johnson v. Cawthorn, 1 Dev. & B. Eq. (N. Car.) 32; 27 Am. Dec. 250; Harper v. Williams, 1 Dev. & B. Eq. (N. Car.) 379; Webb v. Robinson, 14 Ga. 216; Allen v. Loring, 34 Iowa 499; Cutter v. Ammon, 65 Iowa 281; Gann v. Chester, 5 Yerg. (Tenn.) 205; Bayley v. Greenleaf, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 46; Robinson v. Williams, 22 N. Y. 380; Cook v. Banker, 50 N. Y. 655; Smith v. Wortham, 82 Va. 937; Poe v. Paxton, 26 W. Va. 607.

Attaching Creditors.—It has also been held that the rights of attaching creditors of the vendee, without notice, are superior to the lien. Adams v. Buchanan, 49 Mo. 64; Porter v. Dubuque, 20 Iowa 440; Allen v. Loring, 34 Iowa 499. Contra, Chapman v. Chapman, 55 Ark. 542.

For an interesting discussion of this whole subject of priority, see 3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d ed.), § 1253, note; Poe v. Paxton, 26 W. Va. 607, and cases cited.

3. Fisk v. Potter, 2 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 138. In this case, a railroad company had executed and recorded a mortgage of all the lands it owned, or should acquire, in trust to secure bondholders, and an agent of the company sold and conveyed land to the company. It was held that of the two liens, accruing at the same time, the legal lien of the recorded mortgage was superior to that of the vendor.

An express agreement to waive the lien has, of course, the same effect. McLaurie v. Thomas, 39 Ill. 291.

Where a grantor, in conversation with a director of a bank, states that he is willing to convey a half interest in certain land to the president of the bank, with the understanding that such preponderance of testimony;¹ but in an action to enforce the lien, it is not necessary for the vendor, in the first instance, to allege that he has not waived the same.²

As a general principle, a lien which has been waived or abandoned, cannot be revived.³

b. BY TAKING SECURITY.—Unless there is an express agreement to that effect, the lien is not waived by the fact that the vendor takes the personal security of the vendee—such as his note, or bond or bill—for the purchase-money.⁴ Such security is supposed to be taken for the purpose of overcoming the acknowledgment of the payment of the purchase-money contained in the president is to pay him by giving him credit upon notes then running against him in the bank, it does not amount to a notice to the director that the grantor intends to retain a vendor's lien, but rather imports a notice that no such lien is to be retained. First Nat. Bank v. Tompkins (C. C. A.), 57 Fed. Rep. 20.

A lien is not waived by a conveyance containing a covenant that the property is "free from all charges and incumbrances." Slide, etc., Mines v. Seymour, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 842.

A vendor who has reserved a lien on an entire tract of land, agreeing to release therefrom such portions as might be sold by the vendees, on their turning over to him the cash and notes secured by a sub-vendor's lien, received by them on such sales, is not bound to release any portion on the payment by the vendees of one of their own purchase-money notes, without having sold any portion of the land; nor is he bound to execute such release, though the vendees have sold a portion of the land, where they platted it into lots, and blocks, and the sub-vendor's lien reserved by them does not include the streets. *Webster v. (Ky.) 74, 75; Manly v. Slason, 21 Vt. 271; 52 Am. Dec. 60.

Checks.—The rule applies to checks or drafts, as well as to notes or bills. Madden v. Barnes, 45 Wis. 135; 30 Am. Rep. 703; Honore v. Bakewell, 6 B. Mon. (Ky.) 67; 43 Am. Dec. 147.

Certificate of Deposit.—It also applies to a certificate of deposit. Mims v. Macon, etc., R. Co., 3 Ga. 333.

Renewal of Note.—It also has been held that the renewal of a note, bill, or check, given for the purchase price, or the taking of a new note, is not a waiver of the lien. Honore v. Bakewell, 6 B. Mon. (Ky.) 72; 43 Am. Dec. 147; Joiner v. Perkins, 59 Tex. 300; Helm v. Weaver, 69 Tex. 143; Walker v. Struve, 70 Ala. 167; Reeder v. Nay, 95 Ind. 164.

Note of the Vendee Made to a Third Person.—As between the parties, the lien is not waived or lost by the fact that the original note was executed by the direction of the vendor to a third person. Joiner v. Perkins, 59 Tex. 300.

Intention to Waive.—An agreement or intention to waive the lien, even when only the personal obligation of the vendee is taken, may be shown. Winter v. Anson, 1 Sm. & Stu. 434; McCarty v. Williams, 69 Ala. 174.

deed, and not as a substitute for the purchase-money debt.¹ In England, it is also held that the acceptance of the personal security of a third person is not a waiver of the lien; but in the United States, the contrary doctrine is generally followed, and the acceptance of any personal obligation of a third person, or of the vendee, indorsed or guaranteed by a third person, is held to defeat the lien.²

1. Baum v. Grigsby, 21 Cal. 172; 81 Am. Dec. 153.

2. Personal Security of Third Person.—In England, it apparently is held that the acceptance of the mere personal security of a third party is not a waiver. Winter v. Anson, 3 Russ. 488; Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329; Hughes v. Kearney, 1 Sch. & L. 132; Clarke v. Royle, 3 Sim. 499.

In the United States, on the other hand, the acceptance of the bond, bill, note, or other personal obligation of a third person, or of the vendee, indorsed or guaranteed by a third person, is held to destroy the lien. Stevens v. Rainwater, 4 Mo. App. 292; Walker v. Struve, 70 Ala. 167; Vail v. Foster, 4 N. Y. 312; Hazeltine v. Moore, 21 Hun (N. Y.) 355; Haskell v. Scott, 56 Ind. 564; Springfield, etc., R. Co. v. Stewart, 51 Ark. 285; Cowl v. Varnum, 37 Ill. 181; McGonigal v. Plummer, 30 Md. 422; Foster v. The Athenaeum, 3 Ala. 302. Thus, the lien was held to have been waived in the following classes of cases:

Vendee's Note with Third Person's Indorsement.—Gilman v. Brown, 1 Mass. (U. S.) 191; Carrico v. Farmers', etc., Nat. Bank, 33 Md. 235; Rice v. Rice, 36 Fed. Rep. 860; Marshall v. Christmas, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 616; 39 Am. Dec. 199; Burger v. Potter, 32 Ill. 66; Foster v. The Athenaeum, 3 Ala. 302; Donegan v. Hentz, 70 Ala. 437; Hammett v. Stricklin (Ala.), 13 So. Rep. 573; Campbell v. Baldwin, 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 248.

Vendee's Bill Accepted by Third Person.—Boynton v. Champlain, 42 Ill. 57. If drawn upon, but not accepted by a third person, there is no waiver. Knisely v. Williams, 3 Gratt. (Va.) 253.

It has been held that an acceptor of a bill of exchange is not a surety, and so the taking of an accepted bill as security does not operate as a waiver. Marshall v. Christmas, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 616; 39 Am. Dec. 199; Hughes v. Kearney, 1 Sch. & L. 132.

Note of Third Person Indorsed by Vendee.—Cresap v. Manor, 63 Tex. 485.

And the result is the same, even if the note proves to be worthless. Kendrick v. Eggleston, 56 Iowa 128; 41 Am. Rep. 90.

Vendee's Note with Surety.—Fonda v. Jones, 42 Miss. 792; 2 Am. Rep. 669; Follett v. Reese, 20 Ohio 546; 55 Am. Dec. 472.

Vendee's Bond with Surety.—McGonigal v. Plummer, 30 Md. 422; Wilson v. Graham, 5 Munf. (Va.) 297.

There are, however, several qualifications of the general rule:—

Husband and Wife.—Where the land is purchased by the husband, but the conveyance is made to the wife, it is held that the acceptance of his note is not a waiver. Moore v. Worthy, 56 Ala. 163; Davis v. Smith, 88 Ala. 596; Davenport v. Murray, 68 Mo. 198; Williams v. Crow, 84 Mo. 298; Davis v. Pearson, 44 Miss. 508; Bakes v. Gilbert, 93 Ind. 70. See, contra, Andrus v. Coleman, 82 Ill. 26; 25 Am. Rep. 289.

It is held that no waiver is to be inferred from the fact that the husband of the vendee signs her note for the purchase-money. Parker v. McBee, 61 Miss. 134.

Presumption of Waiver Not Conclusive.—It has also been held that the acceptance of the notes of a third party is not conclusive evidence of a waiver, and that the presumption of waiver may be rebutted by proof that the parties agreed to retain the lien. Lord v. Wilcox, 99 Ind. 491.

General Rule Not Uniform.—In some jurisdictions, it has been held, contrary to the general rule in the United States, that taking the personal security of a third party is not a waiver. Tiernan v. Thurman, 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 224; Burrus v. Roulhac, 2 Bush (Ky.) 39; Jobe v. Chedister, 5 Lea (Tenn.) 346; Loomis v. Davenport, etc., R. Co., 17 Fed. Rep. 301; Stroud v. Pace, 35 Ark. 100. And see Slide, etc., Mines v. Seymour, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 842, where it was held that the lien was not waived by a deposit of stock, there being nothing to show that the vendors relied

Where the obligation of the vendee, and a fortiori that of a third person, is given, not as security for the purchase-money, but as a substitute for, and in payment of, the original debt for the purchase price, the lien is thereby waived;¹ and this is also the case where distinct and independent security, other than the mere personal undertaking of the vendee, has been accepted by the vendor, unless the parties agree that such acceptance shall not operate as a waiver.² The basis of the foregoing rules is that, alone for their security on the deposit of stock.

1. Novation and Extinguishment.—Keith v. Wolf, 5 Bush (Ky.) 646; Acton v. Waddington, 46 N. J. Eq. 16; Thames v. Caldwell, 60 Ala. 644; Williams v. McCarty, 74 Ala. 295; Moshier v. Meek, 80 Ill. 79; Parrot v. Sweetland, 3 Myl. & K. 655; Dixon v. Gayfere, 17 Beav. 421; 21 Beav. 118.

Whether or not, in a given case, the security was given in discharge of, and as a substitute for, the original debt for the purchase price, so that there is a novation, and the original debt no longer exists, will depend upon all the circumstances showing the intention of the parties, including the terms of the deed of conveyance or of other writings. Clarke v. Royle, 3 Sim. 499; Dixon v. Gayfere, 17 Beav. 421; Jersey v. Briton Ferry Floating Dock Co., L. R., 7 Eq. 409; Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. (Va.) 186.

In Thames v. Caldwell, 60 Ala. 644, the vendee of the land died without paying the purchase-money, and the land was sold by his administrator, under a decree of court. The vendor afterward accepted from the purchaser at the sale, a draft on a third person, surrendered the note given for the purchase-money, and collected a part of the money on a draft. It was held that these facts proved a waiver.

Note of Sub-vendee.—It has been held that the substitution of the note of the sub-vendee of the land, in place of that of his vendor, is not necessarily a waiver by novation. Pouns v. Gartman, 29 Miss. 133; Cummings v. Moore, 61 Miss. 184; Boyd v. Jackson, 82 Ind. 525. But that it may be a novation, and so a waiver, see Wasson v. Davis, 34 Tex. 159.

2. Independent Security—General Rule.—The general doctrine that the acceptance of distinct and independent security is, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, a waiver of the lien, may be illustrated by the following, among a large number of cases. Follett v. Reese, 20 Ohio 546; 55 Am. Dec. 472; McGonigal v. Plummer, 30 Md. 422; Lewis v. Covilland, 21 Cal. 178; Denny v. Steakly, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 156; Adams v. Buchanan, 49 Mo. 64; Dudley v. Dickson, 14 N. J. Eq. 252; Crans v. Hamilton County, 87 Ind. 162; McDonough v. Cross, 40 Tex. 251; Wilson v. Sawyer, 74 Ill. 473; Ilett v. Collins, 103 Ill. 74; Stuart v. Harrison, 52 Iowa 511; Johnson v. Godden, 33 Ark. 600; Ducker v. Gray, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 163; Walker v. Struve, 70 Ala. 167; Vail v. Foster, 4 N. Y. 312; Brown v. Gilman, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 490.

Some of the cases hold, contrary to the general doctrine, that the acceptance of independent security merely raises a presumption of a waiver, which may be rebutted by other evidence. Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 347; Stroud v. Pace, 35 Ark. 100; Sanders v. McAfee, 41 Ga. 684; De Forest v. Holum, 38 Wis. 516; Irvine v. Muse, 10 Heisk. (Tenn.) 477; Jarman v. Farley, 7 Lea (Tenn.) 141; Fonda v. Jones, 42 Miss. 792; 2 Am. Rep. 669; Gnash v. George, 58 Iowa 492; Hunt v. Marsh, 80 Mo. 396; Woodall v. Kelly, 85 Ala. 368; 7 Am. St. Rep. 57; Jackson v. Stanley, 87 Ala. 270; Slaughter v. Owens, 60 Tex. 668; Faver v. Robinson, 46 Tex. 204; Manly v. Slason, 21 Vt. 271; 52 Am. Dec. 60.

Express Agreement.—The parties, however, may agree that the taking of security shall not operate as a waiver. Daughaday v. Paine, 6 Minn. 443; Briscoe v. Callahan, 77 Mo. 134; Cresap v. Manor, 63 Tex. 485; Fonda v. Jones, 42 Miss. 792; Sanders v. McAfee, 41 Ga. 684; Frail v. Ellis, 16 Beav. 350; Napier v. Jones, 47 Ala. 90; Fish v. Howland, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 20.

Mortgage by Vendee.—The prevailing rule is that a mortgage by the vendee, either on the land conveyed, or on other land, is a waiver of the lien. Brown v. Gilman, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 290; Gaylord v. Knapp, 15 Hun (N. Y.) 87; Pease when the vendor accepts the personal security of a third party, or the substitution of a new debt for the old, or distinct and independent security, he is presumed no longer to rely upon the security of his lien, and hence is taken to have waived or abandoned it.¹

c. BY LACHES.—The vendor may, by his laches or negligence, or by his affirmative conduct, be estopped from claiming the lien, as against third persons who have acquired their title from the vendee.²

d. RECEIPT OR ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF PAYMENT.—A receipt in full for the purchase price given by the vendor, or an acknowledgment of payment in the deed, while prima facie evi-

v. Kelly, 3 Oregon 417; Wells v. Harter, 56 Cal. 342; Little v. Brown, 2 Leigh (Va.) 353; Richards v. McPherson, 74 Ind. 158; Young v. Wood, 11 B. Mon. (Ky.) 123; Tinsley v. Tinsley, 52 Iowa 14; Chicago, etc., Land Co. v. Peck, 112 Ill. 408; Walker v. Struve, 70 Ala. 167; Masters v. Templeton, 92 Ind. 447. Contra, De Bruhl v. Maas, 54 Tex. 464; Wasson v. Davis, 34 Tex. 159; Boos v. Ewing, 17 Ohio 521; 49 Am. Dec. 478.

And taking a mortgage, as security for a portion of the purchase-money, waives the lien for the remainder, Fish v. Howland, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 20; Orrick v. Durham, 79 Mo. 174; unless the presumption of waiver is overcome by an express statement to the contrary in the mortgage deed. Briscoe v. Callahan, 77 Mo. 134.

If the mortgage given as security is void, the lien is not defeated. Kent v. Gerhard, 12 R. I. 92; 34 Am. Rep. 612; Haugh v. Blythe, 20 Ind. 24; Martin v. Cauble, 72 Ind. 67; Gilbert v. Bakes, 106 Ind. 558; Chapman v. Chapman, 55 Ark. 542. See, however, Camden v. Vail, 23 Cal. 633, and Jackson v. Stanley, 87 Ala. 270, where it was held that the taking of an invalid pledge or mortgage was a waiver, and the acceptance of security, induced by fraudulent representations, is not a waiver. Hinses v. Langley, 85 Ind. 77; Nysewander v. Lowman, 124 Ind. 584; Tobey v. McAllister, 9 Wis. 463; Thomas v. Bridges, 73 Mo. 530; Gnash v. George, 58 Iowa 492; Brown v. Byam, 65 Iowa 374. But the mere fact that the mortgage turns out to be an insufficient security does not prevent a waiver. Kendrick v. Eggleston, 56 Iowa 128; 41 Am. Rep. 90; Akers v. Luse, 56 Iowa 346; Hunt v. Waterman, 12 Cal. 301; Partridge v. Logan, 3 Mo. App. 509.

Pledge.—It has also been held that a pledge of shares of stock in a corporation is presumptively, although not necessarily, a waiver. Jackson v. Stanley, 87 Ala. 270.

1. See cases cited in notes, supra.

2. Thus, where the vendor induced a third person to purchase the land as unincumbered, by representing that the lien no longer existed, it was held that he was estopped from enforcing the lien against such purchaser. Henson v. Westcott, 82 Ill. 224; Atkinson v. Lindsey, 39 Ind. 296; Thompson v. Dawson, 3 Head (Tenn.) 384; Burns v. Taylor, 23 Ala. 255; Reiley v. Miami Exporting Co., 5 Ohio 333.

Again, where the vendor, having a lien, agreed that on payment of a specified sum to himself and of another sum to the original purchaser, a sub-purchaser might take and hold the land free from the lien, and the money was paid and deeds executed in pursuance of the agreement, it was held that the vendee was estopped from asserting a lien for money due on the original sale, as against the sub-purchaser. Burgess v. Greene, 64 Ala. 509.

On the same principle, where the deed delivered by the vendors, had indorsed thereon a receipt of payment in full of the purchase-money, and the vendee, by depositing the deeds as security, obtained a loan from one having no notice of the lien, the lien was postponed to the equitable mortgage of the lender. Rice v. Rice, 2 Drew. 73.

Also, where the vendor fails to institute proceedings to enforce the lien, within a reasonable time after his right to do so attaches, he may be presumed to have waived it. School Trustees v. Wright, 11 Ill. 603; Duffield v. Butler, 34 W. Va. 624.

For a recent case in which it was held that a delay of thirteen years did dence of payment,¹ will not operate as a waiver or discharge of the lien, if the purchase-money, in fact, has not been paid.²

c. JUDGMENT AT LAW FOR DEBT.—It also has been held that the recovery of a judgment for the purchase-money debt, will not operate as a waiver of the vendor's lien.³ But while the mere obtaining of a judgment at law is not a waiver, the selling of the land on execution to satisfy such judgment is a waiver.⁴ By electing to adopt the legal remedy and to sell the land under execution, the vendor is taken to have waived his right to go into equity and effect a sale under a decree; and, therefore, he will be estopped from enforcing a vendor's lien by a resale of the land, as against a purchaser at the execution sale.⁵

9. How the Lien is Enforced—a. REMEDY AT LAW.—It has been held that, if the vendor can recover the debt by an action at law, he has no remedy in equity;⁶ but the prevailing rule is that he not, under the circumstances, estop the assignee of the debt from enforcing the lien, see Lucy v. Hopkins (Ky. 1890), 13 S. W. Rep. 518.

1. Kelly v. Karsner, 81 Ala. 500; Tobey v. McAllister, 9 Wis. 463; Pique v. Arendale, 71 Ala. 91.

2. Ogden v. Thornton, 30 N. J. Eq. 569; Simpson v. McAllister, 56 Ala. 228; Holman v. Patterson, 29 Ark. 357; Walton v. Hargroves, 42 Miss. 18; 97 Am. Dec. 429; Thompson v. Corrie, 57 Md. 197; Hill v. McLean, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 107.

In Cuney v. Bell, 34 Tex. 177, it was held that the burden was on the vendor of rebutting the recital in the deed acknowledging the payment of the purchase-money, but that very slight evidence to that effect was sufficient to justify a verdict.

3. Graves v. Coutant, 31 N. J. Eq. 763; Ball v. Hill, 48 Tex. 634; Waldrom v. Zacharie, 54 Tex. 503. The contrary rule has, however, been adopted in California, Fitzell v. Leaky, 72 Cal. 477; and apparently in Indiana, Crans v. Hamilton County, 87 Ind. 162. The obtaining of a judgment, however, may be considered always as a circumstance bearing on the question whether there was an intention to waive. Dubois v. Hull, 43 Barb. (N. Y.) 26.

4. Nutter v. Fouch, 86 Ind. 451; McArthur v. Porter, 1 Ohio 99; Outton v. Mitchell, 4 Bibb (Ky.) 239; Grubb v. Crane, 5 Ill. 153.

5. In Dickason v. Eby, 73 Mo. 133, the court, by Norton, J., said: "A vendor who has conveyed an absolute estate in land to his vendee, and has a vendor's lien thereon for unpaid purchase-money, may resort either to a court of equity, and ask for the enforcement of his lien by a sale of the land to pay the debt, or he may procure his judgment at law for so much of the purchase-money as remains unpaid, and subject the land to sale by execution. A sale of the land is the result, whether one or the other of these remedies is adopted; and if the vendor elects to adopt the latter remedy, and the land is sold, he must stand by his election; for it necessarily implies a waiver of his right to effect a sale by means of the other remedy."

6. Roper v. McCook, 7 Ala. 318; Ford v. Smith, 1 McArthur (D. C.) 592; Pratt v. Van Wyck, 6 Gill & J. (Md.) 495; Ridgeway v. Toram, 2 Md. Ch. 303; Eyler v. Crabbs, 2 Md. 137; 56 Am. Dec. 711; Bottorf v. Conner, 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 287. But, under the modern procedure in Indiana, the vendor may sue for his debt, and enforce his lien in one action. Nutter v. Fouch, 86 Ind. 451.

The lien is not an original and absolute charge on the land, but only an equitable right to resort to it, if there are not sufficient personal assets. Martin v. Cauble, 72 Ind. 75 and cases cited. It is not, however, necessary to allege in the bill a want of other property. Evans v. Feeny, 81 Ind. 532; Citizens' Bank v. Adams, 91, Ind. 280.

The land is not ordered to be sold in the first instance; the judgment directs the sale of the land, after exhausting the other property of the vendee subject to execution. Scott v. Crawford, 12 Ind. 410; Evans v. Feeny, 81 Ind. 532.

may enforce his lien in equity, whether or not he has exhausted his remedy at law.¹ Under the code system of procedure, the vendor is allowed to seek his legal remedy on his debt, together with the enforcement of his lien, in one action;² and it is the general rule that if he prefers, he may first pursue his remedy upon his legal claim alone, without thereby waiving his right afterward to resort, if necessary, to the equitable enforcement of the lien.³

b. BILL IN EQUITY.—The bill may, as shown above, be brought by the vendor, and upon his decease, by his personal representatives, or even by a devisee of the debt secured by the lien.⁴ It has also been held that where a sale is made by an administrator under an order of court, and for the purpose of division among the heirs, the latter may maintain a bill to enforce the lien in their own names.⁵

The administrators, heirs, or devisees of the vendee;⁶ his widow, if she has a contingent interest in the surplus for her dower;⁷ subsequent purchasers, or incumbrancers;⁸ and in jurisdictions

In Maryland, the rule has been changed also, a statute providing that the lien may be enforced in equity, although the complainant may have a perfect remedy at law on the debt. Maryland Rev. Code 1878, art. 66, § 5, p. 654.

The objection that the vendor has an adequate legal remedy cannot be taken, when the vendee is insolvent. Bates v. Childers, 4 N. Mex. 347.

1. Pratt v. Clark, 57 Mo. 189; Clark v. Hunt, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 553; Bradley v. Bosley, 1 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 125; Dubois v. Hull, 43 Barb. (N. Y.) 26; Mayes v. Hendry, 33 Ark. 240; Vail v. Drexel, 9 Ill. App. 439; High v. Batte, 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 186; Campbell v. Roach, 45 Ala. 667; Burgess v. Fairbanks, 83 Cal. 215. And the rule is the same by statute in Maryland.

2. In Indiana and Alabama, the vendor is allowed to seek both remedies in one proceeding. Nutter v. Fouch, 86 Ind. 451; Chapman v. Lee, 64 Ala. 483.

3. In the following cases it was held that pursuing the legal remedy first was not a waiver of the equitable lien. Nutter v. Fouch, 86 Ind. 451; Dowdy v. Blake, 50 Ark. 205; 7 Am. St. Rep. 88; Waldrom v. Zacharie, 54 Tex. 503; Graves v. Coutant, 31 N. J. Eq. 763; Clark v. Hunt, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 553. It is otherwise, however, when the land is sold on execution under a judgment. Nutter v. Fouch, 86 Ind. 451; Dickason v. Eby, 73 Mo. 133; McArthur v. Porter, 1 Ohio 99.

4. See supra, this title, In Whose Favor the Lien Exists.

Where the right to enforce the lien vests jointly in two legatees of the vendor, both are necessary parties plaintiff to a suit to enforce the lien. Hanner v. Summerhill (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 906.

6. Owen v. Bankhead, 76 Ala. 143; Moore v. Alexander, 81 Ala. 509; Jackson v. Hill, 39 Tex. 493; Crane v. Warfield (Ark. 1891), 15 S. W. Rep. 609.

7. Edwards v. Edwards, 5 Heisk. (Tenn.) 123; McKay v. Green, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 56. In Sims v. National Commercial Bank, 73 Ala. 248, where the bill was filed by an assignee of the lien, the wife of the original vendor, who did not sign the deed, whose right of dower was recognized by the bill and against whom no relief was sought, was held not to be a proper party.

8. Bogan v. Hamilton, 90 Ala. 454; Kirk v. Sheets, 90 Ala. 504; Robinson v. Black, 56 Tex. 215; Foster v. Powers, 64 Tex. 247; Looney v. Simpson (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 476. In Bogan v. Hamilton, 90 Ala. 454, it was held that a sub-purchaser of a part of the lands was a necessary party to a bill to enforce the lien in favor of the original vendor.

In Moreland v. Metz, 24 W. Va. 119; 49 Am. Rep. 246, on the other hand, it was held that in a suit by the vendor to enforce his lien, persons having judgment liens on the vendee's lands should not be made parties.

In Robinson v. Kampmann (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 24 S. W. Rep. 529, it was held that, though a sub-vendee, his where the lien is assignable, persons to whom the vendor has transferred notes for a part of the purchase-money,¹ are all necessary or proper parties to the bill.

But persons having no present interest in the land, whether the original vendees, or mere tenants in possession, are not proper parties.²

The bill should contain a definite description of the subject-matter of the lien,³ and should allege a debt due and unpaid for the purchase price,⁴ the terms of the contract of sale,⁵ and the conveyance of the land.⁶ A bill brought by an assignee of the purchase-money debt, need not state when the assignment was heirs and representatives need not be made parties to a suit to foreclose a vendor's lien. His heirs may recover the land from a purchaser at the foreclosure sale, who has notice of their rights, on refunding the price paid by the said purchaser, with interest.

If there is any question whether the holder of a vendor's lien has, by his act, waived his lien as to a debt secured by a deed of trust made subsequent to the conveyance, reserving the lien, the beneficiary in the deed of trust is a necessary party to a suit to enforce the lien. The trustee in such deed is a necessary party, since he holds the legal title. Turk v. Skiles (W. Va. 1894), 18 S. E. Rep. 561.

1. Young v. Hawkins, 74 Ala. 370; Glaze v. Watson, 55 Tex. 563; Looney v. Simpson (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 476.

In a suit to enforce the lien, brought by an assignee of notes given for the purchase-money, it has been held that the assignor is not a necessary party, when it appears that he has no interest in the suit. Kirk v. Sheets, 90 Ala. 504. But see Hunt v. Selleck (Mo. 1894), 24 S. W. Rep. 213. Where an assignee of the notes seeks to enforce the lien, after the death of the vendor who retained the title of the lands, the heirs or devisees of the vendor are necessary parties. Liles v. Ratchford, 88 Ala. 397.

Claimant for the Land.—In an action to foreclose a vendor's lien, one who claims a right in the land, by reason of a judgment against the vendor, canceling the patent under which the latter claimed, is a proper and necessary party. Looney v. Simpson (Tex. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 1065.

2. Milner v. Ramsey, 48 Ala. 287; Wilkinson v. May, 69 Ala. 33. And it has been held also that persons who owned an interest in the land, but did not join in the deed, and were not named in the purchase-money note, were not necessary parties to a bill to foreclose the lien. Earle v. Marx, 80 Tex. 39.

The general rule is, that the only necessary or proper parties are the parties to the original contract, and those who have acquired an interest under them. Faubion v. Rogers, 66 Tex. 472.

No adverse title can be tried in the suit to enforce the lien, and the holder of such a title is an unnecessary and improper party. Faubion v. Rogers, 66 Tex. 472; Wells v. Francis, 7 Colo. 396.

3. Alford v. Wilson, 62 Tex. 484; Williams v. Roe, 59 Ala. 629; Stevens v. Flannagan, 131 Ind. 122.

A bill which describes the land, and adds, "known as all that part of the Jack Smith land lying north of High Pine Creek," is a sufficient description, though it would have been defective without such a clause. Liles v. Ratchford, 88 Ala. 397.

Where the bill described the land incorrectly, but no objection was taken in the pleadings, or at the trial, and the error was corrected in the judgment, it was held that there was no ground for reversal of judgment. Brown v. McKee, 80 Tex. 594.

A decree to sell land to satisfy purchase-money notes, which merely describes the land as that "set out and described in the petition does not sufficiently describe the land." Hillard v. Rountree (Ky. 1894), 24 S. W. Rep. 607.

made;¹ nor is it necessary to allege that the vendee is insolvent.² The burden of proof is on the plaintiff.³

c. STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—The prevailing doctrine is that, as the vendor's lien is merely a security for the purchase-money debt, it cannot be enforced after the debt has become barred by the Statute of Limitations.⁴ It is held that the principal and the incident necessarily fall together.⁵ But in several jurisdictions it has been held that the lien, being in the nature of a trust, continues and may be enforced after the action on the debt is barred by limitation, and that the lapse of twenty years is necessary to raise the presumption that the lien has been satisfied.⁶

II. VENDOR'S LIEN BY EXPRESS RESERVATION — 1. Definition. — The vendor's lien, by express reservation, exists where there is an express stipulation in the deed of conveyance of land, or even in other writings, reserving to the grantor a lien on the land conveyed, as security for the unpaid purchase-money. A lien arising in this manner becomes a specific lien, and constitutes an original substantive charge upon the land.⁷

2. Stevens v. Flannagan, 131 Ind. 122; Martin v. Cauble, 72 Ind. 67; Citizen's Bank v. Adams, 91 Ind. 280.

3. In an action to foreclose a vendor's lien, the burden of showing title and right to possession, is on the plaintiff. Willis v. Lockett (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 419.

4. Stevens v. Shannon, 43 Ark. 464; Ilett v. Collins, 103 Ill. 74; White v. Blakemore, 8 Lea (Tenn.) 49; Trotter v. Erwin, 27 Miss. 772; Borst v. Corey, 15 N. Y. 505; Pitschki v. Anderson, 49 Tex. 1; Rindge v. Oliphant, 62 Tex. 682.

In Borst v. Corey, 15 N. Y. 505, the court, by Bowen, J., said: "It would be an anomaly, if the plaintiff could recover his debt by an action to enforce the lien given to secure the debt, when no action could be sustained to recover the debt directly without reference to the lien. There is no reason why the limitation should be applicable in the one case and not in the other. . . . The equitable lien is neither created nor evidenced by deed, but arises by operation of law, and is of no higher nature than the debt which it secures. It must co-exist with the debt and cannot survive it. It is true that the Statute of Limitations does not extinguish the debt; it only bars the remedy. But the remedy by action at law is no less barred than that by suit in equity to enforce the lien."

5. Stevens v. Shannon, 43 Ark. 467; Waddell v. Carlock, 41 Ark. 523.

6. Such is the rule in Alabama and Maryland. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Trimble, 51 Md. 99; Magruder v. Peter, 11 Gill & J. (Md.) 217; Lingan v. Henderson, 1 Bland (Md.) 236, 281; Moreton v. Harrison, 1 Bland (Md.) 491; Driver v. Hudspeth, 16 Ala. 348; Bizzell v. Nix, 60 Ala. 281; 31 Am. Rep. 38; Ware v. Curry, 67 Ala. 274; Chapman v. Lee, 64 Ala. 483.

The same rule has been laid down also in Virginia, in a case where the vendor retained a title as security for the purchase-money. Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. (Va.) 232; 46 Am. Dec. 190. See also Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. (Va.) 196.

In Relfe v. Relfe, 34 Ala. 500; 73 Am. Dec. 467, the reason for the rule is stated as follows: "The principle is, that the Statute of Limitations does not extinguish the debt, but merely bars the remedy by action at law; and there is no inconsistency in the prosecution of another remedy, after the action at law is barred."

7. Where the vendor retains the legal title as security for the unpaid purchase price, he holds a lien by virtue of the contract, and not simply the vendor's lien that exists in equity, where the vendor has parted with the legal title without payment. Roby v. Bismarck Nat. Bank (N. Dak. 1894), 59 N. W. Rep. 719.

2. Nature and Effect of Express Lien.—This lien differs widely from the implied lien raised by equity in favor of the vendor, in that it arises out of, and is created by, an express agreement of

This lien should be carefully distinguished from the implied lien treated supra, and from the right secured by retaining the legal title under a contract to sell, or a title bond, treated infra.

Such a lien has been upheld by the courts, in jurisdictions where the doctrine of the implied lien is not favored, or is repudiated. Greeno v. Barnard, 18 Kan. 518; Helfrich v. Weaver, 61 Pa. St. 390; Ahrend v. Odiorne, 118 Mass. 261; 19 Am. Rep. 449.

In Heist v. Baker, 49 Pa. St. 9, the court, by Woodward, C. J., said: "Such is our repugnance to implied or constructive liens, that we refused to treat a recitation of unpaid purchase-money as a lien, though standing in the channel of the title, and we desire to be understood as having refused after great consideration of the subject; but where it is expressly charged, the lien must be supported. It is the distinction between express and implied liens."

In several states, statutes abolishing the implied lien have excepted from their operation this lien arising out of an express reservation. Vermont Rev. Laws 1880, § 1937; Virginia Code 1873, ch. 115, § 1; West Virginia Code 1870, ch. 75, § 1; McClain's Iowa Annot. Code 1888, § 3111.

In some states, the practice of reserving a lien in the deed has become very common. A frequent practice is specifically to describe the purchase-money notes in the deed, and to state them to be an express lien on the land for their amounts. Hall v. Mobile, etc., R. Co., 58 Ala. 10, 22; Stratton v. Gold, 40 Miss. 778; Davis v. Hamilton, 50 Miss. 213; Carpenter v. Mitchell, 54 Ill. 126; Markoe v. Andras, 67 Ill. 34; Dingley v. Bank of Ventura, 57 Cal. 467; Talieferro v. Barnett, 37 Ark. 511; Kirk v. Williams, 24 Fed. Rep. 437.

It has been held that where a contract is made for the sale of land, in the ordinary form, the vendor agreeing to make a deed with covenants of warranty, and nothing being said about a reservation of a lien or any other security, the vendor has a right to insert in the deed a clause reserving a lien. Findley v. Armstrong, 23 W. Va. 113. It is otherwise, however, where it is shown that the vendor intended to rely upon other security. Warren v. Branch, 15 W. Va. 21.

Reservation by Separate Instrument.—It also has been held that a lien may be reserved by other writings than the deed of conveyance, as in the purchase-money notes, provided the land is accurately described in such writings, and it is the intention of the parties that the land shall be subject to the lien. Carr v. Thompson, 67 Mo. 472; Hobson v. Edwards, 57 Miss. 128; Osborne v. Royer, 1 Lea (Tenn.) 217; Eskridge v. McClure, 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 84; Helm v. Weaver, 69 Tex. 143.

But in Waddell v. Carlock, 41 Ark. 523, where there was a recital in a promissory note given for land, that it was "to be a lien on the land until paid," it was held that no lien or mortgage was created thereby. The distinction between this case and the others above cited has been stated as follows: "Where an instrument merely states, in one form or another, that liens would be or were retained, but without any expression or indication of intent to create or fix the liens, such statements will be considered as mere assertions and not undertakings, and the instrument will be ineffectual as a mortgage; but where the instrument manifests an intent to charge, subject, or pledge property as security for a debt, and the property is fully or sufficiently described, equity will enforce the lien as an equitable mortgage." 2 Warvelle on Vendors (1st ed.), p. 733, and note.

In Eskridge v. McClure, 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 84, the vendee of land gave his bond for the purchase-money, and on the face of the bond it was stated that the land should be liable to the debt until the purchase-money was paid. It was held, in a suit by an assignee of the bond, that the land was subject to a lien. See also Pinch v. Anthony, 8 Allen (Mass.) 536; Blackburn v. Tweedie, 60 Mo. 505.

Married Women.—It is settled that the reserved lien is effective, and may be enforced against a married woman. Jackson v. Rutledge, 3 Lea (Tenn.) 626; 31 Am. Rep. 655; Carpenter v. Mitchell, 54 Ill. 126; Morrison v. Brown, 83 Ill. 562; Weinberg v. Remppe, 15 W. Va. 829.

the parties.¹ While its precise nature and effect have not been accurately determined, it bears a close resemblance to a mortgage; and it has generally been treated as a mortgage by the courts, in cases where the question of its exact nature has arisen.² In one respect, the effect of this lien is precisely that of the ordi-

1. In Markoe v. Andras, 67 Ill. 34, the court, by Breeze, J., distinguishing the express from the implied lien, said: "That kind of lien (the equitable lien) arises only by implication, where the vendor has taken no mortgage or other lien, and is not assignable. The lien in question was created by express contract of the parties, of which the assignee can avail in equity. What is the nature of this lien? As was said in Carpenter v. Mitchell, 54 Ill. 126, it arises by express contract; it became a matter of record on recording the vendor's deed, and was notice to all who might deal with the property, and was conceded in the note given for the balance due. All persons purchasing it were assured by its contents that a lien was conceded, not only to the vendor but to his assigns. It is, therefore, more than the ordinary lien of the vendor. It is a written contract that the land shall be burthened with the lien until the note is paid. If not a mortgage, it approximates one more nearly than the ordinary lien of a vendor." See, further, as to the difference between the express and the implied liens of the vendor, 3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d ed.), § 1257. See supra, this title, Vendor's Implied Lien for Purchase-Money of Land—Definition, note; Hines v. Perkins, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 402.

May Secure Collateral Agreement.—It seems, also, that the express lien, unlike the implied lien, may secure the performance of any covenant or agreement, instead of the payment of a fixed sum in money, as an agreement to pay in specific articles, Harvey v. Kelly, 41 Miss. 490; 93 Am Dec. 267; or an agreement to assume an indebtedness of the vendor. Sidwell v. Wheaton, 114 Ill. 267.

2. Robinson v. Woodson, 33 Ark. 307; Talieferro v. Barnett, 37 Ark. 511; Smith v. Rowland, 13 Kan. 245; Exchange, etc., Bank v. Bradley, 15 Lea (Tenn.) 279; Hines v. Perkins, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 395; Adams v. Cowherd, 30 Mo. 458; Peters v. Clements, 46 Tex. 114; Webster v. Mann, 52 Tex. 416; Carpenter v. Mitchell, 54 Ill. 126; Dingley v. Bank of Ventura, 57 Cal. 467; Bozeman v. Ivey, 49 Ala. 75; Stratton v. Gold, 40 Miss. 778; Daniels v. Moses, 12 S. Car. 130; Eichelberger v. Gitt, 104 Pa. St. 64; Ober v. Gallagher, 93 U. S. 199.

In King v. Young Men's Assoc., 1 Woods (U. S.) 386, Bradley, J., in stating the law of Texas, said: "The reservation of the vendor's lien in the deed of conveyance, is equal to a mortgage taken for the purchase-money, contemporaneously with the deed, and nothing more. The purchaser has the equity of redemption precisely as if he had received a deed and given a mortgage for the purchase-money." See, however, 3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d ed.), § 1257, n. 1, for a criticism of the above use of the expression, "equity of redemption." But such seems to be a correct description of the interest of the vendee in Texas, where, under a reserved lien, the vendor is held to have the legal title. Peters v. Clements, 46 Tex. 123.

That the reserved lien is as valid and effectual as a mortgage or trust deed, see Armentrout v. Gibbons, 30 Gratt. (Va.) 632; Carpenter v. Mitchell, 54 Ill. 126; Smith v. Rowland, 13 Kan. 245.

It has been held also that the express lien, being in effect a mortgage, is subject to all the consequences resulting from the foreclosure and sale of an ordinary mortgage, e. g., redemption within twelve months. Markoe v. Andras, 67 Ill. 34.

In Kirk v. Williams, 24 Fed. Rep. 437, the court, by Hammond, J., said: "Of course it must be observed that, while the court assimilates all these liens to that of a mortgage, it does not mean the old common-law mortgage, in its technical sense, but the modern signification of that term, as one applied to any lien created by express contract of the parties as security for a debt."

The legal title passes to the vendee, subject to the lien, and the land is liable to attachment and execution as his property, just as an equity of redemption. Gordon v. Rixey, 76 Va. 694; Chitwood v. Trimble, 2 Baxt. (Tenn.) 78.

nary mortgage given back by the vendee on the purchase of land. Being embodied, in most cases, in the deed, it becomes a matter of record, and is thus entitled to priority as against subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers with constructive notice, in the same manner as the mortgage; and, in general, the effect of the two securities, with reference to other outstanding incumbrances, is the same.¹

It should be noticed, however, that the vendor, having a reserved lien, unlike the mortgagee in a common-law mortgage, has only an equitable interest, the legal title being in the vendee,² and it has been questioned sometimes whether the reserved lien is not of a higher nature than a mortgage, on the ground that the latter is a mere incident to the debt, whereas the former is an express

1. Subsequent Purchasers.—The reservation of the lien being stated "in the very first link of the vendee's chain of title, it affords the same notice to purchasers from him as they would receive from a duly executed mortgage or trust deed, and all persons so purchasing are thereby notified that a lien has been conceded, not only to the vendor, but to his assigns." Stratton v. Gold, 40 Miss. 778; Hall v. Mobile, etc., R. Co., 58 Ala. 10; Carpenter v. Mitchell, 54 Ill. 126; Sidwell v. Wheaton, 114 Ill. 267; Dingley v. Bank of Ventura, 57 Cal. 467; Patton v. Hoge, 22 Gratt. (Va.) 443; Moore v. Lackey, 53 Miss. 85; Peters v. Clements, 46 Tex. 114; Webster v. Mann, 52 Tex. 416; Tallie-ferro v. Barnett, 37 Ark. 511; Eichelberger v. Gitt, 104 Pa. St. 64; 3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d ed.), §§ 1257, 1258, and notes; 2 Warvelle on Vendors, pp. 728, 729.

In National Valley Bank v. Harman, 75 Va. 604, the vendor reserved a lien in the deed for the purchase-money, to be paid in five years, and a note was made by the vendee, also payable in five years; but the note was not referred to in the deed. The vendor afterward indorsed and transferred the note to a bank, in discharge of an antecedent debt, and then contracted to sell the property to a third person, who paid the purchase-money and took a conveyance from the first vendee. The second vendee was ignorant of the existence of the outstanding note, and of any claim on the part of the bank to the purchase-money. It was held that the second vendee took the property unaffected by any lien in favor of the holder of the note. The court said: "The most prudent and cautious inquirer would not have supposed that any such instrument existed. Certainly it cannot be said that persons were bound at their peril to suspect or presume it. Indeed, a negotiable note, payable five years after date, is altogether so unusual that no one, even the most diligent, would have ever imagined that such a security formed a part of this transaction."

Subsequent Mortgage.—The reserved lien is superior to a subsequent mortgage made by the vendee, Louisville Bldg. Assoc. v. Korb, 79 Ky. 190; and to a subsequent mortgage made to the vendee. Strauss' Appeal, 49 Pa. St. 353.

Prior Judgment.—It also has precedence over a prior judgment against the vendee. Parsons v. Hoyt, 24 Iowa 154.

Execution Sale.—It is held that where a lien is reserved in the deed, and the property is sold at execution sale, the sale should be made as of incumbered property. Thompson v. Heffner, 11 Bush (Ky.) 353.

In Pennsylvania, however, it has been held that a reserved lien is divested by a subsequent sheriff's sale, unless it is in the nature of a testamentary provision for wife, or children, or is incapable of valuation, or is expressly created to run with the land. Strauss' Appeal, 49 Pa. St. 353.

2. Gordon v. Rixey, 76 Va. 694; Chitwood v. Trimble, 2 Baxt. (Tenn.) 78; Moore v. Lackey, 53 Miss. 92. In many of the states, at the present time, however, the mortgagee has merely an equitable lien. See MORTGAGES, vol. 15, p. 735. In such states the interest of the mortgagee seems to be precisely like that of a vendor who has a reserved lien.

3. How Express Lien Is Created.—As a general rule, it may be stated that no particular language is necessary to create the reserved lien, provided the intention so to do is clearly and unequivocally expressed, and the amount of the purchase-money to be secured by, and charged upon, the land, is shown.²

The prevailing doctrine is, that there must be something more than a mere recital that a certain amount of the purchase-money remains unpaid, or is to be paid at some future time, or in some particular manner. In order to create a lien, there must be express words showing an intention to charge the land with the debt; and a recital of unpaid purchase-money is not sufficient evidence of such intention, and, therefore, will not affect third persons with notice of a lien.³

1. Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. (Va.) 195. See, however, contra King v. Young Men's Assoc., 1 Woods (U. S.) 389.

2. What Words Will Create an Express Lien.—The words, "to have and to hold the same under and subject, nevertheless, to the payment" of a certain sum, at the death of the grantee, are sufficient to create the lien. Heist v. Baker, 49 Pa. St. 9. Also the words "subject to the payment of five thousand, nine hundred and fifteen dollars, the purchase-money," are apt words for imposing a lien. Eichelberger v. Gitt, 104 Pa. St. 64.

So, if the land is conveyed "charged with the payment" of certain specified sums, a lien is created. Stanhope v. Dodge, 52 Md. 483. It was, however, held in this case that the lien was, in its nature, rather a mortgage than a vendor's lien.

A deed containing a description of the purchase-money notes and a recital "to have and to hold on payment of the notes herein above stated," was also held to reserve a lien. Blaisdell v. Smith, 3 Ill. App. 150.

Also, a stipulation that the "land shall be bound for the notes," creates a lien. Moore v. Lackey, 53 Miss. 85.

So, a recital that the "said land and improvements are held bound for the payment of said two notes," creates a valid lien. Talieferro v. Barnett, 37 Ark. 511.

In Moore v. Lackey, 53 Miss. 85, the court, by Simrall, C. J., said: "Whatever words distinctly convey the idea that the vendor retains or reserves a lien on the land, creates an express security. . . . A court of equity, which looks through the form to the substance, does not exact any peculiar formula to create a security on lands. If the vendee accepts a deed, with a stipulation that the 'land shall be bound for the notes' or 'be a security for them,' or any other words expressing the intention that the land is pledged as security, they would be quite as effectual as the usual form, 'reserving a lien, as security for the notes.' "

Assuming Incumbrance as Purchase-Money.—It has been held also that, if the vendor states in his deed that the land is subject to an indebtedness of his, naming the amount and the creditor, and that the vendee, as a part of the consideration, assumes the payment thereof, such deed will create an express lien on the land, in favor of the vendor's creditor. Sidwell v. Wheaton, 114 Ill. 267.

In Favor of Third Party.—On the same principle, where, by arrangement between the vendor and vendee, the latter executes his note for the purchase-money to a third person, a lien may be retained in the deed in favor of such person. Mize v. Barnes, 78 Ky. 506.

3. In Hiester v. Green, 48 Pa. St. 96; 86 Am. Dec. 569, the court, by Woodward, C. J., said: "The sum of the authorities is that, though equitable liens are not favored by our law, yet parties may, by clear and express words in deeds of conveyance, create liens upon land, either for purchase-money or for performance of collateral conditions, which will be binding between themselves and their privies. . . . Now, in view of this state of the law, our

It is of no importance in what part of the deed the reservation of a lien is made. It is effective to charge purchasers with notice, even if appearing only in the habendum.¹ It is also immaterial whether it is contained in the deed of conveyance, or in other writings.²

4. Waiver.—The express lien may be waived, if such is the intention of the vendor, either by express words, or by acts clearly showing such intent.³ But many acts, which would operate as a waiver of the implied equitable lien, are not a waiver of the reserved lien. The latter, arising, as it does, out of an express contract, is not affected by the acceptance, on the part of the vendor, of independent security for the purchase-money debt.⁴ The reasons why the implied lien is waived by such acceptance have immediate question is, whether reciting on the face of the title that the purchase-money remains unpaid, and is to be paid annually, creates such a lien. In Neas' Appeal, 31 Pa. St. 293, an intention to create a lien was inferred from the fact that the purchase-money stood in the title. But according to all the antecedent cases, express words were necessary to establish the lien. It never before was treated as a subject for legal implication, and it is manifestly a hazardous inference to make; for the pecuniary consideration, essential to all bargains and sales, is generally mentioned on the face of the deed, and if it be said to be unpaid, it is notice of that fact to a subsequent purchaser, but it is no notice to him of a lien. He may reasonably infer that the vendor trusted the personal credit of his vendee for the purchase-money, or took bonds and mortgages or other security, or, at the least, that no lien was intended to be created by the deed because none was expressed. These inferences would seem quite as reasonable as that the parties meant what they did not express—a lien for the unpaid money." See 3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d ed.), § 1256, and cases cited; also opinion of Gould, J., in Baker v. Compton, 52 Tex. 552.

1. Blaisdell v. Smith, 3 Ill. App. 150.

2. Hobson v. Edwards, 57 Miss. 128; Osborne v. Royer, 1 Lea (Tenn.) 217; and see supra, this title, Definition, note.

A contract lien will be created by a provision in a note that it is to retain a vendor's lien on certain land till paid, and such lien is good as to purchasers of the land with notice of it. Bergman v. Blackwell (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 23 S. W. Rep. 243.

Where one note is taken in payment for several parcels sold separately, in which it is recited that the note is a "lien and mortgage" on the lands, there is merely a lien on each tract for the purchase price of such tract, and not for the amount of the note. Cundiff v. Corley (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 27 S. W. Rep. 167.

3. Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. (Va.) 186; Frazier v. Hendren, 80 Va. 265; Warren v. Branch, 15 W. Va. 21; French v. Dickey, 3 Tenn. Ch. 302; Byrns v. Woodward, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 444.

In Butler v. Williams, 5 Heisk. (Tenn.) 241, where the vendor allowed his vendee's administrator to suggest the insolvency of the vendee's estate, and was a witness to show the title of his vendee, in the insolvency proceedings, and was a bidder at the sale of the lot under a decree, he was held to have waived his reserved lien.

In Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. (Va.) 186, the court, by Staples, J., referring to the reserved lien, said: "So long as the debt exists, the courts will never presume the chief security taken for its payment has been surrendered, without satisfaction, unless upon the clearest and most convincing testimony."

In Hines v. Perkins, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 395, the court went still further, holding that where a lien is reserved, "the security of the vendor cannot be defeated by anything short of what would be regarded as sufficient to defeat or extinguish the security of a mortgagee."

4. Thus, where a lien is reserved in the deed, and a trust deed of other lands is given as security, the acceptance of such security does not waive obviously no application to an express lien, which cannot be defeated by a mere implication.¹

The express, like the implied, lien is not waived by the recovery of judgment and issue of execution on the notes given for the purchase-money.²

5. Assignment. — It is also established that the reserved lien is assignable; that it passes by an assignment of the debt for the purchase-money, or of the evidence of such debt; and that it may be enforced by, and in favor of, the assignee.³ The express lien the reserved lien. Price v. Lauve, 49 Tex. 74.

So, also, the taking of notes for the purchase-money indorsed by the husband of the vendee, has been held not to be a waiver of a reserved lien. Carpenter v. Mitchell, 54 Ill. 126. In this case the court, by Walker, J., said: "Being a lien created by contract, and not a lien raised by equitable presumption, his signing the notes did not affect the agreement of the parties that the lien should be created. We cannot hold that the expressed agreement of the parties can be defeated by the implication that it was intended to be waived, simply because there is a surety on the notes. Such, no doubt, would be true in the case of an ordinary vendor's lien, but we have seen that this is not of that character, and hence that rule does not apply."

Also, where the purchase-money note was renewed payable to an assignee of the debt, including interest due, and after renewal bearing ten per cent. interest and having personal security not on the original note, there was held to be no waiver of the reserved lien. Byrns v. Woodward, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 444.

So, where the notes of a sub-vendee are substituted in lieu of the notes of the first vendee, there is no waiver of the express lien; and if a vendee sells the land, and he and his vendee join in notes for a remainder of the purchase-money to the original vendor, the presumption is that the second vendee joins as principal, not as surety; and the acceptance of such notes by the original vendor is not a waiver of a reserved lien. Hines v. Perkins, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 395; Mulherrin v. Hill, 5 Heisk. (Tenn.) 58. And see Kausler v. Ford, 47 Miss. 289, where it was held that a reserved lien is not waived by the acceptance of the note of a sub-vendee, in place of the original note of the first vendee, unless the intention of the parties was to extinguish the original debt for the purchase price.

See also, on this point, Carr v. Thompson, 67 Mo. 472; Woodward v. Echols, 58 Ala. 665; Johnson v. Townsend, 77 Tex. 639. Most of the cases, in which the acceptance of independent security has been held not to be a waiver, are cases where the vendor, instead of reserving a lien, strictly so called, has retained the legal title as security. 3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d ed.), § 1259, note 1, cases cited.

But where a vendor, instead of asserting a vendor's lien, brings suit for the purchase-money, and attaches the land sold, persons claiming title under the attachment proceedings must depend on the validity of such proceedings, and cannot avail themselves of any right which the vendor had to a lien. Myers v. Paxton (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 23 S. W. Rep. 284.

3. Carpenter v. Mitchell, 54 Ill. 126; Markoe v. Andras, 67 Ill. 34; Wright v. Troutman, 81 Ill. 374; Blaisdell v. Smith, 3 Ill. App. 150; Hobson v. Edwards, 57 Miss. 128; Osborne v. Royer, 1 Lea (Tenn.) 217; Campbell v. Rankin, 28 Ark. 401; Talieferro v. Barnett, 37 Ark. 511; Morris v. Ham, 47 Ark. 293; Dowdy v. Blake, 50 Ark. 205; 7 Am. St. Rep. 88; Dingley v. Bank of Ventura, 57 Cal. 467; Avery v. Clark, 87 Cal. 619; 22 Am. St. Rep. 272; Duncan v. Louisville, 13 Bush (Ky.) 378; 26 Am. St. Rep. 201; Summers v. Kilgus, 14 Bush (Ky.) 449; Bills v. Mason, 42 Iowa 329.

A transfer of the purchase-money notes, where a lien is reserved, carries with it the lien, and the transferee has is regarded as an incident to the debt which it secures;¹ in this respect, as in many others, differing from the implied equitable lien of the vendor.²

Where there are several purchase-money debts or notes secured by a reserved lien, an assignment of each carries with it an assignment of so much of the lien as is necessary to protect it.³ On the question of priority as between the assignor and assignee, and as between successive assignees, there is a diversity of opinion. In several jurisdictions, the assignee of one of such notes is held to have priority of satisfaction over the assignor, or over subsequent assignees, holding other notes.⁴ In other jurisdictions, the right to priority depends upon the time at which the notes mature;⁵ and in others, the notes stand upon an equality without the right to foreclose it and have the land sold to satisfy his claim. Elmendorf v. Beirne (Tex. Civ. App. 1893), 23 S. W. Rep. 315.

In Arkansas, it is provided by statute that "the lien or equity held or possessed by the vendor of any real estate, for the sale of the same, shall inure to the benefit of any assignee of the notes or obligations given for the purchase-money of such real estate, and such lien or equity shall be assignable and payable by indorsement or otherwise, in the hands of such assignee; and any such assignee may maintain an action or suit to enforce the same, provided the said lien or equity is expressed upon or appears from the face of the deed of conveyance." Arkansas Acts of 1873, p. 217; Arkansas Dig. 1884, § 474. Formerly the law was the contrary in Arkansas. Sheppard v. Thomas, 26 Ark. 626; Jones v. Doss, 27 Ark. 518.

In Robinson v. Woodson, 33 Ark. 307, the vendor executed a deed expressly reserving a lien, and afterward executed a second deed, to the same vendee, acknowledging payment of the purchase price, when, in fact, it was not paid. It was held that the lien in the first deed was a contract lien like a mortgage, which was conveyed to the vendee by the execution of the second deed, and that under the second deed the vendor had the same implied lien as if the first had not been made.

It has been held that a reserved lien may be released by the vendor, although he has previously assigned a purchase-money note, secured by such lien, to a third person—an anomalous decision if the lien is held to be assignable, and enforceable by the assignee. Summers v. Kilgus, 14 Bush (Ky.) 449.

In Moran v. Wheeler (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 297, it was held that an assignment of a note acknowledging a vendor's lien, operates as an equitable assignment of the lien, and is, therefore, an "instrument in writing concerning land," within the meaning of the registry laws, requiring such instruments to be recorded in order to charge subsequent purchasers with constructive notice.

1. Chitwood v. Trimble, 2 Baxt. (Tenn.) 78.

2. By the preponderance of authority in this country, the implied lien is a purely personal right of the vendor, not assignable by him. See supra, this title, Assignment of Lien.

3. Summers v. Kilgus, 14 Bush (Ky.) 449; Griggsby v. Hair, 25 Ala. 327; Menken v. Taylor, 4 Lea (Tenn.) 445; McClintic v. Wise, 25 Gratt. (Va.) 448; 18 Am. Rep. 694.

4. This is the rule in Alabama and Virginia. Griggsby v. Hair, 25 Ala. 327; Preston v. Ellington, 74 Ala. 133; McClintic v. Wise, 25 Gratt. (Va.) 448; 18 Am. Rep. 694. In the last case the legal title was reserved rather than a lien; but on the question of priority as between the notes there is, of course, no difference between the two cases.

There is also a dictum showing that the same rule prevails in Kentucky. Forwood v. Dehoney, 5 Bush (Ky.) 174.

5. Such is the rule in Indiana, Ohio, Vermont, and Wisconsin. State Bank v. Tweedy, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 447; 46 Am. Dec. 486; Stanley v. Beatty, 4 Ind. 134; U. S. Bank v. Covert, 13 Ohio 240; Wright v. Parker, 2 Aik. (Vt.) 212; Wood v. Trask, 7 Wis. 566; 76 Am. Dec. 230; Lyman v. Smith, 21 Wis. 674. In these cases the notes secured mortgages instead of reserved reference to the time of their assignment or maturity, unless it was clearly the intention to create a preference.¹

6. Subrogation.—For the purposes of subrogation, there is said to be no difference between a vendor's lien by reservation in the deed and the mortgage given back by the vendee to secure the purchase-money.²

A surety on the note given for the purchase-money, who pays the note, will be subrogated to the vendor's lien, unless the rights of the vendor will thereby be impaired.³

So, where land subject to a reserved lien or mortgage is purchased by two or more persons, one of whom pays more than his proportion of the purchase price, he is entitled to stand in the place of the vendor to the extent of the excess so paid by him;⁴ and his right of subrogation may be enforced against a vendee of his co-purchaser, who, after partition, buys with notice of the incumbrance.⁵ A surety is not, however, entitled to subrogation before he has paid the whole debt.⁶

7. How Express Lien Is Enforced.—The proceedings to enforce the express lien are similar to those in the case of a mortgage.⁷ It is held that the vendor may enforce the lien before exhausting his remedy against the personal estate of the vendee;⁸ or he may sue at law on the purchase-money note and proceed in equity to enforce the lien at the same time.⁹ As in the case of a mortgage, the heirs and assigns of the vendee, and subsequent incumbrancers of his estate, should be made parties to the bill to enforce the lien.¹⁰ It has been held that the express lien for the pur-liens, but it is believed that the principle is the same in either case.

1. Such appears to be the rule followed in Tennessee, Texas, Mississippi, Maine, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New Hampshire, and Michigan. Andrews v. Hobgood, 1 Lea (Tenn.) 693; Menken v. Taylor, 4 Lea (Tenn.) 445 (here the vendor assigned one note guaranteeing that it should be paid in preference to the others, and it was held that the holder was entitled to priority); *Salmon v. chase-money cannot be enforced after the debt, which it secures, has become barred by the Statute of Limitations.¹

Where the land is sold to satisfy the lien, land in the hands of sub-vendees should be held liable in the inverse order of the sales to them by the vendee;² and land retained by the vendee should be subjected to the lien first.³ Growing crops are passed under such a sale.⁴

III. WHERE VENDOR RETAINS TITLE UNDER CONTRACT OF SALE—

1. Nature of the Interest.—Besides the implied lien, and the lien by express reservation in the deed of conveyance, there is a third species of security for the payment of the purchase-money of the land, namely, the retention of the legal title by the vendor, under a contract to sell, or a bond to give title, or other agreement entered into between the vendor and vendee.⁵ The right

But it has been held that judgment creditors of the vendor, having liens on the land, are not necessary parties to the suit to enforce the vendor's lien. Cunningham v. Hedrick, 23 W. Va. 579; Neeley v. Ruleys, 26 W. Va. 686.

1. Hale v. Baker, 60 Tex. 217. In this case, the court, by Walker, J., said: "We perceive no reason for a discrimination between these kinds of lien (the implied and express liens), where the debt which they secure is barred by the Statute of Limitations. Where the vendor has reserved his lien in the deed, he may enforce the contract specifically, by suing upon the purchase-money note and foreclosing the lien, or he may, in effect, rescind the contract on default of payment of the note by disregarding his conveyance, and sell the land to another, or recover back its possession by suit. But when the evidence of his debt is barred by limitations, his opportunity for election is lost, and he must rely, for his remedy, upon the assertion of such rights only as his superior title to the land confers on him as its owner; he cannot recover the unpaid purchase-money."

In the case of the implied lien, the prevailing rule is that the lien cannot be enforced after the debt is barred by the statute. See supra, this title, How the Lien Is Enforced—Statute of Limitations. But where the vendor retains title as security, it is held that the right which he thereby acquires may be enforced after the debt is barred. Bizzell v. Nix, 60 Ala. 281; 31 Am. Rep. 38; White v. Blakemore, 8 Lea (Tenn.) 49; Waddell v. Carlock, 41 Ark. 523; Coldcleugh v. Johnson, 34 Ark. 312. See also infra, this title, Where Vendor Retains Title Under Contract of Sale.

In Tennessee, it has been provided by statute that "liens on realty, retained in favor of vendors on the face of a deed, shall be barred and the liens discharged, unless suits to enforce the same be brought within ten years from the maturity of the debt." Tennessee Acts of 1835, ch. 9.

The vendor who has given a bond to convey, under section 3654 of the Georgia Code, may enforce payment out of the land, not only as against the immediate purchaser from him, but as against obtained by the vendor in this way, has been termed a lien, and often has been confused with the express and implied liens.¹

In England, the relationship between the parties in such cases is held to be that of trustee and cestui que trust.² In the United anyone holding under such purchaser. Hawkins v. Dearing (Ga. 1894), 19 S. E. Rep. 717.

Mr. Pomeroy, speaking of this use of the word "lien," said: "This is an unnecessary and incorrect use of terms; it confounds legal notions which are essentially different. There is a plain distinction between the lien of the grantor after a conveyance, and the interest of the vendor before conveyance. The former is not a legal estate, but is a mere equitable charge on the land; it is not even, in strictness, an equitable lien, until declared and established by judicial decree. In the latter, although possession may have been delivered to the vendee, and although, under the doctrine of conversion, the vendee may have acquired an equitable estate, yet the vendor retains the legal title, and the vendee cannot prejudice that legal title, or do anything by which it shall be divested, except by performing the very obligation on his part which the retention of such title was intended to secure—namely, by paying the price according to the terms of the contract. To call this complete legal title a lien is certainly a misnomer. In case of a conveyance, the grantor has a lien but no title. In case of a contract for sale before conveyance, the vendor has the legal title, and has no need of any lien; his title is a more efficient security, since the vendee cannot defeat it by any act or transfer, even to or with a bona fide purchaser." 3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d ed.), § 1260. See, further, as to the distinction between the lien, properly so called, and the retention of legal title, Lowery v. Peterson, 75 Ala. 109; Moses v. Johnson, 88 Ala. 517; Baker v. Compton, 52 Tex. 252; Church v. Smith, 39 Wis. 492; Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 194; Gessner v. Palmateer, 89 Cal. 89; Wells v. Smith, 44 Miss. 296; McCaslin v. State, 44 Ind. 151; Hutton v. Moore, 26 Ark. 382; Reese v. Burts, 39 Ga. 565; Hines v. Perkins, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 395; Robinson v. Appleton, 124 Ill. 276; Vail v. Drexel, 9 Ill. App.

"When the legal title remains in the vendor, the vendee has merely an equity of redemption in the land, and no act of his can possibly affect the vendor's title; while, in case of a mere lien in the vendor, the fee is in the purchaser, who may, at any time, discharge the lien by conveying the land to a bona fide purchaser for value." Church v. Smith, 39 Wis. 492; 2 Jones on Liens (2d ed.), § 1107. See also cases cited, supra, in this note.

2. Lysaght v. Edwards, 2 Ch. Div. 499; McCreight v. Foster, L. R., 5 Ch. App. 604; Shaw v. Foster, 5 H. L. Cas. 321; Rose v. Watson, 10 H. L. Cas. 672, 678; Hadley v. London Bank, 3 De G. J. & S. 70. The doctrine of these cases is that the contract gives rise to a constructive trust.

In Lysaght v. Edwards, 2 Ch. Div. 499, Sir G. Jessel, M. R., said: "It appears to me that the effect of a contract for sale has been settled for more than two centuries; certainly it was completely settled before the time of Lord Hardwicke, who speaks of the settled doctrine of the court as to it. What is that doctrine? It is that the moment you have a valid contract for sale, the vendor becomes in equity a trustee for the purchaser of the estate sold, and the beneficial ownership passes to the purchaser, the vendor having a right to the purchase-money, a charge or lien on the estate for the security of that purchase-money, and a right to retain possession of the estate until the purchase-money is paid, in the absence of express contract as to the time of delivering possession. In other words, the position of the vendor is something between what has been called a naked or bare trustee (that is, a person without beneficial interest), and a mortgagee who is not, in equity (any more than a vendor), the owner of the estate, but is, in certain events, entitled to what the unpaid vendor is; viz., possession of the estate and a charge upon the estate for his purchase-money. Their positions are analogous in another way. The unpaid mort-

States, it is generally considered to be in the nature of a mortgage.¹

The interest of the vendor is, on the doctrine of equitable conversion, personal property, and upon his decease, passes to his personal representative. The interest of the vendee is, by the same doctrine, real estate, and may be alienated or devised as such; and on the death of the vendee, will descend to his heirs.²

2. Waiver and Assignment.—The right obtained by retaining the legal title under a contract of sale or title-bond, is not waived by taking independent security for the purchase price, or by other acts which would operate as a waiver of the implied lien.³ So gaged has a right to foreclose, that is to say, he has a right to say to the mortgagor, 'either pay me within a limited time, or you lose your estate,' and in default of payment he becomes absolute owner of it. So, although there has been a valid contract of sale, the vendor has a similar right in a court of equity; he has a right to say to the purchaser, 'either pay me the purchase-money, or lose the estate.'

The same doctrine exists in Massachusetts. In Felch v. Hooper, 119 Mass. 52, the court, by Colt, J., said: "The doctrine is well established in equity that, from the time a valid contract for the sale of land is made, that which ought to have been done is treated, as between the parties, as already done; and the seller and his representatives, and subsequent purchasers from him with notice, will be held to be trustees for the purchaser, for the purpose of affording the latter a remedy against the estate." In Moses v. Johnson, 88 Ala. 517, the court, by Stone, C. J., said: "When a vendor of real estate enters into an executory agreement to convey title on the payment of the purchase-money, he sustains, in substance, the same relation to the vendee, as a mortgagee does to a mortgagor. Each has a legal title, which, in the absence of stipulations for possession, will maintain an action of ejectment. Each can retain his legal title against the other party, until the purchase-money, or mortgage debt, is paid, unless he permits the other to remain in undisturbed possession for twenty years. And yet each is, at last, but a trustee of the legal title for the mortgagee or vendee, if the purchase-money, or mortgage debt, as the case may be, is paid, or seasonably tendered. The same mutual rights and remedies, legal and equitable, and the same limitation to the right of recovery, obtain in the one relation and in the other."

So, also, in Graham v. McCampbell, Meigs (Tenn.) 56; 33 Am. Rep. 126, the court said: "We are not able to draw any sensible distinction between the cases of a legal title conveyed to secure the payment of a debt, and a legal title retained to secure the payment of a debt; for in both cases courts of chancery consider the estate only as security for the payment of the debt, upon the discharge of which the debtor is entitled to a conveyance in the one instance and a reconveyance in the other."

3. This right of the vendor is not waived by taking other and independent security from the vendee. McCaslin v. State, 44 Ind. 151; Huffman v. Cauble, 86 Ind. 591; Whitehurst v. Yandall, 7 Baxt. (Tenn.) 228; Sehorn v. McWhirter, 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 313; Bradley v. Curtis, 79 Ky. 327; Bozeman v. Ivey, 49 Ala. 75; Strickland long as he retains the title, the vendor clearly manifests an intention to rely upon it as security for his debt; and equity will not compel him to part with the title until his debt has been paid.¹

This right of the vendor is assignable, and passes to a transferee of the note or bond given for the purchase-money, who may enforce it for his own benefit.² The vendor, by the assignment, v. Summerville, 55 Mo. 164; Hurley v. Hollyday, 35 Md. 469; Dunlap v. Shanklin, 10 W. Va. 662; Price v. Lauve, 49 Tex. 74; Day v. Hale, 22 Gratt. (Va.) 146; *Robinson v. And see Hollis v. Hollis, 4 Baxt. (Tenn.) 524. Nor is this right waived by accepting the note of a third person acting as the vendee's agent, in place of that of the vendee, Bradford v. Harper, 25 Ala. 337; Bozeman v. Ivey, 49 Ala. 75; or by the assignee of the note taking a new note for an extended time, Woodward v. Echols, 58 Ala. 665; Conner v. Banks, 18 Ala. 42; 52 Am. Dec. 209. Nor is it waived by obtaining a judgment against the vendee and selling his interest on execution. Dickason v. Eby, 73 Mo. 133; Lewis v. Chapman, 59 Mo. 371.

That the rule is otherwise in the case of the implied, equitable lien, see supra, this title, Waiver of Lien.

It has been held that even where the title is retained, if the vendor assigns the purchase-money notes to a third person, and accepts for them a bill of exchange, his lien is gone; and the vendee, on paying the assignee, is entitled to an absolute conveyance. Bradford v. Harper, 25 Ala. 337.

1. In Anthony v. Smith, 9 Humph. (Tenn.) 508, the notes given by the vendee were taken up, and the notes of a third person, with the guarantee of the vendee, were substituted. It was held that the right of the vendor to sell the property for the purchase-money was not waived, the court, by McKinney, J., saying: "There is a most important distinction between the equitable lien which the law gives a vendor, to secure the purchase-money, where the legal title has been conveyed, and that security which he provides for himself by the preservation of the legal title until the purchase-money is paid. In the former case he has parted with both the legal and equitable estate; in the latter, he remains clothed with the legal title, which the law will intend to have been retained as an absolute security for the purchase-money. . . . The security of the vendor, in such case, cannot be defeated by anything short of what would be regarded as sufficient to defeat or extinguish the security of a mortgagee." See also Rogers v. Blum, 56 Tex. 6; Robinson v. Appleton, 124 Ill. 276; Sehorn v. McWhirter, 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 201. But it has been held that where there is a sale of real and personal property for a gross sum, and the separate value of the land cannot be ascertained, there is no presumption that the retention of the legal title was to secure the vendor. Sykes v. Betts, 87 Ala. 537.

In California, a statute provides that "where a buyer of real property gives to the seller a written contract for payment of all or part of the price, an absolute transfer of such contract, by the seller, waives his lien to the extent of the sum payable under the contract, but a transfer of such contract, in trust to pay debts, and return the surplus, is not a waiver of the lien." California Civ. Code, § 3047.

2. Lowery v. Peterson, 75 Ala. 109; Ober v. Gallagher, 93 U. S. 199; Walkenhorst v. Lewis, 24 Kan. 420; McClintic v. Wise, 25 Gratt. (Va.) 448; 18 Am. Rep. 694; Martin v. O'Bannon, 35 Ark. 62; Gessner v. Palmateer, 89 Cal. 89; Avery v. Clark, 87 Cal. 619; 22 Am. St. Rep. 272; Russell v. Kirkbride, 62 Tex. 455; Bradley v. Curtis, 79 Ky. 327; Reynolds v. Morse, 52 Iowa 155; Adams v. Cowherd, 30 Mo. 458; Robinson v. Harbour, 42 Miss. 795; 97 Am. Dec. 501; Felton v. Smith, 84 Ind. 485; 2 Jones on Liens (2d ed.), § 1119. The theory of the above decisions is that the right of the vendor who has retained the legal title, is a mere incident to the debt which it secures, and, therefore, passes by an assignment of the latter.

After the lien has been assigned, it cannot be enforced by the assignor becomes a trustee for the assignee and cannot defeat the rights of the latter, either by giving a deed to the vendee,¹ or by disputing his own title,² or by any other act.³ If he wrongfully transfers the land to an innocent purchaser for value, he then holds the purchase-money in trust for the assignee of the notes or bond.⁴

3. The Remedy—a. NATURE OF PROCEEDINGS.—The proceedings to enforce the right of a vendor retaining the legal title, are similar to those in the case of a mortgage. The vendor may sue at law on the debt, or in equity to enforce the contract, or he may pursue both remedies concurrently.⁵

until the assignment has been avoided. Green v. Betts, 1 McCrary (U. S.) 72.

Priority.—On the question of priority, as between the assignor and assignee of the purchase-money notes, and as between successive assignees, the law is the same as in the case of the reserved lien. See supra, this title, Vendor's Lien by Express Reservation—Assignment, notes.

As between the right of the vendor retaining the title, and any liens created by the vendee, e. g., a mortgage by the vendee, or a mechanic's or judgment lien against him, the former will prevail. The vendee cannot impair the right of the vendor who retains the title as security. Seitz v. Union Pac. R. Co., 16 Kan. 133; Cochran v. Wimberly, 44 Miss. 503; Thorpe v. Durbon, 45 Iowa 192; Beattie v. Dickinson, 39 Ark. 205; Harvill v. Lowe, 47 Ga. 214; Hadley v. Nash, 69 N. Car. 162; Tuck v. Calvert, 33 Md. 209.

In Young v. Atkins, 4 Heisk. (Tenn.) 529, the vendor of land sold by title bond, assigned one of the purchase notes to the complainant, and agreed not to make a deed to the purchaser until the note was paid. The vendor and purchaser rescinded the contract of sale, and the vendor sold to another, who knew of the note, by title bond. It was held that the note was a lien on the land, the defendant not being an innocent purchaser of the legal title without notice.

If, however, the note is transferred after maturity, the assignee takes subject to all the equities available as defenses against his assignor. Shinn v. Fredericks, 56 Ill. 439; 1 Daniel on Neg. Insts. (4th ed.), § 724a.

In McMillen v. Rose, 54 Iowa 522, the note given for a title bond was assigned, and the bond was afterward canceled by the parties thereto, and the real estate conveyed to others. It was held that, as against the latter, the transferee of the note had no lien. It is not clear from the report whether or not the defendants had notice of the outstanding note, but the legal title was actually conveyed to them.

Where the purchase-money notes are transferred by the vendor, he will hold the legal title in trust for the security of his assignee; and on failure of the purchaser to pay such notes at maturity, the assignee will be entitled, not only to a strict foreclosure of the purchaser's equity of redemption, but to a judgment against the vendor enforcing the execution of such trust. Where the vendor transfers only a part of the notes, he will hold the legal title as trustee for his assignee pro tanto. Church v. Smith, 39 Wis. 492.

5. Wells v. Francis, 7 Colo. 396; Gaston v. White, 46 Mo. 486; McCaslin v. State, 44 Ind. 151; Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 186; McConnell v. Beattie, 34 Ark. 113; Vail v. Drexel, 9 Ill. App. 439; Sehorn v. McWhirter, 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 313.

In Micou v. Ashurst, 55 Ala. 607, the court, by Brickell, C. J., said: "The vendor is a trustee of the titles for the vendee; and the vendee, of the purchase-money, for the vendor. The law annexes many of the incidents of a mortgage to this relation. The vendee is entitled to possession, free from all liability to account for rents and profits, until the vendor ejects him. The vendor may proceed by bill in equity to enforce the lien given him by law, for the payment of the purchase-money. He

b. OFFER OF PERFORMANCE.—Neither party can maintain an action at law on the contract, without proving an offer to perform in accordance with its terms.¹ On the question whether the vendor may enforce his so-called lien in equity, without a tender of a deed, there is a conflict of authority.² It is agreed, however, that may sue in ejectment for the recovery of possession of the lands, and may sue at law for the recovery of the purchase-money. These remedies he may pursue concurrently, as a mortgagee may; and a court of equity, in the absence of some evidence of fraud or oppression, or of some fact rendering it inequitable, will not restrain him from pursuing them all at the same time."

It is well settled that the vendor need not, as it has sometimes been held that he must, in the case of an implied lien, exhaust his legal remedy first. Vail v. Drexel, 9 Ill. App. 439; McCaslin v. State, 44 Ind. 151; Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 186. And the prevailing rule is the same in the case of the implied lien. See supra, this title, How the Lien Is Enforced, notes.

As in the case of a mortgage foreclosure, a person claiming adversely to the title should not be made a party to the proceeding to enforce the vendor's right. Wells v. Francis, 7 Colo. 396.

In Illinois, the proceeding to enforce the vendor's right is held to be in the nature of a strict foreclosure. Vail v. Drexel, 9 Ill. App. 439.

In Iowa, it is provided by statute that, where the purchase-money is not paid at the time fixed, the vendor, under a contract of sale, "may file his petition asking the court to require the purchaser to perform his contract, or to foreclose and sell his interest in the property. The vendee shall, in such cases, for the purpose of the foreclosure, be treated as a mortgagor of the property purchased, and his rights may be foreclosed in a similar manner." Iowa Ann. Code, 1888, §§ 4565, 4566.

In Todd v. Davey, 60 Iowa 532, it was held that, where the vendor elects to foreclose the contract of sale, he must submit to the rules of law applicable to foreclosures, and cannot, after the land has been sold and bid in by him for a part only of the judgment, and redeemed by the defendant, still claim a lien on the land for the remainder of the purchase-money.

In Georgia, there is also a statute providing for the foreclosure and sale of the vendee's interest. Georgia Code 1882, § 3586.

In Tennessee, it has been held that, where the land has been divided into lots and sold by the vendee, in making sale to satisfy the lien, the last lot purchased should be sold first, and so on, in inverse order, until satisfaction is obtained. Alabama v. Stanton, 5 Lea (Tenn.) 423. See also Boyce v. Stanton, 15 Lea (Tenn.) 346.

Where there are two sub-vendees of land subject to the right of the vendor having title, they are obliged to contribute ratably to the purchase-money. If one of them owes a part of the purchase-money to the original vendee, that will be applied first, and he will be held to contribute pro rata to the remainder. Wilkes v. Smith, 4 Heisk. (Tenn.) 86.

The Petition.—The petition to sell land to satisfy unpaid purchase-money notes, must not only allege that the complainant had sold the land to the defendant and given him a title bond therefor, but also set out the terms of such bond, the character of the title to be made, and the complainant's ability and willingness to make it. Hillard v. Rountree (Ky. 1894), 24 S. W. Rep. 607.

1. Stevenson v. Maxwell, 2 N. Y. 409; Bruce v. Tilson, 25 N. Y. 194; Freeseon v. Bissell, 63 N. Y. 168; Paschall v. Brandon, 79 N. Car. 504.

2. The following cases hold that before proceeding to enforce the right of the vendor in equity, a tender of a deed is necessary. Wakefield v. Johnson, 26 Ark. 506; Turner v. Lassiter, 27 Ark. 662; Klyce v. Broyles, 37 Miss. 524; McCaslin v. State, 44 Ind. 151; Cole v. Wright, 50 Ind. 296; Evans v. Feeny, 81 Ind. 532.

In the following cases the contrary rule is laid down: McKenzie v. Baldridge, 49 Ala. 564; Freeseon v. Bissell, 63 N. Y. 168; Church v. Smith, 39 Wis. 492.

In Thomson v. Smith, 63 N. Y. 301, it was held that an action to foreclose a lien under a contract for sale, cannot be maintained by the representatives of a deceased vendor, where it is not alleged or shown that they have tend-

VENIRE FACIAS—VENIRE FACIAS DE NOVO.

if no tender is made, the bill shall contain an offer of performance,¹ unless the purchase-money was made payable on a day certain.²

c. STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—The right of a vendor holding title as security for the purchase-money may be enforced, although the debt is barred by the Statute of Limitations.³ Moreover, the possession of the vendee, like that of a mortgagor, is held not to be adverse to the right or lien of the vendor,⁴ which may be enforced at any time within twenty years after the sale, unless payment is shown.⁵

VENIRE FACIAS—(See also JURY AND JURY TRIAL, vol. 12, p. 335).—The writ of venire facias is a judicial writ directed to the sheriff of the county in which a cause is to be tried, commanding him to cause a jury of twelve men to come from the body of his county to try the issue between the litigating parties.⁶

VENIRE FACIAS DE NOVO—(See also JURY AND JURY TRIAL, vol. 12, p. 335).—A fresh or new venire, which the court grants where there has been some impropriety or irregularity in returning the jury, or where the verdict is so imperfect or ambiguous that no judgment can be given on it.⁷

ered, or are ready, willing, and able to give, a deed, unless the person taking the legal title to the land, either as heir or devisee, is made a party. The court distinguished the case from that of Freeson v. Bissell, 63 N. Y. 168, on the ground that, in the latter case, "It was unnecessary, for reasons applicable to equitable actions only, to show an offer to perform before suit brought. . . . This distinction between legal and equitable actions, grows out of the circumstance that, in the latter, the court can protect the rights of any party entitled to performance in the judgment."

That the rule is otherwise in the case of the implied equitable lien, and the lien by reservation in the deed of conveyance see supra, this title, How the Lien Is Enforced, and How Express Lien Is Enforced.

4. Hardin v. Boyd, 113 U. S. 756; Colcleugh v. Johnson, 34 Ark. 312; Gudger v. Barnes, 4 Heisk. (Tenn.) 570; Lewis v. McDowell, 88 N. Car. 261; Lewis v. Hawkins, 23 Wall. (U. S.) 119; Burnett v. Caldwell, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 290; Butler v. Douglass, 1 McCrary (U. S.) 630.

In the case of Burnett v. Caldwell, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 290, the court, by Swayne, J., said: "If the contract stipulates for possession by the vendee, or the vendor puts him into possession, he holds as a licensee. The relation of landlord and tenant does not exist between the parties. The characteristic feature of that relation is wanting. The vendee pays nothing for the enjoyment of the property. The case comes within the category of a license. In such cases the vendee cannot dispute the title of the vendor, any more than the lessee can question the title of his lessor."

5. Lewis v. Hawkins, 23 Wall. (U. S.) 119; Harris v. King, 16 Ark. 122; Phillips v. Adams, 78 Ala. 225. In Arkansas, there is no bar to a suit to foreclose the lien, and the lien may be enforced within a reasonable time, even after the expiration of twenty years, if the laches is explained. Butler v. Douglass, 1 McCrary (U. S.) 632.

VENTRE INSPICIENDO—(See also PREGNANCY, vol. 19, p. 4; INFANTS, vol. 10, p. 624; UNBORN CHILDREN, vol. 27, p. 420).—A common-law writ, issued at the instance of the heir presumptive, and directed to the sheriff, commanding him that he cause examination to be made whether a woman therein named is with child or not, and if with child, then about what time it will be born, and to certify the same. It is granted in a case when a widow, whose husband had lands in fee simple, marries again soon after her husband's death, and declares herself pregnant by her first husband, and, under that pretext, withholds the lands from the next heir.¹

I. DEFINITION—1. Primarily.—Venue (Norman French, visne, Latin, vicinetum, vicinity, neighborhood) means the county or district in which the facts are alleged to have occurred, and from which the jury are to come to try the issue. Thus, to "lay a venue" is to allege a place.²

In indictments, the venue is the marginal notation of the county; e. g., "Suffolk, scilicet." In this manner, also, in pleadings at com-

2. Abbott's, Black's, Brown's, Bouvier's, Burrill's, Rapalje & L's., Law Dicts.

In 1 Stat. Westminster, ch. 1, the word venue signifies a resort. A writ to cause jurors to come is called a venire. The New York Code treats venue as mon law, the declaration designates the county in which the cause is to be tried.¹

2. Transitory or Local.—When the cause of action might have happened anywhere—e. g., trespass for assaulting the plaintiff—the venue was, at common law, designated as “transitory,” and the plaintiff might adopt any county he pleased. But when the cause of action could have happened in one county only—e. g., trespass for breaking the plaintiff’s close—the venue was said to be local, and must be laid in the county where the close was situated; but could be changed, if an impartial trial could not there be had.²

II. IN THE ENGLISH PRACTICE—1. In General.—By the Judicature Act, “there shall be no local venue for the trial of any action; but when the plaintiff proposes to have the action tried elsewhere than in Middlesex, he shall, in his statement or claim, name the county or place in which he proposes that the action shall be tried, and the action shall, unless the judge otherwise orders, be tried in the county or place so named.” The order may be varied by a divisional court of the high court.³

synonymous with place of trial. Hinchman v. Butler, 7 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 462.

1. This exclusion from the body of the pleading was prescribed by Reg. Gen. Hil. T. 4 Wm. IV. 1 Tidd Pr. 287.

2. 3 Bl. Com. 294.

As to the forum domicilii, and the forum rei sitæ, see 2 Kent’s Com. (13th ed.) 463; Story on Conflict of Laws (8th ed.), § 550 et seq.

For a history of the English practice as to the venue, see Jacob’s Law Dict. (Tomlins’ ed.), pp. 334, 340.

As to the meaning of domicile, in relation to venue, see Mitchell v. U. S., 21 Wall. (U. S.) 350; Desmare v. U. S., 93 U. S. 605.

In transitory actions, the venue is a legal fiction devised for the furtherance of justice, and cannot be traversed. McKenna v. Fisk, 1 How. (U. S.) 241.

In trespass quare clausum fregit, the venue is local. Thus, it was held that this did not lie in England for one’s having entered a dwelling in Canada, although there was also a count de bonis asportatis. Doulson v. Matthews, 4 T. R. 503; followed in Livingston v. Jefferson, 1 Brock. (U. S.) 203, and other American cases.

In Rafael v. Verelst, 2 W. Bl. 1058, an action of trespass vi et armis, against a president of the East India Company, for overawing a Nabob into imprisoning the plaintiff, the court, by De Grey, J., said: “The jurisdiction of crimes is local. And so as to the rights of real property, the subject being fixed and immovable. But personal injuries are of a transitory nature, and sequuntur forum rei. . . . Sujah Dowla was a mere instrument. . . . Whatsoever makes an accessory in felony will make a principal in trespass. Since, therefore, the jury has found the procurement of the defendant, he is liable as a principal for this trespass.” Compare Rex v. Johnson, 6 East 583.

In Ohio, in 1840, the distinction of local and transitory did not exist in personal actions. So held, in an action for rent against the assignee of a term. Genin v. Grier, 10 Ohio 209. Compare Thayer v. Brooks, 17 Ohio 489; 49 Am. Dec. 474. So, also, in the present procedure, in construing Ohio Rev. Stat. 1890, § 5027, allowing railway and stage companies to be sued in any county through which the road passes, it relates solely to the jurisdiction of the person. The petition need not state that the road passes into the county; and the defendant appearing waives error of venue. Southern Ohio R. Co. v. Morey, 47 Ohio St. 207.

In Texas, also, is the distinction abolished by statute making venue depend on domicile. Armendiaz v. Stillman, 54 Tex. 623.

3. Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873 (36 and 37 Vict., ch. 66, p. 355), Sched. Rules of Proc. 28.

At common law, where there were several facts material to the plaintiff's action, arising in different counties, he might lay the venue in either.¹

2. Extraterritorial Crime.—If any felony or misdemeanor be begun in one county and completed in another, it may be dealt with in either county, as if wholly committed therein.²

For obsolescent matter, formerly important, concerning the laying of the venue at common law, see Bacon Abr. "Venue;" and Comyns Dig., Pleader C. "The reasons which once made the venue important have long disappeared." Mannville Co. v. Worcester, 138 Mass. 91; 52 Am. Rep. 261; Hunt v. Pownal, 9 Vt. 417.

In Mostyn v. Fabrigas, 1 Cowp. 178, it was held that trespass and false imprisonment lay in England by a native Minorquin, against a governor of Minorca, for such injury committed in Minorca; the court, by Mansfield, C. J., remarking that the laying of the venue in Minorca, with a videlicet, was a fiction invented by the law in furtherance of justice, also criticising the report that the court had said that "as men they have one way of thinking, and as judges they have another;" and reviewing the laying the venue in Roberts v. Harnage, 1 Ld. Raym. 1042, which was an action on a bond made at Fort St. David's in the East Indies, "videlicet, at Islington, in the county of Middlesex," and Parker v. Crook, 10 Mod. 255, covenant on deed indented. The venue in an action to recover for a nuisance—e. g., damage from a defective eaves spout—must be where it occurred. Warren v. Webb, 1 Taunt. 377.

1. Bulwer's Case, 7 Coke 1; London v. Cole, 7 T. R. 583.

A, by deed executed in London, for securing repayment of money lent to B, was appointed receiver of B's rents in Middlesex, with a pretended salary which enabled A to retain usurious interest. A received the rents in Middlesex, but settled the accounts in London, and there paid the balance upon which the usurious interest was allowed. In a qui tam action for the penalty, it was held the offense was completed in London, and that the venue was properly laid there; the court, by Ashurst, J., saying: "Even supposing the foundation of this action to have arisen in two counties, I think that where there are two facts which are necessary to constitute one offense, the plaintiff may, ex necessitate, lay the venue in either." Scott v. Brest, 2 T. R. 238. So, also, the venue may lie in either, for the damaging of meadows in one, caused by the diversion of water in another. Leveridge v. Hoskins, 11 Mod. 257.

As to the venue in an action on the case for a collision on the high seas, see General Steam Nav. Co. v. Guillon, 11 M. & W. 877. As to that in an action for diversion of a stream, see Mersey, etc., Navigation v. Douglas, 2 East 497.

2. Stat. 7 Geo. IV., ch. 64, § 12. In an action for driving a distress out of the hundred into another county, the venue might be laid in either county. Pope v. Davis, 2 Taunt. 252.

Delivery at a post office in Leicester, of a sealed letter inclosing a libel alleging brutality of soldiers of George III., was held to be a publication of the libel in Leicester, although the intent was to publish it where it was afterward published, namely, in Middlesex. Rex v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 95.

Putting a letter containing a forged check in the Manchester post office, was held to be an uttering in Lancaster county. Rex v. Perkin, 2 Lewin C. C. 150.

Where a registrar's letter containing a false return of his fees, and his affidavit thereto, were made in Northampton, but the treasury minute on which the paymaster-general made payment was drawn up at Westminster, it was held that the venue, in an indictment for obtaining, etc., by false pretenses, was properly laid in Northamptonshire. Reg. v. Cooke, 1 F. & F. 64. So, also, where a false-pretense letter was posted at Nottingham to the prosecutor in Caudry, France, the venue was held to be properly laid in Nottingham. Reg. v. Holmes, 12 Q. B. Div. 23. To the same effect see Reg. v. Leech, Dears C. C. 642; 7 Cox C. C. 100; Reg. v. Jones, 1 Den. C. C. 551.

Where one obtained, from a New York banking house, a circular letter on a London bank for 210*l*, prefixed a "5," making it 5,210*l*, and obtained from a firm in St. Petersburg, by exhibiting the same, drafts for £1,200 and £2,500, it was held, upon his being found and arrested in England, that he was not indictable in England for attempting to obtain money from the London bank by false pretenses; for had the St. Petersburg firm obtained payment, it would not have been an obtaining for his use, therefore not by him. Reg. v. Garrett, 22 Eng. L. & Eq. 606.

In case of a murder committed on land out of the United Kingdom by a British subject, whether within the king's dominions or not, a justice of the peace of the county where the murderer is found may take cognizance of the offense;¹

In case of a conspiracy entered into upon the high seas, between the captain and the purser of a man-of-war, to cheat the Crown by false vouchers, the venue was held to be properly laid in Middlesex. Rex v. Brisac, 4 East 164.

An action for a false return is local, but the venue may be laid in the county where it was made, or in that in which it appears of record. Lord v. Francis, 12 Mod. 408; Griffith v. Walker, 1 Wils. 336.

See, further, as to venue of indictment for obtaining by false pretenses, etc., CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, vol. 4, p. 736, note 3.

The sending of a letter threatening murder is punishable in the county where the prosecutor received it. Rex v. Girdwood, 1 Leach C. C. 169.

The statutory offense of selling coals of a different description from those contracted for, is complete in the county where the coals are delivered, and not where contracted for. Otherwise, as to the offense of not justly measuring them. Butterfield v. Windle, 4 East 385. Compare Grosvenor v. St. Augustine, 12 East 244.

Under Stat. 3 Hen. VII., ch. 2, upon an indictment for forcibly abducting and marrying an heiress, it was held that "if she was taken with force in Middlesex, and carried in a coach to Strandbridge, and brought by the defendants into Surry, it was a continuing force, and a forcible caption in Surry." Fulwood's Case, Cro. Car. I. 488.

An indictment for stealing a brass furnace in Hereford county, is not sustainable by proof of stealing it in Radnor county, breaking it, and bringing the pieces into Hereford County. So, also, as to a charge of stealing "two turkeys;" this means live turkeys, and it is not sustainable by proof of stealing and bringing them when dead into the county. Rex v. Halloway, 1 C. & P. 127; 11 E. C. L. 341.

An indictment for stealing "silver" in Londonderry county, is not sustainable by proof of receiving, with guilty knowledge, and trying to sell therein, "silver spoons" stolen in Antrim county. Rex v. McAleece, 1 Crawf. & D. C. C. 154. Compare the case of two horses alleged to be stolen in Somersetshire, not at the same time, not sustainable by proof of a joint taking into Wilts. Rex v. Smith, Ry. & M. 295.

According to Coke, "Before the making of the statute of Edw. VI., if a man had been feloniously stricken or poisoned in one county, and afterwards had died in another county, no sufficient indictment could thereof have been taken in either of said counties; because, by the law of the realm, the jurors of one county could not inquire of that which was done in any other county." 3 Coke's Inst. 48.

In 1831, where the mortal stroke was inflicted in one county, and the death occurred in another, the felony was held to be in the former. Rex v. Hargrave, 5 C. & P. 170; 24 E. C. L. 260.

1 Stat. 9 Geo. IV., ch. 31, § 7. For its full text, see 4 Bl. Com. (Sharswood's ed. 1860) 305, note.

In 1843, the fifteen judges held that, under this statute, the murder of an alien at Smyrna, by a British subject, was cognizable in the central court in London. Reg. v. Azzopardi, 1 C. & K. 203; 47 E. C. L. 203. Similarly was it held, in 1830, as to Capt. Helsham's killing of Lieut. Crowther, in a duel at Boulogne. Rex v. Helsham, 4 C. & P. 394; 119 E. C. L. 438. Similarly, in 1815, as to a killing at Lisbon, Portugal. Rex v. Sawyer, 2 C. & K. 101; 61 E. C. L. 101.

In 1836, a Spaniard, articted to serve as interpreter on a British vessel, killed a sailor, off Zanzibar, but was acquitted, as not being a "subject of his Majesty," within the statute. Rex v. Mattos, 7 C. & P. 458; 32 E. C. L. 584. One charged with killing another on board a Brazilian slaver that had been seized by a British cruiser, was acquitted and an accessory before the fact may be treated as a principal felon.¹

III. IN THE FEDERAL COURTS—1. In General.—In absence of contrary statutory provision, the rules of the common law of England govern the laying of the venue in local and transitory actions.² Accordingly, trespass quare clausum fregit is a local for want of proof of lawful possession. Reg. v. Serva, 2 C. & K. 53; 61 E. C. L. 53.

1. Stat. 11 & 12 Vict., ch. 46.

At Paris, in 1858, Felix Orsini threw hand grenades at Louis Napoleon's carriage, killing ten persons; and in England, Simon Bernard was indicted for previously inciting, etc., to the deed. Campbell, C. J., instructed the jury that, if it be found that Bernard counselled the deed, the test of guilt was, "Was the event a probable consequence of the act which he counselled?" Bernard was found not guilty. Reg. v. Bernard, 1 F. & F. 240.

In the time of Henry VIII., an appeal of robbery against accessories abetting in one county a felony committed in another, must be laid in the county where the abetting occurred. Gawen v. Hussee, 1 Dyer 38 a.

2. Trespass de bonis asportatis, being a transitory action, it is necessary to lay only the place of trial under a videlicet. And where a writ mentions a trespass with force and arms upon the storehouse of the plaintiff, and a seizure and destruction of goods, it covers a transitory as well as a local action. McKenna v. Fisk, 1 How. (U. S.) 241.

In Mitchell v. Harmony, 13 How. (U. S.) 115, 137, an action against an army officer for trespass de bonis asportatis committed in Mexico, in 1847, brought in the United States circuit court for the southern district of New York, the court, by Taney, C. J., said: "An action might be maintained for it in the circuit court for any district in which the defendant might be found, upon process against him, where the citizenship of the respective parties gave jurisdiction to a court of the United States."

A suit in a circuit court of the United States, against a corporation chartered by the State of Connecticut, may be brought by a resident of Texas in a Texas county where an agent conducts business thereof, by service on him. Angerhoefer v. Bradstreet Co., 22 Fed. Rep. 305. But compare National Ty- pographing Co. v. New York Typographing Co., 44 Fed. Rep. 711.

A trial on seizure, under act of 1793 (United States Rev. Stat. 1878, § 4337), for proceeding on a foreign voyage without registration, must be in the judicial district where the seizure was made, without regard to where the forfeiture accrued. Keene v. U. S., 5 Cranch (U. S.) 304.

Libels in rem may be prosecuted in any district where the property is found. Propeller Commerce, 1 Black (U. S.) 581; The Slavers (Reindeer), 2 Wall. (U. S.) 403.

As to venue, the American admiralty system is not so "contracted" as that of England. Nelson v. Leland, 22 How. (U. S.) 55.

Under U. S. Act 1887, ch. 373, amended in 1888, ch. 866, a suit by a citizen or subject of a foreign state against a citizen of the United States, can be brought in a federal court only in the district in which the latter resides. Campbell v. Duluth, etc., R. Co., 50 Fed. Rep. 241. Sections 740-42 of United States Rev. Stats., as to venue of suits of a "local nature," were not repealed by the jurisdictional acts of 1875 and 1887-88.

Within United States Rev. Stat., § 739, a railroad company is an "inhabitant" of any district in which it operates its road through authorized agents. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co. v. Atlanta, etc., R. Co., 49 Fed. Rep. 608. So, also, as to inhabitancy by a telegraph company. U. S. v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 49 Fed. Rep. 297.

The restriction in U. S. Act 1881, § 5, against repeal of any right under that of 1875, § 8, allows a bill to be maintained to enforce liens on part of a railroad in the district, against a general mortgage about to be foreclosed in an ancillary suit, although some of the defendants are non-residents thereof. McBee v. Marietta, etc., R. Co., 48 Fed. Rep. 243.

In a suit in a federal court in New Jersey, brought by a resident of Missouri, the directors of the defendant mining company were enjoined from disposing of ores contrary to their contract with the plaintiff. It was held that a supplemental bill would not lie charging a director, an inhabitant of Pennsylvania, with disobeying the injunction in bringing suit in Mexico to enforce a debt, cause the mines to be sold, etc. Mexican Ore Co. v. Mexican Guadalupe Min. Co., 47 Fed. Rep. 351.

The provision of United States Rev. Stat., § 2103, that a suit to recover money paid by Indians on unlawful contracts, may be brought "in any court of the United States," must be construed with U. S. Act 1887, to mean a court of the district whereof the defendant is an inhabitant. U. S. v. Crawford, 47 Fed. Rep. 561.

A defendant does not, by accepting service, preclude his motion to dismiss the suit for its not being brought in the district of his residence. U. S. v. Loughrey, 43 Fed. Rep. 449.

A corporation created in one state, and having agents and a business office in another, is an "inhabitant" of the latter, within U. S. Acts 1887, ch. 373, and 1888, ch. 866. Riddle v. New York, etc., R. Co., 39 Fed. Rep. 290.

Under U. S. Act 1887, and Texas Rev. Stat., art. 1198, § 21, art. 1223 and 4120, a suit by a citizen of Mexico, against a railway company, lies in the western district of Texas, into which its road extends, and where it has business agents, although its principal office is in the eastern district. Zambrino v. Galveston, etc., R. Co., 38 Fed. Rep. 449.

A steamship company incorporated and having its principal office in Germany, whereof all its directors are residents, and having a financial agent in New York, but having the office of its industrial operations in America at its piers in New Jersey, is not an "inhabitant" of New York within U. S. Act 1887. Hohorst v. Hamburg American Packet Co., 38 Fed. Rep. 273.

A defendant's objection to being served out of his residence, may be raised by demurrer, as well as by motion to dismiss. Miller Magee Co. v. Carpenter, 34 Fed. Rep. 433.

A foreign corporation organized expressly to buy, own, and operate a mine in Oregon, and having officers there working it, is an "inhabitant" of that district, within the U. S. Judiciary Act of 1888, § 1. Miller v. Eastern Oregon Gold Min. Co., 45 Fed. Rep. 345.

In a suit under United States Rev. Stat., § 4915, against the commissioner of patents, his acceptance of service in a district other than that wherein the suit is brought, "to have the same effect as if duly served on me by the proper officer," was held not to be equivalent to a voluntary appearance, or a being found, within section 739. Butterworth v. Hill, 114 U. S. 128.

A railroad corporation, controlling no line in Iowa, cannot be sued in Iowa, on a cause of action not arising there. Elgin Canning Co. v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 24 Fed. Rep. 866.

For jurisdictional purposes, a corporation is a citizen of the state by which it was created, irrespective of its places of business. Pacific R. Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 23 Fed. Rep. 565. But compare Harding v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 80 Mo. 659.

In United States Rev. Stat., § 542, making the southern federal district of New York, after designating the territory of the northern and the eastern districts, include "the residue of said state," the United States reservation at West Point is embraced. Beekman v. Hudson River, etc., R. Co., 35 Fed. Rep. 3.

A pier of New York City is part of the land, and not of "the waters," etc., within said section 542. Euberweg v. La Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, 35 Fed. Rep. 428.

Under U. S. Act 1887, a suit by A and B against C, on a contract entered into by A as partner of B, does not lie in a district whereof B and C are non-residents. Smith v. Lyon, 38 Fed. Rep. 53.

The privilege under U. S. Act 1887, § 1, is waived by the defendant's filing a general appearance and answering to the merits. Morrison v. Atlas Steam Ship Co., 37 Fed. Rep. 279.

Under U. S. Act 1887, a suit by a resident of Ohio against residents of New York, Vermont, and Maine, to enforce a claim to property in Vermont, is properly brought in the Vermont district. Carpenter v. Talbot, 33 Fed. Rep. 537.

Under U. S. Act 1887, when the jurisdiction depends on citizenship, the suit may be in the district of either party; when on other grounds, in the district of the defendant's domicile. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Terre Haute, etc., R. Co., 33 Fed. Rep. 385; Bank of Winona v. Avery, 34 Fed. Rep. 81.

Under U. S. Acts 1887 and 1888, a New York corporation having its principal office in New York, cannot be sued in an Illinois federal court. Preston v. Fire Extinguisher Mfg. Co., 36 Fed. Rep. 721.

Under U. S. Act 1883, giving the federal district court of Kansas jurisdiction of offenses committed in a part of the Indian Territory, "not set apart and occupied by" certain tribes, these words mean subject to the control of; actual occupancy is not necessary. U. S. v. Rogers, 23 Fed. Rep. 658.

One to whom the administrator of a patentee has assigned a right of action for an infringement, may, in his own name, sue thereon in any state whose law allows a suit, by the assignee of a chose in action in his own name. May v. Logan County, 30 Fed. Rep. 250.

A bill in the federal circuit court, to restrain infringement of a patent, does not lie in Missouri against a citizen of Indiana. Thereupon objection may be raised by demurrer, as well as by motion to dismiss. Reinstadler v. Reeves, 33 Fed. Rep. 308. Nor in New York against a corporation in Connecticut. Halstead v. Manning, 34 Fed. Rep. 565.

An action by a resident of Missouri, for violating the interstate commerce law, does not lie in a federal circuit court in Missouri, against a corporation created by, and having its principal office in, Mississippi, although it has an office and agent in Missouri, and the petition shows a cause of action at common law. Connor v. Vicksburg, etc., R. Co., 36 Fed. Rep. 273.

A civil suit, by an Illinois corporation, does not lie in a federal circuit court in Illinois, against a Connecticut corporation having its principal office in Massachusetts, although doing business in Illinois. Gormully, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Pope Mfg. Co., 34 Fed. Rep. 818.

An action, by a citizen of Mexico, does not lie in a federal circuit court in California, against a Connecticut corporation, although it has an office and managing agent in California. Denton v. International Co., 36 Fed. Rep. 1.

A cause of action for expelling a passenger from a railway train, lies in the state where the contract of carriage was broken. Maxwell v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 34 Fed. Rep. 286.

U. S. Act 1888, ch. 866, applies to suits begun in a federal circuit court. It is no bar to the jurisdiction of a case removed from a state court that the defendant was a non-resident, and that the state court had acquired jurisdiction by foreign attachment without personal service. Crocker Nat. Bank v. Pagensteher, 44 Fed. Rep. 705.

A federal circuit court will decline jurisdiction of a suit against a corporation created in another state. National Typographing Co. v. New York Typographing Co., 44 Fed. Rep. 711.

A defendant may waive the exemption from suit out of the district of inhabitancy. Jewett v. Bradford Sav. Bank, etc., Co., 45 Fed. Rep. 801.

Under U. S. Act 1888, ch. 866, requiring the venue to be in the district of the defendant's inhabitancy, the federal circuit court of New Jersey has no jurisdiction over the commissioner of patents, his official residence being in the District of Columbia. Illingworth v. Atha, 42 Fed. Rep. 141.

Under U. S. Act 1875, ch. 137, § 8 (unrepealed by U. S. Act 1888, ch. 866), the federal circuit court has jurisdiction of a suit to foreclose a mortgage on land in its district, though some of the defendants reside in another district. Ames v. Holderbaum, 42 Fed. Rep. 341.

A corporation created by an act of Congress, may be sued in the federal courts in any district where it is doing business and has an agent on whom service can be made, although its principal office is in another state. Van Dresser v. Oregon R., etc., Co., 48 Fed. Rep. 202.

1. In Livingston v. Jefferson, 1 Brock. (U. S.) 203, 211, which was an action to recover for the act of the defendant while president, for removing the plaintiff from the batture in New Orleans, the court, by Marshall, C. J., after an historical review of the English common law thereon, said: "As defined in the judicial act, and in the constitution which that act carries into execution, it is worthy of observation that the jurisdiction of the court depends on the character of the parties. . . . In a court so constituted, the argument drawn from the total failure of justice, should a trespasser be declared to be only amenable to the court of that district in which the land lies, and in which he will never be found, appeared to me to be entitled to peculiar weight. But according to the course of the common law, the process of the court must be

Crimes committed against the laws of the United States may be tried at such place as Congress by law shall designate.¹

2. Extraterritorial Injuries.—In case of a misuse of waterpower, causing extraterritorial injury, the district in which the water is diverted has jurisdiction of the offense.²

A bill in equity to abate a nuisance, is a local suit which can be brought only in the district where the nuisance is situated.³

A crime committed on an American vessel in the Detroit river is not, within United States Rev. Stat., § 5346, "within the admiralty jurisdiction of any particular state." Ex p. Byers, 32 Fed. Rep. 404.

The federal district court may, in its discretion, take jurisdiction of a malicious assault by the master of an Italian vessel upon a seaman thereon in a United States port. The case is not within the treaty of 1878, giving consuls exclusive cognizance. The Salomoni, 29 Fed. Rep. 534.

1. United States Rev. Stat. 1878, § 731.

As to the construction of the "Crimes Act of Congress of 1857" (embodied in United States Rev. Stat. 1878, §§ 5339, 5341), see the exhaustively considered case of death of Jones in Michigan, from a felonious shooting by Tyler, a United States marshal, on an American vessel on St. Clair river, beyond the United States boundary, namely, Jones' brig Concord, whereon Tyler was serving an attachment. People v. Tyler, 7 Mich. 291; 8 Mich. 340; 74 Am. Dec. 703, quoted from infra, this title, In the State Courts—Extraterritorial Offenses.

A prosecution under U. S. Act 1890, for knowingly causing lottery matter to be delivered by mail, is properly in the state where the prohibited delivery took place. U. S. v. Horner, 44 Fed. Rep. 677.

As to admiralty jurisdiction of torts, etc., see ADMIRALTY, vol. 1, p. 190. Hereon, especially, see The Genessee Chief, 12 How. (U. S.) 443; Allen v. Newberry, 21 How. (U. S.) 244; The Lottawana, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 558; The Sarah Jane, 1 Low. (U. S.) 203.

2. United States Rev. Stat. 1878, § 5339.

3. U. S. v. Guiteau, 1 Mackey (D. C.) 498; 47 Am. Rep. 247. In this case, indictment for shooting President Garfield in 1881, at Washington, causing death which occurred in New Jersey, the court, by James, J. (at p. 542), said: "If the act of the offender achieves murder, then that act is murder; and if that act is done in the place designated, then, in contemplation of this statute, the offender commits there the crime of murder." This was approved by Judge Bradley of the United States Supreme Court, who refused Guiteau's application for a habeas corpus (p. 560). See the opinion of Judge Cox on the jurisdictional questions in this case, pp. 563-584.

Where one was shot within Fort Popham and died at Phippsburg, it was held that the murder was not within the jurisdiction of the State of Maine. State v. Kelly, 76 Me. 331; 49 Am. Rep. 620.

An Oregon federal court has jurisdiction of a murder of a white man by an Indian in the Umatilla reservation, this being "Indian country;" consequently, of the offense of resisting execution of the commissioner's order as to examination of the accused. U. S. v. Martin, 8 Sawy. (U. S.) 473; 14 Fed. Rep. 817. Compare the case of the killing of a Nez Perce Indian. Pickett v. U. S., 1 Idaho 523.

Virginia never having ceded the Arlington National Cemetery grounds to the United States, a federal court has no jurisdiction of an indictment for larceny committed thereon. U. S. v. Penn, 4 Hughes (U. S.) 491.

The federal courts have not, within United States Rev. Stat., § 5339, jurisdiction over a homicide committed within the Presidio reservation in San Francisco, this never having been ceded. U. S. v. Bateman, 34 Fed. Rep. 86.

As to chancery suits in the federal courts, at common law, ordinarily, the maxim, æquitas agit in personam, applies as to venue.¹

IV. IN THE STATE COURTS.—1. At Law—a. IN CIVIL ACTIONS—(1) Statutory Restrictions.—The state statutes not only prescribe the jurisdiction of the various courts, but also provide for the laying of the venue of different causes of action. Many have the English provision, which is that "an action may be brought in any county where the cause of action or any part thereof arose, although none of the defendants reside therein."² Sometimes the domicile of the parties is made to control, and sometimes the situs of the subject-matter.³

1. As to the venue of a bill in equity to abate a nuisance, see infra, this title, Extraterritorial Injuries.

A question of title, on a bill by one having a prior equity, against the one holding the oldest patent, must be tried in the district where the land lies. Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch (U. S.) 148.

A case of fraud, of trust, or of contract, lies wherever the person may be found, although a question of title may constitute an essential point. See a case under an Alabama special act of 1823, authorizing a Massachusetts administratrix to sell land in Alabama, whereof her intestate died seised. Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 25.

2. See West Virginia Rev. Stat. 1879, p. 872, § 2. It seems that the words "or any part thereof," were inserted to avoid the rule that the contract arose in the county of the drawee, when the bill was once accepted, and not in the county of the drawer. See Story on Conflict of Laws (8th ed.), §§ 317, 344; Don v. Lippman, 5 Cl. & Fl. 1, wherein Lord Brougham comments on the Scotch law hereon; Braynard v. Marshall, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 194; Savoie v. Marsh, 10 Met. (Mass.) 594; 43 Am. Dec. 451.

3. See Alabama Code 1886, §§ 2640, 3099. As to a plea to the jurisdiction, see ABATEMENT, vol. 1, p. 11.

The requirement of the Alabama Code, § 3303, that a suit before a justice be brought in the precinct of the defendant's permanent residence, does not apply to an attachment suit, this being in rem. Atkinson v. Wiggins, 69 Ala. 190.

In a transitory action, personal service of process within the county gives jurisdiction, if the defendant was not fraudulently induced to come therein. Smith v. Gibson, 83 Ala. 284; Peabody v. Hamilton, 106 Mass. 217. In

New Jersey, it was also held, in an action against the mayor of New York City, for blowing up a building to prevent the spread of a conflagration. Hale v. Lawrence, 21 N. J. L. 714; 47 Am. Dec. 190.

The mere fact that an unmarried man rents and occupies a room to sleep in, does not render him a "householder," within the venue provision of Alabama Code, § 2928. Katzenberg v. Lehman, 80 Ala. 512.

In Arkansas, as to the venue of actions in rem, see McLaughlin v. McCrory, 55 Ark. 442.

California.—In this state a proceeding by heirs to remove a trustee holding land for their benefit, is not, in the constitutional sense, an action "for the recovery of real estate," to be brought in the county where the land lies. More v. San Francisco Super. Ct., 64 Cal. 345.

Under the Act of 1858, authorizing suit in any county, if the defendant's residence is unknown, the plaintiff must show diligence to ascertain the residence. Loehr v. Latham, 15 Cal. 418.

Under the Code Civ. Proc., § 392, allowing the foreclosure of a mortgage of land lying in two counties to be in either, on foreclosure sale by the sheriff of S. county, of land lying partly in K. county, it will be presumed that a part lay in S. county. Goldtree v. McAlister 86, Cal. 93. But compare Campbell v. West, 86 Cal. 197.

Where the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, the burden is on the defendant to show that the cause was not within the jurisdiction. Chase v. South Pac. Coast R. Co., 83 Cal. 468.

Colorado.—Under the Colorado Code, § 28, an action on a note lies in the county of the plaintiff's residence, though it be payable in another, wherein the defendant resides. Thomas v. Colo. Nat. Bank, 11 Colo. 511.

Under the provision in the Code for the bringing of an action of tort in the county where the plaintiff resides, an action may therein be brought for willfully driving away the plaintiff's bull from its usual range, although in another county. In Colorado Code, § 28, in the clause "may be tried in the county where the tort was committed," "may" is permissive and not mandatory. Newell v. Giggey, 13 Colo. 16.

Section 2 of the Code, as to venue of civil actions, applies both to the district and county courts. Fletcher v. Stowell, 17 Colo. 94.

Connecticut.—In this state a suit for account for rents and profits lies where the plaintiff dwells, although the land is in another county. Lewis v. Martin, 1 Day (Conn.) 263.

The provision of the Acts of 1881, ch. 121, § 3, for the court of the Waterbury (New Haven county) district to take jurisdiction of cases in which either party resides in Woodbury (Litchfield county) or Southbury, applies to an action for trespass to land in these towns. Curtiss v. Atwood, 51 Conn. 169.

Dakota.—A question as to the trial court's jurisdiction may be first raised in the appellate court. Murry v. Burris, 6 Dak. 170. It may be raised by motion after judgment, for without jurisdiction the judgment is void. Wayne v. Caldwell, 1 S. Dak. 483.

Delaware.—In this state "action upon a bail bond must be brought in the same court as the original action." Delaware Laws 1874, p. 636, § 5.

Florida.—The statute requiring a party to be sued in the county of his residence, or in that where the cause of action accrued, has reference to the cause of action, and not to the right to sue. McDougal v. Lea, 2 Fla. 532.

Georgia.—In Georgia, an administrator who has submitted to the court, outside his own county, cannot, while his discharge is not set aside, be sued for an accounting in any other county than that of his residence. Cook v. Weaver, 77 Ga. 9.

A claim of property levied on must be tried in the county where the execution is returnable. Akin v. Peck, 64 Ga. 643.

A possessory warrant may be had in any county where the chattel is found. Jordan v. Owens, 67 Ga. 616.

In Georgia, a proceeding in a justice's court to foreclose a landlord's lien must be brought in the district where the defendant resides or has property. Jones v. Wylie, 82 Ga. 745.

Illinois.—Under the Rev. Stat. 1891, p. 1090, § 2, a civil action for assault is transitory. Hurley v. Marsh, 2 Ill. 329. Replevin is transitory. Whisler v. Roberts, 19 Ill. 274. The action of debt is transitory. Peoria Ins. Co. v. Warner, 28 Ill. 429. An action for flooding land is local. Eachus v. Ill. & Mich. Canal, 17 Ill. 534. Forcible detainer is local. Billings v. Chapin, 2 Ill. App. 555. An action for an injury causing death is local. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Cragin, 71 Ill. 177.

An appeal surety compelled to pay a judgment obtained in one county, cannot cause an execution to be levied on land in another county, without bringing an action therein. McDonald v. Asay, 37 Ill. App. 469.

Indiana.—The statutory requirement that an action, by the assignee of a claim, be in the county where the party liable to the judgment resides, does not apply to an action in rem against a non-resident. Singleton v. O'Brien, 125 Ind. 151.

A quo warranto information to settle the title to a public office, must be filed in the county of the defendant's last and usual abode. Robertson v. State, 109 Ind. 79.

An action to reach by garnishment the proceeds of land fraudulently conveyed to baffle a plaintiff's judgment for alimony, need not be brought where the land lies. Becknell v. Becknell, 110 Ind. 42.

An action to revive a judgment must be brought in the court in which it was recovered. Johnson v. Ahrens, 117 Ind. 600.

An action to collect drainage assessments is local, though the owner of the land resides in another county. Dowden v. State, 106 Ind. 157.

Under the Stat. 1881, § 312, an action in a joint cause against two, may be brought in the county where the non-resident defendant has been found and served; a summons being issued to another county wherein the defendant resides. Lindley v. Kregelo, 121 Ind. 176.

Iowa.—Section 2178 of the Code of this state, providing that mortgages may be foreclosed where the property is situated, is permissive only. Equitable L. Ins. Co. v. Gleason, 56 Iowa 47.

An action by an heir to recover a share of an estate that has been settled by proceedings in one county, the land whereof is situated partly in that county and partly in another, may be brought in either. Seaton's Estate, 58 Iowa 523.

An action against a party, as having become liable to perform the conditions of another's contract, must be brought where the defendant resides, although the contract calls for performance in another county. Wright, etc., Oil, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Kleigel, 70 Iowa 578.

One renting and keeping a house with his family is an "actual resident," within section 3507 of the Code, although intending to return to his domicile in another county, upon the completion of a certain job. Fitzgerald v. Arel, 63 Iowa 104; 50 Am. Rep. 733.

An action for services as agent is one "growing out of" and "connected with" the agency, within section 2585 of the Code, allowing it to be brought where the agency is located. Ockerson v. Burnham, 63 Iowa 570.

Under Iowa Code, § 2581, an action for breach of a contract to make and give, at Algona, a note for a wagon ordered by the defendant, to be made by the plaintiff, was held to be properly brought in the county in which Algona was situated. Bradley v. Palen, 78 Iowa 126. But where a contract to deliver trees named no place of the buyer's performance, his domicile was held to govern the venue of an action for the price. Hunt v. Bratt, 23 Iowa 171.

Kansas.—In this state an action for trespass upon land is local. Brown v. Irwin, 47 Kan. 50. An action under the Kansas Gen. Stat. 1889, to recover back double the illegal fees paid by a county, is not an action for a penalty within Kansas Code, § 48, and a summons served in another county gives no jurisdiction. Kearney County v. Rush, 44 Kan. 231.

An action for injury to growing crops, may be brought in the county where the defendant resides or may be summoned. Duncan v. Yordy, 27 Kan. 348.

An action on a recognizance must be brought in the county where the forfeiture occurred. Smith v. Collins, 42 Kan. 259.

An owner of land in Missouri may maintain an action in Kansas, for sand removed from the former state to the latter. McGonigle v. Atchison, 33 Kan. 726.

A local and a transitory cause of action cannot be blended by amendment. The petition, in an action to rescind a contract for the exchange of land, cannot be amended to seek damages for breach of a covenant of warranty. Neal v. Reynolds, 38 Kan. 432.

Kentucky.—An action to subject the interest, acquired by an heir in her father's estate, to pay his debts, under the Kentucky Code, § 70, lies in the county where she resides. Parsons v. Spencer, 83 Ky. 305.

An action for allotment of dower, in lands of a decedent owned jointly by the heirs, must be brought where some of the subject-matter is situated, though not necessarily the greater part thereof. Danforth v. Moss, 90 Ky. 246.

A ward's action against the administrator and heirs of his guardian, to subject lands to pay the ward's estate, is within the Kentucky Code, § 66, and must be brought where the heirs reside and the property is located. Willis v. Roberts, 90 Ky. 122.

An action for cutting and removing timber must be brought in the county where the land lies. Meehan v. Edwards, 92 Ky. 574.

Under an affidavit and warrant in Anderson county, an arrest, etc., was made in Marion county. It was held that an action for false imprisonment was properly brought in Marion county; this being the one "in which the injury is done," within the Kentucky Civ. Code, § 74. Mitchell v. Ripy, 82 Ky. 516.

Under the Kentucky Code, § 62, requiring an action affecting real estate to be brought in the county wherein some part thereof is situated, the circuit court of a county has jurisdiction of a suit to subject to the claims of creditors' land in that and another county fraudulently conveyed, the legal title to which is in part in the same person. Treadway v. Turner (Ky. 1889), 10 S. W. Rep. 816.

An action against a vendor of land, for a deficit in its area, is transitory, and, under the Kentucky Code, § 78, lies in any county in which he is served with process. The immediate vendor cannot, by assignment, confer on his vendee the right to sue the remote vendor in another county. Stamper v. Central Ky. Lumber, etc., Co. (Ky. 1887), 4 S. W. Rep. 330.

A guardian's action for the sale of land of the wards, distribution of proceeds, and reinvestment, lies in the county where their ancestor died and they live, although only a portion of the lands is therein situated. Phalan v.

Louisville Safety Vault, etc., Co., 88 Ky. 24.

Louisiana.—In this state a husband may maintain a suit for divorce in his own parish, and the citation be served on the wife in another. Glaude v. Peat, 43 La. Ann. 161.

A suit to dissolve a sale of immovable property is local, and the non-resident defendant may be cited by a curator ad hoc without attachment. McKenzie v. Bacon, 38 La. Ann. 764.

An action to have the office of district attorney declared vacant for his having removed from the state, must be brought in the parish wherein he last resided. State v. Steele, 33 La. Ann. 910.

A suit for interdiction—e. g., to control an imbecile's property—must be brought at his domicilium habitationis, not at his merely legal or constructive domicile. It was so held, where jurisdiction was assumed in Louisiana, by personal citation in Paris, France. In re Dumas, 32 La. Ann. 679.

Maine.—Here one non-resident may sue another in any county in which the defendant is personally served with process. Rice v. Brown, 81 Me. 56.

Maryland.—An action for obstructing a way is local. But unless a wrong venue therein be taken advantage of by demurrer, the Statute of Jeofails will cure the defect. Crook v. Pitcher, 61 Md. 510. An attachment lies in a county where any one of the defendant firm resides. Collier v. Hanna, 71 Md. 253.

A turnpike company may be sued in the county where its road lies. Maryland Code, art. 75, § 87, providing that no "person shall be sued out of the county in which he resides," does not apply thereto. Baltimore, etc., Turnpike Co. v. Crowther, 63 Md. 558.

Massachusetts.—Under Pub. Stat., ch. 161, §§ 1, 3, an action to enforce a personal contract, though relating to land, may be brought where a party lives; and this, though the land lies without the state. Davis v. Parker, 14 Allen (Mass.) 94.

The provision of the Pub. Stat., ch. 146, § 6, which states that when the libellant has left the county, and the libellee remains therein, the libel for divorce shall be heard "in the court held for that county," refers to the one in which the parties last lived together. Banister v. Banister, 150 Mass. 280.

The requirement of the Pub. Stat., ch. 183, § 3, that a trustee process be returnable in the county of the trustee's residence, does not import jurisdiction of an action for trespass to land in another state, though the action be personal, and may be begun by trustee process. Allin v. Conn. River Lumber Co., 150 Mass. 560.

An action by the assignee of the covenantee against the covenantor is local, and can be brought only in the county where the land lies, although the land is without, and both parties within, the state. Clark v. Scudder, 6 Gray (Mass.) 122.

Michigan.—A plea to the merits is not a waiver of an overruled plea in abatement to the jurisdiction. Clark v. Mikesell, 81 Mich. 45. Actions on contracts against non-residents, are transitory. Atkins v. Borstler, 46 Mich. 552.

The legislature, in creating a new county from territory belonging to an existing county, may properly provide that an ejectment suit with respect to land in the new county, pending in the court of the old county, may, after a certain date, be therein prosecuted to final judgment. Spalding v. Kelly, 66 Mich. 693.

Under Annot. Stat., § 7549, a suit against a public officer for an official act—e. g., against a sheriff for a wrongful seizure—must be brought in the county where the act was done. Graham v. Smith, 62 Mich. 147.

A suit for replevin of timber is not rendered local, merely because involving the title of the land wherefrom it was cut. Busch v. Nester, 62 Mich. 381.

Minnesota.—As to the venue of an action to determine a right or interest in real property in this state, see Kipp v. Cook, 46 Minn. 535.

An action to recover personal property wrongfully seized by a sheriff, under process against a third person, may be brought in the plaintiff's county. Hinds v. Backus, 45 Minn. 170.

The venue of an action of tort is not changed by the death of the resident defendant before answer, if the non-resident defendant has taken no statutory step to change it. Collins v. Bowen, 45 Minn. 186.

Mississippi.—In this state the common-law rule does not prevail that no recovery can be had on a covenant running with the land, by an assignee of the covenantee, except in the state where the land lies, even though the covenantor resides elsewhere. Oliver v. Love, 59 Miss. 320.

Under Code 1880, § 2459 (1892, § 142), an attachment for a debt not due, can be sued out only in the county where the debtor last resided, or where his property is found. Yale v. McDaniel, 69 Miss. 337.

Under section 1847 of the Code, an administrator's action for the purchase price of a chattel of the estate, funds for payment whereof were deposited with a bank also made defendant, must be brought in the county where one of the defendants resides or is found. Pate v. Taylor, 66 Miss. 97.

Missouri.—Here where both parties are non-residents, a suit on a transitory cause of action may be brought by summons in any county in which the defendant is found. Bryant v. M'Clure, 44 Mo. App. 553.

Replevin lies where the property is found. Allen v. St. Louis L. & S. R. Co., 38 Mo. App. 294.

Montana.—Under Montana Code, § 59, an action of tort must come in the county of the defendant's residence, unless the complaint states that the tort was committed in another county. Yore v. Murphy, 10 Mont. 304. Compare Oels v. Helena Smelting, etc., Co., 10 Mont. 524.

Nebraska.—Under section 60 of the Civil Code of this state, an action against the maker and the indorser of a promissory note, lies in any county where one of the defendants resides, or may be summoned. Pearson v. Kansas Mfg. Co., 14 Neb. 211. But such an action cannot be instituted in a county in which the defendant does not reside before he enters the county. Coffman v. Brandhoeffer, 33 Neb. 279.

A quo warranto, or other writ issued by the supreme court, may be served in any county; title 4, section 60, Nebraska Code, applies only to the district courts. State v. Frazier, 28 Neb. 438.

Where a surety had been discharged by an extension of the note, it was held that service on him where the suit was brought, would not give jurisdiction over his co-defendant resident in another county. Dunn v. Haines, 17 Neb. 560. And the dismissal of an action as to a defendant served in the county where the action was pending, was held to leave no jurisdiction over one served in another county. Cobbey v. Wright, 23 Neb. 250.

In a case of an attachment against the property of a debtor absconding or hiding himself, the action may be brought in the county of his former residence, and where his property is found. Gandy v. Jolly, 54 Neb. 536.

Nevada.—The Nevada venue laws are like those of California. Compare Nevada Gen. Stat. 1885, §§ 3040-3042, with California Code Civ. Proc. 1885, §§ 392, 393.

New Hampshire.—In this state replevin is held to be a local action, both by statute and at common law. Sleeper v. Osgood, 50 N. H. 331.

New Jersey.—For the construction of New Jersey Rev. Stat. 1877, p. 883, § 230, in regard to the venue of transitory actions, see Bell v. Morris Canal Co., 15 N. J. L. 63. An action under the New Jersey Act of 1820, "for restraining the plaintiff from navigating the waters between the ancient shores of New York and New Jersey," is not a local but a transitory action. Gibbons v. Ogden, 6 N. J. L. 285.

New York.—An action to recover for injuries to personal property is transitory. Smith v. Butler, 1 Daly (N. Y.) 508. As to the venue of an action for injuries to the person, see McIvor v. McCabe, 16 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 319; 26 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 257. As to the venue, under the New York Code of Civil Procedure, of an action against a constable or other public officer, see Houck v. Lasher, 17 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 520.

Whether the action is one within section 982, Code Civ. Proc., to establish an interest in real property, must be determined by the complaint. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Clark, 22 Hun (N. Y.) 506.

In the absence of good reason to the contrary, the defendant in a wife's action for alienation of her husband's affection, is entitled to a trial in the county where, if guilty, she would be tried for the crime of enticement. So held, where the defendant claimed to have gone through a marriage ceremony, believing the husband to have been divorced from the plaintiff. Blake v. Everman, 56 Hun (N. Y.) 453.

Under sections 983, 984, Code Civ. Proc., construed together, a defendant with whom a public officer is joined, may have the case tried in the county wherein the former resided when the suit was instituted. It was so held where the plaintiff sought both to have an execution sale restrained, and to recover damages for the levy. Lamson Consolidated Store Service Co. v. Hart (Supreme Ct.), 5 N. Y. Supp. 889.

The restriction in section 983, of the venue of actions for penalties, does not apply to those arising under the game laws. Leonard v. Ehrich, 40 Hun (N. Y.) 460.

In an action against a person as president of an association, he is the "defendant," within New York Laws 1882, ch. 410, requiring the venue of an action in a New York City district court, to be in a district in which either the plaintiff or the defendant resides. Brooks v. Dinsmore, 15 Daly (N. Y.) 428.

Under Code Civ. Proc., § 983, allowing an action for a nuisance to lie where some part of the cause arose, an action by the water commissioner of a village in Niagara county, against the street commissioner of a city in Erie county, to abate a nuisance caused by throwing foul matter into the Niagara river, should be brought in Erie county, the cause arising there. Horne v. Buffalo (Supreme Ct.), 1 N. Y. Supp. 801.

Within section 984, an unmarried man was held to "reside" in the county where he had leased apartments, and slept but irregularly, and received his mail matter. Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Ives (Supreme Ct.), 3 N. Y. Supp. 895.

Section 982, declaring local any action affecting an interest in real estate, applies to trespass quare clausum fregit. Freeman v. Thomson, 50 Hun (N. Y.) 340.

An action to recover a penalty or violation of the game law, is a civil action, and the penalty may be sued for by the district attorney of the adjoining county. People v. Rouse (Supreme Ct.), 15 N. Y. Supp. 414.

An action against a vendor, to recover on his agreement to pay back for deficiency in the amount of the land, is not, within section 982, one to be tried in the county where the subject is situated. Oakes v. DeLancey (Supreme Ct.), 12 N. Y. Supp. 840.

An action against trustees to recover, on a certificate, an interest in certain hotel property, is not local, as affecting an interest in real property. Roche v. Marvin, 92 N. Y. 398.

A proponent conceding the jurisdiction is estopped to object thereto on appeal. Matter of Budlong, 54 Hun (N. Y.) 131. Compare Burdick v. Freeman, 120 N. Y. 420.

An objection on the ground of the affiant's non-residence, may be first raised on a second trial, if the fact has not previously appeared. Brooks v. Dinsmore, 15 Daly (N. Y.) 428.

Under Code Civ. Proc., § 2869, a justice of the town where the plaintiff resides has jurisdiction, though the defendant is a non-resident and was in another town in the same county when the action was begun. Bennett v. Weaver, 50 Hun (N. Y.) 111.

In Code Civ. Proc., § 982, the words, "actions to procure a judgment," etc., refer to a judgment that by its express form and provisions will affect the title to real property, or some interest therein. They do not embrace an action for damages for breach of a contract to convey, due to inability to give title. Hogg v. Mack, 53 Hun (N. Y.) 463. Otherwise, as to an action to procure a judgment directing a conveyance. Kearr v. Bartlett, 47 Hun (N. Y.) 245.

North Carolina.—Under section 193 of the Code of this state, an action on an administration bond, lies in the county where it was given, and where the plaintiff resides, though the defendants reside in another county. Clark v. Peebles, 100 N. Car. 348.

An action against a sheriff for not complying with section 200 of the Code, in the return of a summons, lies in the county from which it issued, though he is the sheriff of another county. Watson v. Mitchell, 108 N. Car. 364.

In section 190 of the Code, pl. 4, the words "distrained for any cause," do not apply to a sheriff's seizure in claim and delivery; the place of trial is not therein regulated by the situation of the property. Smithdeal v. Wilkerson, 100 N. Car. 52.

In Halifax county, A qualified as administrator, but died in Northampton county. A resident thereof, B, became A's administrator. It was held that under section 193 of the Code, an action by a resident of Halifax county against B and against a surety on A's bond, residing in Northampton county, was properly brought in Halifax county. State v. Peebles, 100 N. Car. 348.

Ohio.—As to the general rule and the exceptions, in this state, see Ohio Rev. Stat. 1890, §§ 5022-5031. The provision of section 5031, for venue, where "the defendant resides or may be summoned," does not apply to a merely nominal or simulated defendant. Thompson v. Massie, 41 Ohio St. 317. One is exempt from summons in another county than that of his residence, while he is attending a hearing in the case in which he is a party. Andrews v. Lembeck, 46 Ohio St. 38.

Oklahoma.—In Oklahoma the venue laws are, with slight exceptions, like those of Kansas. Compare Oklahoma Stat. 1890, §§ 4346-4352, with Kansas Gen. Stat. 1889, §§ 4125-4134.

Oregon.—In Oregon an action on a note lies in the county of the defendant's residence. Dunham v. Shindler, 17 Oregon 256.

Pennsylvania.—An action on a bond given by the York county commissioners, for the redemption of notes executed in furtherance of completing the court house, is on a demand "arising in building the new court house," within the Act of 1839, giving the Adams county court of common pleas jurisdiction thereof. York County v. Small, 1 W. & S. (Pa.) 315.

An action against the owner of a wharf, for damage to a barge, because of the unsafe condition of the wharf, is local. But it would be transitory if based on averment of license, etc., knowing the wharf to be unsafe. Dempsey v. Delaware Iron Co., 12 Phila. (Pa.) 314. So, also, is an action for damage to barges, from the overflow of a canal, local. Moyer v. Chesapeake, etc., Canal Co., 12 Phila. (Pa.) 400.

Rhode Island.—In Rhode Island an action by an indorsee, on a promissory note against the maker, lies as if there had been no assignment. Rhode Island Pub. Stat. 1882, p. 551, § 5.

South Carolina.—In this state, the fact that, incidental to the charge of false representations in a sale of personalty, the complaint alleges that a conveyance of land was fraudulently made, will not require the venue to be where the land is situated, if not seeking to set the conveyance aside, nor stating facts sufficient therefor. New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Wray, 28 S. Car. 86.

The requirement of section 146 of the Code, that the venue be where the defendant resides, applies to an action against an administrator residing in one county, but appointed receiver of an estate located in another county. Ware v. Henderson, 25 S. Car. 385.

An action for unlawfully detaining a bailor's personal property is transitory. Lipscomb v. Tanner, 31 S. Car. 49.

Section 146 of the Code, as to venue in the county of the defendant's residence, if the defendant administrator resides in Greenville county, where also did his intestate, the court of common pleas of Abbeville county, cannot compel an account of his administration of an estate in Abbeville, of which he has, in Abbeville, been appointed a receiver. Ware v. Henderson, 25 S. Car. 385.

Tennessee.—In this state, an action for willfully burning fences, trees, and crops, is local. Nashville, etc., R. Co. v. Weeks, 13 Lea (Tenn.) 148.

Where a transitory action is begun before the defendant enters the county, the court does not obtain jurisdiction within Tennessee Code, § 2808. Carlisle v. Cowan, 85 Tenn. 165.

The action granted by the Code 1884, § 1331, for a wrongful killing in Tennessee, may be brought by a non-resident widow of the deceased, although he was also a non-resident, and entered the service of the defendant outside the state. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Higgins, 85 Tenn. 620.

Texas.—In this state the statute (Sayles' Rev. Civ. Stat. 1889) provides that no person who is an inhabitant of the state, shall be sued out of the county in which he has his domicile, except in certain cases, namely, married women; transient persons; where the defendant is without the state; where the defendants reside in different counties; where the contract in suit is to be performed in a particular county; where the action is against an executor, administrator, or guardian on a money demand; in case of fraud or official defalcation; or of crime, offense, or trespass; or where an attachment is wrongful; or where the suit is for the recovery of personal property; or concerning an inheritance; or for the foreclosure of a mortgage or lien; or for partition; or concerning land; or for devise; or for an injunction to stay proceedings; or to revise proceedings of the probate court; or against a county; or the head of a department; or for the forfeiture of a charter; or against a railroad to forfeit land; or against a private corporation or railroad; or by a mechanic against a railroad; or against a foreign corporation; or an insurance company; or where the venue is prescribed by a particular law; or where the suit is against vendors of land; for breach of warranty of title; where the vendors live in different counties.

Such of the foregoing exceptions as are not peremptory, are for the benefit of the plaintiff. Caro v. Caro, 60 Tex. 395.

As to "domicile," the old residence remains unchanged until the new one is complete. Tucker v. Anderson, 27 Tex. 276. A cause suable only in the county of the defendant's domicile, cannot be joined with one suable in the county where the obligation on which it was based was to be performed, so as to compel the defendant to submit to the latter jurisdiction against the plea of privilege allowed by Rev. Stat., art. 1198. Altgelt v. Harris (Tex. 1889), 11 S. W. Rep. 857.

In construing the second exception, see Brown v. Read, 33 Tex. 629. In construing the third, see Liles v. Woods, 58 Tex. 416; Kuteman v. Page, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas., § 165. In the fourth, as applying to necessary parties, see Holloway v. Blum, 60 Tex. 625; as against a co-surety, for contribution, see Rush v. Bishop, 60 Tex. 177; as to the joinder of a fictitious defendant, see Christie v. Gunter, 26 Tex. 700. One who is not a proper or necessary party is not a "defendant," and the co-defendant's remedy for the wrong venue is by a plea in abatement. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Mangum, 68 Tex. 342.

In construing the fifth exception, see Cohen v. Munson, 59 Tex. 236; Henry v. Fay, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas., § 835. In construing the sixth, see Wilson v. Kyle, 35 Tex. 559; Bondies v. Buford, 58 Tex. 266. This exception does not apply to an action by a distributee to recover his share of the estate. Stewart v. Morrison, 81 Tex. 396.

In construing the seventh exception, see Freeman v. Kuechler, 45 Tex. 592; Crawford v. Carothers, 66 Tex. 199; Lehmberg v. Biberstein, 51 Tex. 457. The venue being where the fraud was committed, the vendor of the land may sue in the county where the sale took place, though he resides in another. Boothe v. Feist (Tex. 1892), 19 S. W. Rep. 398. To bring a case within this exception, the petition must allege not merely confederation, but some fact whence actionable fraud can be inferred. Baines v. Mensing, 75 Tex. 200.

In construing the eighth exception, see Armendiaz v. Stillman, 54 Tex. 623; Belo v. Wren, 63 Tex. 686; Cook v. Hortsman, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas., § 770. As to what "trespass" means, see Connor v. Saunders, 81 Tex. 633; Austin v. Cameron, 83 Tex. 351. "Offense or trespass" was held not to apply to a case of personal injury from the defendant's negligence in fastening the guy rope of a pile driver. Ricker v. Shoemaker, 81 Tex. 22. But "trespass" was held to embrace an injury that is the indirect result of wrongful force; e. g., injury to a pregnant woman from a boisterous and bloody assault committed in her presence. Hill v. Kimball, 76 Tex. 210. This exception applies to a suit on an attachment bond. Cahn v. Bonnett, 62 Tex. 674. An action against a sheriff's indemnitors for his wrongful levy, will not lie in a county other than that of his domicile, unless his misconduct be established. Hilliard v. Wilson, 76 Tex. 180. An action for wrongful attachment lies in the county where the seizure was made, though no defendant resides therein. Perry v. Stephens, 77 Tex. 246.

The venue of a suit for conversion by an illegal attachment, is in the county where the writ issued. Focke v. Blum, 82 Tex. 436.

In construing the eleventh exception, see Higgins v. Frederick, 32 Tex. 282; Hays v. Stone, 36 Tex. 181; Joiner v. Perkins, 59 Tex. 300. In construing the twelfth, see Stark v. Burr, 56 Tex. 130; Osborn v. Osborn, 62 Tex. 495.

In construing the thirteenth, as to its yielding to the fifth, see Neill v. Owen, 3 Tex. 145; as to its yielding to the sixth, see Finch v. Edmonson, 9 Tex. 511; as to specific performance or rescission of a land contract, see Miller v. Rusk, 17 Tex. 170; Herrington v. Williams, 31 Tex. 458; Mixan v. Grove, 59 Tex. 573; as to compelling survey, see Texas, Mexican R. Co. v. Locke, 63 Tex. 623; as to non-residents, excess of land sections, etc., see State v. Snyder, 66 Tex. 687. An action to recover land fraudulently purchased must be brought in the county where the land lies. State v. Stone, etc., Co., 66 Tex. 363. One who has located a land certificate under an agreement to receive a share of the land, must sue thereon in the county where the land lies. Murrell v. Wright, 78 Tex. 519. A suit for destruction of buildings is local, if they are found to be of the realty. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Cullers, 81 Tex. 382. A suit to set aside a sale of state public land must be brought in the district court of the county where the land lies. State v. Wichita Land, etc., Co., 73 Tex. 450.

In the absence of special exception, an action by tenants in common in two tracts of land, located under one certificate, but in different counties, lies in either, against the grantee's heirs. Tevis v. Armstrong, 71 Tex. 59.

In the absence of waiver by the defendant, an action to recover three tracts of land located in three different counties, cannot be brought in one alone, merely because the plaintiff relies on the same state of facts to recover each. Martin v. Robinson, 67 Tex. 382.

A suit to compel a public surveyor to survey lands located, is local; his non-residence is immaterial. Thomson v. Locke, 66 Tex. 383.

Trespass to try title should be brought where part of the land lies, although some of the defendants reside in a county remote therefrom. Thomson v. Locke, 66 Tex. 383.

The Texas statutory requirement, that a suit to recover land be brought where the land lies, confers a mere personal privilege, and may be waived. De La Vega v. League, 64 Tex. 205.

An action by a non-resident plaintiff against a non-resident defendant, on an instrument that may collaterally affect land owned by both in the state, may be brought in any county where the defendant can be found, or will appear. Pegram v. Owens, 64 Tex. 475.

In construing the fourteenth exception, see Jones v. Jones, 60 Tex. 451. In construing the fifteenth, see Winnie v. Grayson, 3 Tex. 429; George v. Dyer, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas., § 780; as to scire facias to revive, see Masterson v. Cundiff, 58 Tex. 472; as to debt on a judgment, see Johnson v. Skipworth, 59 Tex. 473. This exception and article 2880, requiring suits going to the validity of the judgment to be in the court of the recovery of the judgment, do not apply to prevent sale of property on which the judgment, however valid, is no lien. Van Ratcliff v. Call, 72 Tex. 491.

In construing the sixteenth, see Franks v. Chapman, 60 Tex. 46; 61 Tex. 576. In construing the twenty-first, see Southern Cotton Press, etc., Co. v. Bradley, 52 Tex. 587; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Hill, 63 Tex. 381; 51 Am. Rep. 642. In construing the twenty-second, see Atlantic Ins. Co. v. Sinker, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas., § 954.

A petition to enforce a vendor's lien is local, if stating facts showing its existence. Joiner v. Perkins, 59 Tex. 300.

A suit for malicious arrest and prosecution, lies where the affidavit was made, although the arrest was in another county. Hubbard v. Lord, 59 Tex. 384.

An action on a bond to secure performance of a contract, payable at no specified place, does not lie in the county in which the contract was to be performed, if the principal and sureties do not reside therein. Lindheim v. Muschamp, 72 Tex. 33.

An oil company in Harris county wrote to S. in Goliad county, offering to buy, "at $9 per ton, good crop seed, f. o. b." It was held that S.'s action for the price accrued, when he loaded the cotton seed free on board cars in Goliad county; and under Texas Rev. Stat., art. 1556, § 10, allowing suit where any part of the cause of action arose, the venue properly lay in that county. Merchants', etc., Oil Co. v. Seelingson, 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas., § 206.

Under Texas Rev. Stat., art. 1199a, allowing an action for breach of warranty of title to land to be brought in any county where one of the vendors resides, a co-defendant will not be heard to plead the personal privilege of being sued in his own county. Carothers v. Johnson, 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas., § 263.

A civil action for a newspaper libel, may be brought in the county where it was circulated, although not that of its original publication. Belo v. Wren, 63 Tex. 686.

Utah.—Under the practice act, an action, before a justice, on a due-bill not payable in any particular place, must be begun before the justice of the peace of the precinct where the debtor resides. Kloppenstien v. Woolf, 3 Utah 426.

Vermont.—Under Rev. L., § 899, of this state, an action for breach of covenant of warranty is transitory, and lies in Vermont, when the grantor resides there, though the land lies in another state. Tillotson v. Pritchard, 60 Vt. 94; 6 Am. Dec. 95.

Trespass to the freehold before a justice, must be in the town in which one of the parties resides. June v. Conant, 17 Vt. 656.

Virginia.—In Virginia, as to the venue of various actions, see Virginia Code 1887, §§ 3214-3218. A suit on a firm debt may be abated as to a non-resident partner. Brown v. Belches, 1 Wash. (Va.) 9.

Washington.—Under the Washington Civil Practice Act, § 48, allowing foreclosure in the county where the subject is situated, in a case of disconnected tracts in several counties, the suit may be brought in any one of them. Stevens v. Ferry, 48 Fed. Rep. 7. A suit for specific performance of a contract for sale of land, is not within the

(2) Practice; Remedies Without Change.—Special code legislation has provided for liberal practice, in some cases of inadvertence, in laying the venue in civil actions, somewhat conformably with the old chancery practice.¹

Washington Code, § 47, requiring an action for recovery, possession, or partition, or for determination of a question affecting the title, to be in the county or district in which part of the land lies. Morgan v. Bell, 3 Wash. 554.

An action for conversion of trees may be brought where the cause arose, not in the county where the land lay, notwithstanding a count or paragraph for treble damages under Washington Code, § 602; this being rejected as surplusage. McLeod v. Ellis, 2 Wash. 117.

West Virginia.—In West Virginia where one of the two defendants, in an action for malicious prosecution, is a non-resident, the suit lies in any county where they can both be found and served. Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 1.

Wisconsin.—In this state as to actions, local or transitory, see Wisconsin Annot. Stat. 1889, §§ 2619, 2620.

Under Wisconsin Laws 1885, ch. 301, an action for labor on logs is transitory, and lies where the defendant is personally served. Shafer v. Hogue, 70 Wis. 392.

Wyoming.—In Wyoming the venue laws are like those of Kansas. Compare Wyoming Comp. L. 1876, p. 39, §§ 41-49, with Kansas Gen. Stat. 1889, §§ 4125-4134.

1. In California, "If the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper county for the trial thereof, the action may, notwithstanding, be tried therein, unless the defendant, at the time he appears and answers or demurs, files an affidavit of merits, and demands, in writing, that the trial be had in the proper county." California Code Civ. Proc. 1885, § 396.

"An action by a county may be brought in any county not a party thereto." California Code Civ. Proc. 1885, § 394.

In Arkansas, a defendant's appearance may be a waiver of an erroneous venue. Arkansas Dig. Stat. 1884, § 5010. There, consent of parties will confer jurisdiction of an action for injury to real property elsewhere than in the county where it is situated. Jacks v. Moore, 33 Ark. 31.

In Colorado, under the Town-site Act of 1881, in case there is an adverse claimant to any town-site land, either party may bring a suit against him in the county in which the land lies; but if the judge be interested in any land in the town, he must order the papers with a transcript to be transmitted to another judicial district, as in cases of a change of venue. Colorado Annot. Stat. 1891, § 4348.

In Florida, an objection to the venue, not raised in a plea in abatement, is not available on demurrer, or after trial on a plea to the merits. Bucki v. Cone, 25 Fla. 1.

In Georgia, a plea to the merits is a waiver of objection to the jurisdiction. Perseverance Min. Co. v. Bisaner, 87 Ga. 193.

In Indiana, attaching the property of a non-resident defendant does not confer jurisdiction over a defendant residing in another county. Brown v. Underhill, 4 Ind. App. 77.

Under Iowa Code, § 3511, the attachment of property within the township gives a justice of the peace jurisdiction, though the defendant is a non-resident. Sections 3507, 3509, 3517, making venue depend on domicile, apply only to cases of personal service, or in the district courts. Anderson v. Union Pac. R. Co., 77 Iowa 445.

In Kansas, as to when an objection to jurisdiction coming too late is first raised on appeal, see Kansas City R. Co. v. Rodebaugh, 38 Kan. 45; 5 Am. St. Rep. 715.

In Kentucky, service on one improperly joined will not confer jurisdiction over a non-resident defendant. Basye v. Brown, 78 Ky. 553. Compare Achy v. Holland, 8 Lea (Tenn.) 510.

In Massachusetts, although an action to recover double gaming money is brought in the wrong county, the defendant's motion to dismiss may be refused, if he has pleaded to the merits. Morris v. Farrington, 133 Mass. 466.

In Michigan, a transitory action cannot be begun in a county where neither party resides, to be thereafter removed to the proper county. Haywood v. Johnson, 41 Mich. 598.

In Minnesota, the district court designated in the complaint may try an interest in land situated in another county,

As in England, so, also, in Massachusetts, Maine, and some other states not usually designated as "code states," the statutory simplification of rules of pleading has rendered superfluous any allegation of the venue in transitory actions.¹ It is the policy of the law, in determining the proper venue, to look to the convenience of litigants, and to substantial justice, irrespective of technicalities.²

unless a change of venue be seasonably demanded and actually made; and this, though the summons was served by publication only. Kipp v. Cook, 46 Minn. 535.

In Missouri, omission of the marginal venue prescribed in Missouri Rev. Stat., § 2883, is no ground for arrest of judgment, if the venue appears in the body. Dollman v. Munson, 90 Mo. 85.

In Nebraska, one using the name of a firm is estopped to object to being sued in the county where he does business, instead of that of his residence. Rosenbaum v. Hayden, 22 Neb. 744.

In New York, it is not a ground of demurrer, that a transitory action, e. g., for slander of title to land, is joined with an action for trespass on land in another state. Dodge v. Colby, 108 N. Y. 445.

An objection that the complaint does not allege that the defendant is a resident of the county, comes too late, if first raised after he has gone to trial. Ross v. Konor (Supreme Ct.), 2 N. Y. Supp. 169.

In Rhode Island, an action with wrong venue "shall be abated." Rhode Island Pub. Stat. 1882, p. 552, § 6.

In Tennessee, the presence of a defendant where the suit was brought gives jurisdiction, under Tennessee Code, § 2808, that in all transitory actions the right of action follows the person of the defendant, unless otherwise expressly provided. Carlisle v. Cowan, 85 Tenn. 165. There, consent to a continuance is not a waiver of a plea in abatement to a justice's jurisdiction. Otherwise, as to a plea to the merits. Simpson v. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co., 89 Tenn. 304.

Where one not a real defendant is joined for the purpose of bringing the suit, in a county other than that in which the material defendants reside, the suit should abate. Achy v. Holland, 8 Lea (Tenn.) 510. Compare Baye v. Brown, 78 Ky. 553.

In Texas, an objection to the venue of a suit to recover possession of land, if not raised by plea in abatement, is to be deemed waived. Walker v. Stroud (Tex. 1887), 6 S. W. Rep. 202. As to when an objection to the jurisdiction, first raised on appeal, comes too late, see Eggenberger v. Brandenberger, 74 Tex. 274.

In Delaware, "all allegations heretofore usually inserted in declarations and other pleadings, which are not material or traversable, and which the party could not be required to prove, may be omitted; unless when they are required for the right understanding of allegations that are material. Delaware Laws 1874, p. 648, § 14.

2. In Maine, a foreign defendant's temporary bodily presence is, upon service of a summons, equivalent to domicile. Alley v. Caspari, 80 Me. 234; 6 Am. St. Rep. 178. This is upon the axiom of Huberins, that foreigners within our limits are subject to our laws. Story on Conflict of Laws (8th ed.), § 581; Wharton on Conflict of Laws (2d ed.), §§ 17, 705, 743.

Similarly, in Massachusetts. Barrell v. Benjamin, 15 Mass. 354. In Roberts v. Knights, 7 Allen (Mass.) 449, both parties were British subjects. In Peabody v. Hamilton, 106 Mass. 217, which was an action on an account annexed for £100,000, the writ described the plaintiffs as "of London in England," and the defendant as "of the State of New York and commorant of Boston, in this commonwealth."

In New Jersey, the statutory privilege, restricting suit to the district where the defendant resides, may be waived by submitting to the jurisdiction of another court. Fraley v. Feather, 46 N. J. L. 429.

In construing the New Jersey Rev. Stat., p. 870, § 139, see Reed v. Wilson, 41 N. J. L. 39.

Where the venue of an action, for damages to both real and personal property, was erroneously laid in a county, other than that where the land

But there is danger of undue expansion of the common-law rule, especially in the venue of suits for divorce.¹

In general, a habeas corpus proceeding should be instituted in the county where the alleged unlawful restraint is being exercised.²

In applying the principle of comity laid down in the federal constitution,³ to actional privileges in one state, of citizens of another, some anomalous cases have arisen under the statutes affecting the remedy only.⁴

(3) Corporation Suits.—In general, as to venue, corporations lay, and there was no objection, or motion for nonsuit, it was held that the judge properly refused to withdraw from the jury the consideration of the land damages. Blackford v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 53 N. J. L. 56.

In South Carolina, it is held that an action for unlawfully detaining a bailor's personal property, may lie in another state than that where the detention occurred. Lipscomb v. Tanner, 31 S. Car. 49.

In Illinois, a defendant is not "found" in a county whither, for the purpose of service of the summons, he has been taken upon arrest under a fictitious complaint. McNab v. Bennett, 66 Ill. 160. An objection to the venue for non-residence comes too late if first raised on appeal. Allen v. Watt, 69 Ill. 655. A plea in abatement for non-residence, is not demurrable for merely concluding with praying for judgment. Drake v. Drake, 83 Ill. 526.

In Vermont, as to the superseding of the common law by statute concerning local actions, see June v. Conant, 17 Vt. 656.

In Virginia, a suit, the venue whereof depends on the defendant's residence, "shall abate" upon the officer's return of non-residence. Virginia Code 1887, § 3242. A plea in abatement for non-residence must state where the defendant does reside. Middleton v. Pinnell, 2 Gratt. (Va.) 202. Such plea must come before plea in bar. Washington, etc., Tel. Co. v. Hobson, 15 Gratt. (Va.) 122. In assumpsit, the plea need not state where the cause of action arose. Warren v. Saunders, 27 Gratt. (Va.) 259.

1. "Where litigation is expensive, or the law inauspicious, the subjects of one country may succeed in throwing on the courts of another country, the burden of cases in which the thing contested, as well as the parties contesting, are foreign, and which the courts thus appealed to were not organized to undertake. Lately, while acknowledging the principle, there has been a growing tendency to narrow its application. In England, in Massachusetts, in New York, and in Pennsylvania, the courts on the subject of divorce have maintained, with more or less strictness, the necessity of domicile to confer jurisdiction." 4. In Putnam v. Dike, 13 Gray (Mass.) 535, the court, by Shaw, C. J., said: "This is certainly an extraordinary case. A small debt, contracted in Vermont in 1815, has increased by simple interest to three times the original amount, by lapse of time, being a period of over forty years. The only defense relied on is, that it is barred by the Statute of Limitations. This, of course, must mean the statute of Massachusetts. The Statute of Limitations affects the remedy only, and is, therefore, local in its operation; neither the Statute of Limitations of Vermont, where the contract was made, nor that of any other state or county, has any efficacy in Massachusetts. The parties both lived in Vermont, where the cause of action accrued; and there is no evidence to show that the defendant ever came within the limits of this state. If the defendant never came into Massachusetts after the cause of action accrued, the statute never began to run and no length of time could make that statute a bar to an action which the plaintiff might bring in this state. . . . If indeed, the defendant had never been an inhabitant of this state and there was no effectual attachment of the defendant's property in this suit, and he had appeared specially and may sue and be sued as natural persons; and some statutes simply so provide.¹ Others prescribe more particularly.²

Some statutes provide that an action against a railroad or mail-stage company, may be brought in any county through which the line runs.³

Many decisions involving questions of venue of actions against railway, insurance, and other corporations, turn upon construction through comparison of different statutes of the same state.⁴

pleaded in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court, we do not perceive why it would not have been a good defense to this suit. But no such course was taken and perhaps the facts would not warrant it."

2. In Alabama, a foreign or domestic corporation may be sued in any county in which it does business by an agent. Alabama Code 1886, § 2642.

An action to vacate the charter of a corporation, "must be brought in the circuit court of the county in which the corporation has its principal office; or, if it has no principal office, in that of any county in which it does business." Alabama Code 1886, § 3169.

In the Kentucky Civil Code, §§ 58 and 71 must be construed together. In 1890, under a petition upon an insurance policy, which averred that the company's chief office was in Jefferson county, and that it issued a certificate through its agent in Allen county, a judgment by default, rendered in Allen county, was held to be valid, although service had been made on the chief officer in Jefferson county; such averment could not be controlled by recitals in the policy attached to the petition as an exhibit. Kentucky Mut. Security Fund Co. v. Logan, 90 Ky. 364.

There, moreover, the domicile of a railway corporation having no president in the state, is determined by the residence of its vice president, if he be in the state; this being, within Kentucky Civ. Code, § 73, "its chief officer." Harper v. Newport News, etc., R. Co., 90 Ky. 359.

In Arizona, a suit against a railway company may be brought in any county into which its road extends. Arizona Rev. Stat. 1887, § 674, pl. 19.

The provision of the Arkansas Stat. 1875, that one, whose stock is killed by a railroad company, "may" sue in the county where the killing or wounding occurred, restricts the action to that county. Little Rock, etc., R. Co. v. Chifton, 38 Ark. 205.

A suit against a county cannot be brought elsewhere. Shaver v. Lawrence County, 44 Ark. 225.

The California constitutional requirement as to suits against corporations, does not import that a suit to declare a deed a mortgage and compel re-conveyance, shall not, under the California Code Civ. Proc., § 392, be brought in the county where the land lies, although the defendant's principal place of business is in another county. Baker v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 73 Cal. 182.

In the absence of a statute defining the residence of a corporation, this need not be restricted to its principal place of business; and an action against it to condemn land, should be brought where the land lies. California Southern R. Co. v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 65 Cal. 394.

An action against a corporation for personal injuries, lies in the county where the accident occurred. Lewis v. South. Pac. Coast R. Co., 66 Cal. 209.

The venue of an action against a railroad company, for its wrongful refusal to transport lumber, was held to be in the county of the tender and refusal, notwithstanding an allegation that this resulted from a conspiracy between the company and other dealers resident in another county. Chase v. South. Pac. Coast R. Co., 83 Cal. 468.

The provision of the California Const., art. 12, § 16, allowing a corporation or "association" to be sued in the county where the cause accrued, applies to a mining company; and as to the venue, the complaint need not show any corporate powers. Kendrick v. Diamond Creek Consolidated Gold Min. Co., 94 Cal. 137.

In Colorado, general and special provisions as to the venue of a suit against corporations, must be construed together. Denver, etc., Constr. Co. v. Stout, 8 Colo. 61.

In Georgia, a mining corporation may be sued in the county where its principal financial office is, although operating its works in another county. Dade Coal Co. v. Haslett, 83 Ga. 549.

An action for a railway company's refusal to issue a through bill of lading, to a point on another carrier's line, should be in the county of the defendant's residence, or in that of the point of shipment. Coles v. Central R., etc., Co., 82 Ga. 149.

Under Georgia Code, § 3406, allowing suit to be brought in the county wherein the cause of action originated, an action by a shipper of live stock to recover for damage thereto, may be brought in the county of delivery to the carrier, though the tort was not completed therein. Central R., etc., Co. v. Pickett, 87 Ga. 734. Under this section a railway corporation "inhabits" all the counties in which its road lies, and it may be sued in any of them. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co. v. Atlanta, etc., R. Co., 49 Fed. Rep. 608.

An action for failure to deliver cotton at its destination, may come in the county where it was delivered to the carrier. Central R. Co. v. Brunson, 63 Ga. 504.

In Illinois, a Missouri corporation doing business in Illinois may be garnished for a debt due a resident of Missouri. Hannibal, etc., R. Co. v. Crane, 102 Ill. 249; 40 Am. Rep. 581.

In Indiana, a suit against a railway company, for burning grass and fences, is an action for an injury to real estate within the Indiana Rev. Stat., § 307, and is properly brought in the county where the real estate is situate, although joining a claim for damages to personalty, and although the company has no agent in that county. Indiana, etc., R. Co. v. Foster, 107 Ind. 430.

As to the venue of a suit against a railway corporation for medical services to an employee, see Evansville, etc., R. Co. v. Spellbring, 1 Ind. App. 167.

An action against a railway company, for injury to land in Illinois, will not lie in the court of a county in Indiana, although the road extends therein. Du Breuil v. Pennsylvania Co., 130 Ind. 137.

The Iowa Code, §§ 2582-2585, as to venue, do not apply to a foreign corporation running cars merely for exhibition and advertisement, without carrying passengers or freight; and this though the suit be for infringement of a patent by such operation of a train of cars. Carpenter v. Westinghouse Air Brake Co., 32 Fed. Rep. 434.

In Iowa, an action will lie against a railway company, although the cause accrued before the road was operated therein. Knott v. Dubuque, etc., R. Co., 84 Iowa 462.

Under the Kansas Code 1885, §§ 50-68a, an action against a railway company incorporated in another state, for injuries to persons or property, was held to lie in a county where it had a union depot, with arrangements for running its cars over tracks of other corporations therein. Hannibal, etc., R. Co. v. Kanaley, 39 Kan. 1.

In Kentucky, in general, an action against a corporation having an office in the state, or chief officer residing therein, must be brought in the county where such office or residence is situated, or where the contract was to be performed, or where the tort was committed. Kentucky Code 1889, § 72. (For exceptions, see §§ 62-71, 73-77.)

An action against a common carrier lies in the county where the defendant resides, or where the contract is made, or the property is to be delivered. Adams Express Co. v. Crenshaw, 78 Ky. 136.

In Louisiana, an action against a corporation, for damages from its negligence and nonfeasance, must be brought at its domicile. Caldwell v. Vicksburg, etc., R. Co., 40 La. Ann. 753.

In a restriction in a railroad charter as to venue, an exception of actions of trespass may be deemed waived by a landowner allowing entry and occupancy for many years without objection. Payne v. Morgan's, etc., R., etc., Co., 43 La. Ann. 981. Such exception includes an action of trespass on the case for the killing or wounding of live stock. State v. Judge, 33 La. Ann. 954.

In Maine, when any corporation is one party, and a county the other, the suit lies in any adjoining county. Maine Rev. Stat. 1883, p. 674, § 13.

In Maryland, a turnpike company may be sued in the county where it collects its tolls and exercises its corporate privileges, though its principal office and records are elsewhere. Baltimore, etc., Turnpike Co. v. Crowther, 63 Md. 558.

In Massachusetts, when a foreign corporation brings a transitory action in a county wherein only one of the defendants resides, and, after a trial on the merits without objection to the venue, discontinues against him, a new trial may come in the same county. Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Abbott, 131 Mass. 397.

As to what is a corporation's "usual place of business," see Rhodes v. Salem Turnpike, etc., Bridge Co., 98 Mass. 95; Barre Nat. Bank v. Hingham Mfg. Co., 127 Mass. 563.

In Michigan, unless otherwise provided by statute, a township cannot be sued outside its own county. Pack v. Greenbush Tp., 62 Mich. 122.

In Minnesota, a suit against a foreign corporation lies in any county designated in the complaint. Olson v. Osborne, 30 Minn. 444.

The fact that a foreign corporation has, contrary to U. S. Act 1885, ch. 183, instituted a suit in the federal court, does not, after discontinuance, preclude it from suing in the state court. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Brown, 36 Minn. 108.

In Mississippi, the only local actions are ejectment and trespass quare clausum fregit. A suit against a railway company for damages, from an overflow resulting from negligent construction, may be brought in any county where any part of the road lies. Archibald v. Mississippi, etc., R. Co., 66 Miss. 424.

Under the Missouri Rev. Stat. (1879), § 3481, pl. 4, allowing suit in any county when all the defendants are non-residents of the state, a foreign corporation having an office in the state, may be sued in any county thereof. Eatill v. New York, etc., R. Co., 41 Fed. Rep. 849.

In Nebraska, an action against a railway or stage owner, for an injury to persons or property upon the line, or upon a liability as a carrier, lies in any county into which the road or line passes. Nebraska Consol. Stat. (1891), § 4592. This includes a suit for overflow from wrong construction of a railway bridge. Omaha, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 29 Neb. 492.

In New Hampshire, as to when a foreign corporation may be sued in any county, see Bishop v. Silver Lake Min. Co., 62 N. H. 455.

In New Jersey, in an action against a railway company for burning a barn and personal property in another county, objection to the venue was held to come too late, when first raised after the cause had proceeded to trial.

Blackford v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 53 N. J. L. 56.

In New York, an action against an officer of a corporation to recover a debt of the corporation, on the ground that he had signed a false report, is penal and local, and must come where the report was filed, although the debt originated in another county. Veeder v. Baker, 83 N. Y. 156.

Under New York Code Civ. Proc., § 1779, a foreign corporation may enforce its contracts in New York. Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber, 106 N. Y. 473; 60 Am. Dec. 464; Hibernia Nat. Bank v. Lacombe, 84 N. Y. 367; 38 Am. Rep. 518.

The right, under New York Code Civ. Proc., § 1780, of a non-resident to sue a foreign corporation, depends on his residence, and not on his citizenship. Adams v. Penn. Bank, 35 Hun (N. Y.) 393.

Within New York Code Civ. Proc., § 984, the residence of a corporation, for venue purposes, is where its principal business is to be carried on, as designated by its charter, though in fact it may have an extensive business office in another county. Rossie Iron Works v. Westbrook, 59 Hun (N. Y.) 345.

In North Carolina, it has been held that an action for redress involving interpretation of the charter, should be brought in the state which created the corporation, though an auxiliary action lies in another state, where it has property. Moore v. Silver Valley Min. Co., 104 N. Car. 534.

Ohio Rev. Stat., § 5027, relates to the jurisdiction of the person; the petition need not state that the road of the defendant corporation passes into the county. Southern Ohio R. Co. v. Morey, 47 Ohio St. 207.

As to exception, from section 5026, of special statutory actions, see Muskingum County Infirmary v. Toledo, 15 Ohio St. 409.

Under the Ohio Rev. Stat., § 5030, any foreign corporation which may be found in the state, may be sued in any county, in any court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Handy v. Insurance Co., 37 Ohio St. 371.

An Oregon corporation must be sued where it has its principal office, or where the cause of action arose. Oregon Code, § 44, applies; § 55, pl. 1, relates to the manner of service. Holgate v. Oregon Pac. R. Co., 16 Oregon 123.

In Pennsylvania, a private corporation may be sued in any county in which the proper officer can be served. Lehigh Coal, etc., Co. v. Lehigh Boom Co., 12 Phila. (Pa.) 540.

An action against a municipal corporation can be brought only in its own county. Heckscher v. Philadelphia (Pa. 1887), 9 Atl. Rep. 281.

A mandamus may issue against a railway company in a county where its road is located, although its office is outside the state. Com. v. New York, etc., R. Co., 138 Pa. St. 58.

In Rhode Island, "personal or transitory actions, brought by or against corporations, shall be brought either in the county in which the other party, or some one of the other parties, dwells, or in the county in which the defendant, or some one of the parties defendant, shall be found, or in which the corporation is located by its charter, or, if not located by its charter, in which the annual meetings of the corporation are required to be, or, if not required to be, are actually holden." Rhode Island Pub. Stat. 1882, p. 551, § 3.

In Tennessee, an action against a corporation for personal injuries lies in any county where it has an office or agency. Toppins v. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co., 5 Lea (Tenn.) 600.

An action against a railway company, for the killing of an engineer, was held to be properly brought in Tennessee where the accident occurred, and where the road must be operated under the charter, although the plaintiff and the deceased, at the time of his death, resided in Kentucky, where the greater part of the road lay, and where the contract of employment took place. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Higgins, 85 Tenn. 620.

In Vermont, a railway company's action may be either in the county of its principal office, or in that of the defendant's residence; an action against it, in any county through which its road runs. Vermont Rev. L. 1880, § 809.

In Virginia, suit lies in a county, "if a corporation be a defendant, wherein its principal office is situated, or wherein its mayor, rector, president, or other chief officer, resides." Virginia Code 1887, § 3214, pl. 2.

In West Virginia, there is a similar provision. See West Virginia Rev.

Stat. 1879, p. 872, § 1. And see Humphreys v. Newport News, etc., Co., 33 W. Va. 135.

In Wisconsin, an action against a railway corporation, except an appeal in condemnation proceedings, lies in any county into which its road runs. Wisconsin Annot. Stat. 1889, § 2619, pl. 4.

In Wyoming, the rule as to the venue of an action against a railway or stage owner is like that of Nebraska. See Wyoming Comp. L. 1876, § 46.

Under the Texas Rev. Stat. 1198, a railway company may be sued in a county where it has an agent and operates its road, though the cause arose in another county. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Horne, 60 Tex. 643.

In an action against a railway company for loss of baggage, a plea that the defendant had no office or agent in the county, and did not operate its road therein, is good, though the baggage was checked to a point therein. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas., § 47.

Under the Texas Rev. Stat., art. 1198, § 21, allowing a suit against a "private corporation" to be brought in any county where any part of the cause of action arose, a consignor's action for failure to sell produce may be brought where the agreement was made. Western Wool Commission Co. v. Hart (Tex. 1892), 20 S. W. Rep. 131. A railway company is a "private corporation," within the said section 21, and may be sued in any county in which it has an agent, though its road does not extend thereto. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Traweek, 84 Tex. 65.

In Arizona, a suit against a fire insurance company may be in any county in which the property is located; and a suit may also be brought against a life or accident insurance company, in the county in which the person resided at the time of the death or injury. Arizona Rev. Stat. 1887, § 674, pl. 20.

In California, a contract for insurance, under an application for a policy payable according to the terms of a future will, and, pending that, to stand in favor of the lawful heirs, was held not consummated until accepted by the insured, and suit thereon not to lie in the county where the policy was issued, but in the county where it was accepted. Yore v. Bankers', etc., Mut. L. Assoc., 88 Cal. 609.

In Connecticut, the residence of a stockholder has been permitted to control the venue of an action on a fire policy. Wood v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 13 Conn. 202; 33 Am. Dec. 395.

In the Illinois venue laws, a mutual benefit association is distinguished from a life insurance company. North-western L. Assoc. v. Stout, 32 Ill. App. 31.

Under the Kentucky Code, an action on an insurance contract may be brought in the county in which the company has a local agent, if there is none in that wherein the assured resides, and the subject property is located. Owen v. Howard Ins. Co., 87 Ky. 571.

In Nebraska, an action on an insurance contract made in the state, is transitory, and the venue is governed by the Nebraska law. The provision of the Nebraska Code, § 55, allowing it to be brought where any part of the cause arose, is remedial; it lies in any county where service may be had, though the company has no agent therein. Insurance Co. of N. A. v. McLimans, 28 Neb. 653.

In New Hampshire, "the insured may bring his action in the county of his residence, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the policy" (of fire insurance). Pub. Stat. 1891, p. 486, § 12.

Under the New York statute, as to an action for the penalty against a foreign insurance company effecting insurance within a municipality without giving bond, etc., the cause arises in the municipality, irrespective of where the contract was signed. Ithaca Fire Dep. v. Beecher, 99 N. Y. 429.

Under Ohio Rev. Stat. 1890, § 5026, that an action against an insurance company "may be brought in the county wherein the cause of action, or some part thereof, arose," an action against a life insurance company may be brought where the insured died. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Pyers, 36 Ohio St. 544.

In Texas, in an action by an indorsee against a maker and payee of a note, it appeared that the note was given for the first premium of life insurance, but that the policy, containing an unauthorized condition, was tendered back, and a return of the note demanded and refused. It was held that an action lay in the county of the maker's residence, where the agent procured the note, though the company had no office there, and the court had jurisdiction to render not only a judgment against the maker, but also one over, on his cross-bill, against the company. First Nat. Bank v. Turner (Tex. App. 1891), 15 S. W. Rep. 710.

In Virginia, a suit on a policy lies in the county "wherein the property was situated, or the person, whose life was insured, resided at the date of the policy." Virginia Code 1887, § 3214, pl. 3.

Under Wisconsin Rev. Stat., § 2619, an action on a life insurance policy lies in the county where the death occurred. Bruil v. Northwestern Mut. Relief Assoc., 72 Wis. 430.

of a stream, in another county or court-district, must be brought where the nuisance was caused.¹

In Mannville Co. v. Worcester, 138 Mass. 89; 52 Am. Rep. 261, an action to recover for the city's diverting, in Massachusetts, water of Tatnuck brook, a tributary of Blackstone river, whereon was the plaintiff's mill in Rhode Island, the court, by Holmes, J., in deciding that a recovery for the consequent damage could be had in Massachusetts, said: "We cannot assent to the distinction between discharging and withdrawing water. The consequence in one case is positive, in the other negative; but in each it is the consequence of an act done outside the jurisdiction where the harm occurs, and the consequence is as direct in the latter case as in the former. The right infringed in the former case is called absolute ownership, in the latter, easement; but the laws of Rhode Island, which make a man owner of a tract of land there, have no more power to diminish freedom of action in Massachusetts, than any other of its laws. A concurrence of the laws of both states is as necessary in that case as in the one at bar, to create a liability which can be enforced in either state consistently with principle. Such a concurrence presents no technical difficulties, and, if the substantive end to be attained is a proper one, it will be recognized and acted on here, as we have no doubt that it would be in Rhode Island, if the position of the parties were reversed. Of course, the laws of Rhode Island cannot subject Massachusetts land to a servitude, and, apart from any constitutional considerations, if there are any, which we do not mean to intimate, Massachusetts might prohibit the creation of such servitudes. So it might authorize any acts to be done within its limits, however injurious to lands or persons outside them. But it does not do either. It has no more objection to a citizen of Rhode Island owning an easement, as incident to his ownership of land in that state, than it has to his owning it in gross, or to his purchasing lands here in fee. . . . So far as their creation is concerned, the law of Massachusetts governs, whether the mode of creation be by deed or prescription, or whether the right be one which is regarded as naturally arising out of the relation between the two estates; being created, the law of Rhode Island, by permission of that of Massachusetts, lays hold of them and attaches them in such way as it sees fit to land there, Massachusetts being secured against anything contrary to its views of policy by the common traditions of the two states, and by the power over its own territory which it holds in reserve. It was also contended for the defendant that the action could only be brought in Rhode Island. This objection is purely technical. The reasons which once made the venue important have long disappeared, and we see no reason for any greater strictness than is absolutely required by the statutes and precedents. If the plaintiff's mill were in another county of this state, an action for damages would be rightly brought in Worcester, not only by Massachusetts Pub. Stat., ch. 161, § 8, but by the common law. As between two states, both of which recognize the right, if the rule is to vary at all, it should be on the side of greater liberality, to prevent a failure of justice such as would be likely to happen in the present case if this action were not maintained. The weight of judicial opinion is altogether in favor of allowing an action to be maintained, where the water was withdrawn. The decisions, in cases where both the act and the consequence complained of were outside the state in which the action was brought, are not opposed to our conclusion, and we are not called upon to decide between Lord Mansfield, in Mostyn v. Fabrigas, Cowp. 161, and Lord Kenyon, in Doulson v. Matthews, 4 T. R. 503. The American cases have generally followed the latter."

As to the cases cited by Judge Holmes, in Manville Co. v. Worcester, 138 Mass. 89; 52 Am. Rep. 261, or that of Mostyn v. Fabrigas, Cowp. 161 (venue rightly in England, for false imprisonment in Minorca), see supra, this title, In the English Practice—In General; for that of Doulson v. Matthews, 4 T. In California, an action for diversion of water from a ditch situated in two counties, may be brought in either. Lower Kings River Water Ditch Co. v. Kings River, etc., Canal Co., 60 Cal. 408.

In Illinois, in an action for injury to land in Bureau county, from a dam in Stark county, it was held that the venue might be laid in either. Pilgrim v. Mellor, 1 Ill. App. 448.

An action for flooding lands in Indiana, by a dam in Illinois, will not lie in Illinois. Eachus v. Illinois, etc., Canal Trustees, 17 Ill. 534.

A drainage district situated in two counties may be sued in either, although its records are kept in only one; the defendant is "found" in either, within Illinois Rev. Stat. 1891, p. 1090, § 2. Drainage Com'rs v. Griffin, 134 Ill. 330.

In Louisiana, it is held that an action will lie in that state for damages done to the property of the plaintiff by a steamer in another state, though, by the laws of the latter, the action would be held to be local. Such an action, under the Louisiana laws, is a personal action. Holmes v. Barclay, 4 La. Ann. 63.

In Maine, one may maintain an action for damages to his land therein, from a dam built across the Salmon river to operate a mill in New Hampshire; this at common-law, but not under the Maine mill statute. Wooster v. Great Falls Mfg. Co., 39 Me. 246.

In Michigan, where one's dam causes damages to another's crops, the fact that the county line coincides with the dividing line of their farms, will not bar an action by the injured party therefor in his own county. Thorn v. Maurer, 85 Mich. 569.

In Minnesota, replevin against a sheriff may be brought at the plaintiff's domicile, Minnesota Code, §§ 47, 49, being construed together. Leonard v. Maginnis, 34 Minn. 506.

In Nebraska, an action, for flowage from the negligent construction of a railway bridge, lies in any county where service may, under the Nebraska Code, § 56, be had on the defendant corporation. Omaha, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 29 Neb. 492.

In New Hampshire, injury to a highway, from a dam entirely in Maine, may be prosecuted for in the former state. State v. Lord, 16 N. H. 357. A wooden tent, erected by parol license on the land of another, is a chattel, for injury to which trespass lies in the county where either party resides. Ford v. Burleigh, 62 N. H. 388.

In New Jersey, an action for injury to land from back flowage, caused by a dam, must be brought where the land lies. Deacon v. Shreve, 23 N. J. L. 204.

A compact between New York and New Jersey, gives to New York jurisdiction over the Hudson to the low-water mark on the New Jersey shore, and to New Jersey the exclusive right of property in the land under the water lying west of the middle of the river, with exclusive jurisdiction over wharves and docks made on the New Jersey shore. The court held that an indictment lies in New Jersey for placing a wreck on the west shore, between the high and low-water line, but not for placing it below the low-water line. State v. Babcock, 30 N. J. L. 29. Compare a case of bayou-island rights on the Ohio, to the low-water line of which Virginia had ceded her north-west territory. Handley v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 374. Compare, also, a case involving construction of the Georgia compact of cession of land west of the Chattahoochee. Howard v. Ingersoll, 17 Ala. 780.

In New York, where the chief of police of Buffalo sent a telegram to Toronto, causing a wrongful arrest of a woman, it was held that, as to her cause of action, "part," within New York Code Civ. Proc., § 983, arose in Buffalo. Tupper v. Morin, 25 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 398.

In Dewitt v. Buchanan, 54 Barb. (N. Y.) 31, which was an action between residents of Canada for an assault committed therein, the court, by James, J., in effect, said: It is now settled that the courts of this state have and will entertain jurisdiction of actions for personal injuries committed abroad, when both or either of the parties are citizens of the United States. But Molony v. Dows, 8 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 316, an action for being driven out of California, in 1856, by a vigilance committee, holding otherwise, is not regarded as authority, that decision overlooking United States Const., art. 4, § 2. As a question of law, this court has jurisdiction of torts committed in a foreign country; but as a matter of policy, will only exercise it in its discretion, in exceptional cases. This was followed in Burdick v. Freeman, 46 Hun (N. Y.) 138.

This constitutional principle of comity was adopted in Johnson v. Dalton, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 543; 13 Am. Dec. 564, which was an action for assault on the high seas between British subjects. As to its application in divorce cases, etc., see supra, this title, Statutory Restrictions.

In Ruckman v. Green, 9 Hun (N. Y.) 225, which was an action to recover for damage to suburban residence property on the Palisades in New York, from a bone and offal boiling establishment in New Jersey, the court, by Davis, P. J., said: "There is no sound principle, we think, which precludes a party, whose property is specially injured by a nuisance which casts upon it offensive and noxious vapors, from maintaining an action, because of the interposition of a state line between the nuisance and the property so injured."

An action will not lie in New York for injury to a mill in New Jersey, by the diversion of the water of a stream. Watts v. Kinney, 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 484; 6 Hill (N. Y.) 82.

Under the New York Code Civ. Proc., §§ 982, 983, allowing an action for a nuisance to lie where some part of the cause arose, an action by the water commissioner of a municipality, against the street commissioner of a municipality in another county, to abate a nuisance such as the throwing of filth into the stream above, should be brought in the latter county, the cause arising there. Horne v. Buffalo (Supreme Ct.), 1 N. Y. Supp. 801.

In North Carolina, an action against a sheriff for a false return, lies in the county from which the summons issued, although he is the sheriff of another county. Watson v. Mitchell, 108 N. Car. 364.

In Ohio, an action lies for damage to lands therein, occasioned by the diversion of a stream in Pennsylvania.

Thayer v. Brooks, 17 Ohio 489; 49 Am. Dec. 474.

In Pennsylvania, an action for flooding lands is local. But if a dam in one county injures land of a party in another, the action lies in either. Oliphant v. Smith, 3 P. & W. (Pa.) 180.

A furnace in Centre county, which, in its ore cleansing, corrupted water in Huntingdon county, was held, by Woodward, P. J., in the quarter sessions, indictable in Centre county. Com. v. Lyons, 1 Clark (Pa.) 497. Compare Prevost v. Gorrell, 3 W. N. C. (Pa.) 366, a case of an injury to an adjoining mine lessee from bad mining.

In Texas, in Cameron county, an action was maintained by a citizen thereof, for injury to his land in Mexico, from an obstruction placed in the Rio Grande in the said county. Armen-diaz v. Stillman, 54 Tex. 623.

In Vermont, a statutory action to recover for an injury from a town's defective highway, lies in the county of the plaintiff's domicile, though the defendant town is in another county. In so deciding, in Hunt v. Pownal, 9 Vt. 417, the court, by Redfield, J., said: "The action does not come within the exception of the statute as to actions of ejectment and trespass on the freehold. It may well be supposed that the legislature did not intend to make any other actions local, with reference to the county."

The rule that an action for personal injuries is transitory, was applied where the accident occurred in the Province of Quebec, through the defendant company's neglect to comply with a statute of that province, regulating crossings. McLeod v. Connecticut etc., R. Co., 58 Vt. 727, quoting the following, Miller, J., in Dennick v. Central R. Co., 103 U. S. 11: "If the defendant was legally liable in New Jersey, he could not escape that liability by going to New York. It would be a very dangerous doctrine to establish, that in all cases the several states have substituted the statute for the common law, where the liability can be enforced in no other state but that where the statute was enacted and the transaction occurred."

An action for trespass to the freehold in Massachusetts will not lie in Vermont. Niles v. Howe, 57 Vt. 388.

Scire facias against the bail of the sheriff of Caledonia county for not returning tax extents, may be brought by the state treasurer in Windsor county, where the plaintiff resides and

b. IN CRIMINAL CASES—(1) In General.—Ordinarily, the statutes of each state provide expressly for the laying of the venue in criminal cases. This, of course, is very simple in case of an indivisible offense committed within a single jurisdiction.¹

has his office. State Treasurer v. Kelsey, 4 Vt. 371.

In Washington, an action for unlawfully cutting trees may be brought where the cause arose. And in order to sustain the jurisdiction of the court, a count praying treble damages under the Washington Code, § 48, may be rejected as surplusage. McLeod v. Ellis, 2 Wash. 117.

In West Virginia, as to the venue of an action of trespass on the case against a railway company, see Humphreys v. Newport News, etc., V. Co., 33 W. Va. 135.

In Wisconsin, an action to recover a penalty for an offense, committed on any water over which two counties have common jurisdiction, may be brought in either. Wisconsin Annot. Stat. 1889, § 2619, pl. 2.

In Re Eldred, 46 Wis. 549, the court, by Ryan, C. J., said: "Possibly it would be competent for the legislature to provide that a dam situate in one county, but creating injurious effects in several, might be indicted in either. . . . But, in absence of such legislation, a dam more than a hundred rods from the county line (the statutory limit) can be indicted in its own county only."

1. See CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, vol. 4, p. 786.

In Alabama, "the local jurisdiction of all public offenses, unless it is otherwise provided by law, is in the county in which the offense was committed." Alabama Code 1886, § 3716.

In case of abolition of the county and its reestablishment under a new name, after a change of venue of a murder case, the defendant's continued appearance without objection is a waiver of the discontinuance. Hall v. State, 51 Ala. 9.

In Arkansas, proof of the venue is indispensable to conviction. Frazier v. State, 56 Ark. 242.

In a trial for murder, proof that the killing was from nine to fourteen miles from the county seat, without showing the direction, was held not to establish the venue. Dobson v. State (Ark. 1891), 17 S. W. Rep. 13.

In California, evidence that a burglary was committed on "Grant Avenue," was held to be sufficient proof that it was committed in San Francisco, whereof this was a prominent street. People v. McGregor, 88 Cal. 140.

In Colorado, an offense committed in a county attached to another for judicial purposes, may be prosecuted in either. Colorado Annot. Stat. 1891, § 1434.

In Connecticut, "Every person charged with any offense shall be tried in the county wherein it shall have been committed, except when it is otherwise provided." Connecticut Gen. Stat. 1888, § 1618.

In Florida, the evidence must be such that the venue of the offense may be reasonably inferred. Warrace v. State, 27 Fla. 362.

In Georgia, in bastardy as to two children, one born in Terrell county, but begotten in Webster county, the other begotten in Terrell, but likely to be chargeable to Webster, it was held that the venue might be in Webster; but it "would have been the better course" to bring separate indictments. Davis v. State, 58 Ga. 170.

Upon a controversy as to whether the venue has been proved, the court may decide on recollection, or reopen the case. Wiggins v. State, 80 Ga. 468.

On a trial for larceny from the courthouse of H. county, the testimony of an accomplice that he spent the night of the crime in C., the shire town, was held sufficient to establish the venue in H. county. Porter v. State, 76 Ga. 658.

In Illinois, the failure of the record to show that the venue was proved—e. g., on a trial for knowingly receiving stolen goods—is ground for reversal of conviction. Jackson v. People, 40 Ill. 405.

It has been held that forgery, by a bookkeeper in a national bank, of a draft purporting to be drawn thereon, is cognizable in a state court, notwithstanding the provision of United States Stat., § 5209. Hoke v. People, 122 Ill. 511. But compare People v. Fonda, 62 Mich. 401.

Proof that a robbery was committed on a street of Peoria, Ill., was held sufficient to establish the venue in Peoria county. Sullivan v. People, 114 Ill. 24.

In Indiana, as to the evidence requisite to establish the venue in a criminal case, see Wiles v. State, 33 Ind. 206; Luck v. State, 96 Ind. 16. Proof that an illegal sale was "at Noblesville," without stating the county, was held insufficient. Deck v. State, 47 Ind. 245.

In this state, one may be prosecuted in Harrison county for selling intoxicating liquors, without license, in a boat anchored in the Ohio river on the Indiana side, south of low-water mark. Welsh v. State, 126 Ind. 71.

In Kansas, as to the evidence necessary to establish the venue in a criminal case, see State v. Benson, 22 Kan. 471.

In Louisiana, the supreme court will not review the jury's determination as to proof of the venue in a criminal case. State v. Starks, 42 La. Ann. 315.

In Maine, in an indictment for selling a lottery ticket, the omission of the words "then and there," before "selling," was held not to be fatal to the venue. State v. Willis, 78 Me. 70.

In Michigan, consent cannot confer jurisdiction over a criminal case. Hill v. People, 16 Mich. 351.

In Mississippi, in a criminal case, the venue must be proved strictly as alleged. Thompson v. State, 51 Miss. 353. But it may be established by circumstantial evidence. See the case of stealing a runaway slave. Coon v. State, 13 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 246.

In Missouri, the venue must be proved as alleged. State v. Young, 99 Mo. 284. On a trial for maliciously killing a mule, proof that, when the shot wounds were first seen on him, he was in the county of his habitat, wandering home, and soon died, was held to be sufficient proof of venue therein, although the accused lived three miles distant, across the county line. State v. Daugherty, 106 Mo. 182. Compare, as to proof by circumstantial evidence, State v. Snyder, 44 Mo. App. 429; State v. Sanders, 106 Mo. 188.

In Nebraska, when one white man murders another on an Indian reservation therein, the state court has jurisdiction of the offense. Marion v. State, 20 Neb. 233. Otherwise, as between Indians thereon, so long as they maintain their tribal relations. Ex p. Cross, 20 Neb. 417.

The rule, that a status once proved is presumed to continue, was applied, on a murder trial, to prove that the deceased was shot in a certain county and, for convenience of the physician, was removed across a river, where he died. Blinfield v. State, 15 Neb. 485.

In New York, as to state jurisdiction in prosecution of crimes, see the five specifications. Bird. New York Stat., p. 792, § 6; Penal Code, § 16.

In Ohio, in case of forgery, the place where the instrument was uttered determines the venue. Lindsey v. State, 38 Ohio St. 507.

In Pennsylvania, the place of the birth, and not of the begetting, governs the venue in bastardy. Helkes v. Commonwealth, 26 Pa. St. 513.

As to the offense of constructive larceny, the place where the goods were obtained with felonious intent, governs the venue, though they were disposed of in another jurisdiction. Com. v. Smith, 1 Clark (Pa.) 400.

There is no treaty which prevents a court of Philadelphia county from indicting and convicting a person, for an assault on board a Norwegian vessel lying in a Philadelphia port. Commonwealth v. Luckness, 14 Phila. 362.

In Tennessee, although it was not shown exactly where the killing took place, the venue of an indictment for murder was held to be properly laid in the county where the deceased was seen alive, and his body found, and where part of the road lay whereon the defendant was seen with the deceased. Lancaster v. State, 91 Tenn. 267.

A state court cannot indict one for perjury committed in a federal court. State v. Shelley, 11 Lea (Tenn.) 594.

In Texas, the venue in a criminal case must be established by evidence, and not by mere inference. Sedberry v. State, 14 Tex. App. 233; Ryan v. State, 22 Tex. App. 699. The evidence may be wholly circumstantial. Cox v. State, 28 Tex. App. 92; Abrego v. State, 29 Tex. App. 143.

The venue must be proved as alleged. Williams v. State, 21 Tex. App. 256; Shelton v. State, 27 Tex. App. 443; Strickland v. State (Tex. App. 1890), 13 S. W. Rep. 865. And this, although the judge and jury personally know the locus in quo to be within the jurisdiction. Miles v. State, 23 Tex. App. 410.

Under Texas Code Crim. Proc., art. 205, providing that an offense, committed without and punishable within the state, may be prosecuted in any county in which the offender is found, the removing of mortgaged property from the state may be prosecuted in the county whence it was taken, and to which the defendant is returned on being arrested in another county. Williams v. State, 27 Tex. App. 258.

So, also, as to a crime begun without, and consummated within, the boundaries of a state.¹

Where, after the commission of a crime, the place is created into a new county, the courts thereof have jurisdiction. Weller v. State, 16 Tex. App. 200.

In Virginia, an objection to the venue will be considered, however informally raised. Philips v. Com., 19 Gratt. (Va.) 485.

West Virginia has jurisdiction of an offense committed on a vessel which is afloat on the Ohio river, while confined within its banks, whether the vessel is, or is not, fastened to some object on the bank. State v. Plants, 25 W. Va. 119; 52 Am. Rep. 211.

The venue must be proved as alleged. State v. Mills, 33 W. Va. 455.

1. Under the Alabama statute (Code of 1876), which is a valid law, a prosecution for murder may be maintained in that state, in the county where the fatal blow was struck, although the death, ensuing within a year and a day, occurred in another state; and this is true without the statute, as the crime of murder consists in the infliction of the fatal wound, coupled with the necessary felonious intent, and the ensuing death is but the consequence of the unlawful act. Green v. State, 66 Ala. 40; 41 Am. Rep. 744.

The Arkansas constitutional provision for trial in the county where the crime is committed, has not abrogated the statute authorizing prosecution of a larceny in any county of the state where the thief may be found, with property stolen in another state. State v. Johnson, 38 Ark. 568.

In California, in case of a larceny committed in another state, the venue may be in any county into or through which the property has been brought. California Penal Code, § 789. Accordingly, an indictment charging that the defendant stole a watch and chain in Arizona, and brought them into Los Angeles county, was held to sufficiently bring the case within the jurisdiction of the court in that county. People v. Staples, 91 Cal. 23.

In Illinois, the offense is punishable, though begun without, and consummated within, the state, "through the intervention of any innocent or guilty agency, or any means proceeding directly or indirectly from himself; and, in such case, he may be tried and punished in the county where the offense was consummated." Illinois Rev. Stat. 1891, p. 525, § 401.

In Kansas, one who, in Missouri, forged a time-check upon a railroad company having its treasury in Kansas, which check was first paid by the company's agent in Missouri, who was afterward allowed credit therefor by the treasurer in Kansas, was held not to be indictable therefor in Kansas. Ex p. Carr, 28 Kan. 1.

In Kentucky, an indictment for receiving stolen goods should be in the county where they were received. Allison v. Com., 83 Ky. 254.

In Massachusetts, a resident who by previous appointment made within, fights a duel without the state, inflicting a wound causing death within the state, may be indicted and tried therefor in the county where the death happened. Massachusetts Pub. Stat. 1882, p. 1135, § 9.

So, also, in Michigan, see Michigan Annot. Stat. 1882, § 9073.

The Minnesota statute hereon, is not restricted to a resident. Minnesota Stat. 1891, § 6108.

In Missouri, an attempt to commit a crime is cognizable where it was made. So held, as to an attempt to obtain money from a benevolent fraternity that had its supreme council in Maryland, by false personation in Missouri. State v. Terry, 109 Mo. 601.

In Ohio, one who in Missouri forged a deed uttered by his innocent agent in Ohio, may be indicted for the uttering and publishing. Lindsey v. State, 38 Ohio St. 507.

A prosecution under Oregon Comp. L. 1887, § 1746, for inveigling a person with intent to cause him to be sent out of the state against his will, can only be in the county where the fraudulent inducing took place. In re Kelly, 46 Fed. Rep. 653.

One may be convicted in Tennessee for fraudulent appropriation, in selling therein a horse hired in Alabama. Lovelace v. State, 12 Lea (Tenn.) 721.

Texas Criminal Code, art. 454, making punishable in Texas certain offenses committed elsewhere, and not requiring personal presence therein, applies

As to offenses conceived or begun in one county and executed or carried out in another, or committed partly in one county and partly in another, or upon county boundary, or upon a moving train or vessel, the state statutes and decisions are less uniform.¹

to a forgery in another state, of titles to lands in Texas. Hanks v. State, 13 Tex. App. 289.

1. Under the Arkansas constitution of 1874, requiring trial by a jury of the county, the legislature can confer upon a court of one county no jurisdiction over a crime committed in another, though within one hundred yards of the boundary. Dougan v. State, 30 Ark. 41.

In California, an indictment of Stakem, for stealing cattle in Placer county, is not sustainable by proof that Robles stole them therein, and took them into Yuba county, where they were sold by Stakem with guilty knowledge. People v. Stakem, 40 Cal. 599.

The superintendent of a ranch, whose duty it was to make entries on the books, and report all transactions to his principal at San Francisco, shipped horses to Sacramento, and there received the proceeds without making entry or report. It was held that the embezzlement was in Sacramento county. Ex p. Palmer, 86 Cal. 631.

In Florida, in the absence of contrary statutory provision, an action for obtaining property by false pretenses must be brought where the property was obtained, and not in another county where the pretenses were made. Connor v. State, 29 Fla. 455.

In Georgia, to establish the venue, the county line may be proved by hearsay. Wimbish v. State, 70 Ga. 718.

The Illinois statute, requiring an offense committed in one county to be prosecuted in another, if within one hundred rods of the line thereof, contravenes the constitutional provision for trial by a jury of the county and is void. Buckrice v. People, 110 Ill. 29.

In Indiana, as to the low-water mark on the Ohio, in determining the venue of an offense, see Welsh v. State, 126 Ind. 71.

In Iowa, "when a public offense is committed partly in one county and partly within another, or when the acts or effects constituting or requisite to the consummation of the offense, occur in two or more counties, jurisdiction is in either county. Miller's Iowa Rev. Code 1888, § 4159. Thereunder abortion is indictable where the medicine was administered, and not where the miscarriage took place. State v. Hollenbeck, 36 Iowa 112.

The district court of Iowa may punish an offense committed on a boat moored to the east shore of an island in the Mississippi river east of the center of the channel. State v. Mullen, 35 Iowa 199.

One who, by falsely asserting in Wright county that he was authorized to collect a judgment, obtained the execution and delivery of a mortgage and notes in Polk county, was held to be indictable in the latter county. State v. House, 55 Iowa 466.

The Kansas statute hereon (Kansas Crim. Code, § 23) is substantially like that of Iowa. Where, on a prosecution for receiving stolen property, it appeared that the accused, to aid a claimant of a mare alleged to have been stolen in Kearney county, went from Grant county and took possession of the mare, it was held that this was not such an overt act as, coupled with an evil intent, would be punishable in Grant county. State v. Rider, 46 Kan. 332.

Where one in Lane county, before it was organized, committed perjury in swearing to an affidavit used by him in his suit in Ness county, to which Lane was judicially attached, it was held that an indictment therefor, after Lane was organized, was in Lane, and not in Ness county. State v. Bunker, 38 Kan. 737.

In Kentucky, the county in which the accused was first arrested is the county in which the offense is triable under section 24, Crim. Code of that state, although the arrest was at the instance of the authorities of the county where the larceny was committed. Massie v. Com., 90 Ky. 485.

One authorized to solemnize matrimony in Ohio, but not under the Kentucky law, may be prosecuted in Kentucky for solemnizing matrimony on that side the low-water mark of the Ohio river. McFall v. Com., 2 Metc. (Ky.) 395.

In Maine, for an application of the principle of new asportation in a case of theft of books, where the caption was before, and the retention continued after, the statute was enacted, see State v. Somerville, 21 Me. 14; 38 Am. Dec. 248.

In Massachusetts, an indictment of A for larceny in Cumberland county, was held to be sustainable by proof that the goods were stolen by him in Suffolk county, and brought into Cumberland by B and C, who escaped, and that A was concerned with them there in the possession and disposal of the goods. Com. v. Dewitt, 10 Mass. 154.

An offense committed in one county, within one hundred rods of another, may be laid in the latter. Com. v. Gillon, 2 Allen (Mass.) 502.

In Michigan, an offense committed within a hundred rods of the dividing line, is punishable in either county. How. Michigan Stat. 1882, § 418. Bayliss v. People, 46 Mich. 221. One receiving stolen property, knowing it to be such, is punishable in the county where he received or had it, though it had been stolen in another county, § 9520. Accordingly, one residing in Van Buren county, within a hundred rods of Allegan county, and receiving upon his farm seed stolen in Allegan county, was held to be properly convicted in Van Buren county. People v. Hubbard, 86 Mich. 440. Compare People v. Williams, 24 Mich. 156; 9 Am. Rep. 119.

The Minnesota statute, allowing an offense committed in one county to be prosecuted in another, if within one hundred rods of the line thereof, does not contravene the constitutional provision for trial by a jury of the county; this must be construed with the provision for the legislature to create judicial districts. State v. Robinson, 14 Minn. 447.

In Mississippi, where an offense was committed in Chickasaw county, but before the prosecution Colfax county was formed including the situs, the venue was held to be laid properly in Colfax county. Murrah v. State, 51 Miss. 675. On division of Panola county, a conviction for murder outside the district where it was committed, was set aside. Spivey v. State, 58 Miss. 858.

In Missouri, the venue for the offense of obtaining goods by false pretenses, is properly laid in the county where they were delivered to the carrier. State v. Lichliter, 95 Mo. 402.

The defendant bought mules in Randolph county, giving therefor a draft on a St. Louis firm, and falsely representing that the firm had money to meet it.

The mules were sent to St. Louis. The defendant went with them, sold them, and absconded with the proceeds. It was held that the obtaining by false pretenses was in Randolph county, where the defendant became invested with the property. State v. Dennis, 80 Mo. 589.

The Missouri statute (Missouri Rev. Stat. 1889, § 3993), punishing crime committed on a river vessel or railway train, similar to that of California and New York, was declared to be constitutional, in a larceny case. Steerman v. State, 10 Mo. 503. Compare civil cases against vessels, under the Missouri Act of 1845. Yore v. Steamboat "C. Bealer", 26 Mo. 426; Wood v. Steamboat "Fleetwood", 27 Mo. 159.

In Nevada, the statute of which, as to stolen property brought from one county into another, is like that of California and New York, a person charged with larceny of cattle is indictable in any county through which he drove them; his every act is, in law, a removal of the property and keeping it from the owner. State v. Brown, 8 Nev. 208.

So, also, in New York, in a case of burglary and grand larceny. Haskins v. People, 16 N. Y. 344.

In New York, a man in one county promised to marry a woman, and on the same day, in another county, seduced her. It was held that under the New York Crim. Code, § 134, placing in either county the jurisdiction of an offense, the acts or effects requisite to the consummation of which occur in both, the grand jury of the latter county could indict him for the seduction. People v. Crotty (Supreme Ct.), 9 N. Y. Supp. 937.

Under the statute allowing an offense to be prosecuted in either county, if committed within 500 yards of the boundary, the space may be considered in either for purposes of allegation and proof. People v. Davis, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 494; 56 N. Y. 95.

In North Carolina, in 1853, the statutory offense of stealing and carrying away a slave, was only indictable in the county of the original felonious caption. State v. Groves, Busb. (N. Car.) 402.

In Ohio, where A produced to B, an accomplice, a paper on which had been written "Richard Brown," and B wrote above the name a promissory note, both intending criminal utterance, it was held that A might be convicted of forgery in the county where the promise was written, without showing in what county the name was written. Devere v. State, 5 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 509.

An agreement between Pennsylvania and New Jersey, made in 1783, gave jurisdiction of criminal offenses committed on the Delaware river to the state in which the offender was first arrested. Com. v. Frazee, 2 Phila. (Pa.) 191.

In Tennessee, two persons, while chained together and in charge of the sheriff of Madison county, journeying to the Shelby county jail, stole a watch in Fayette county. It was held that they were indictable in Shelby; their carrying the watch thither was voluntary. State v. Margerum, 9 Baxt. (Tenn.) 362.

But a Tennessee statute, giving to any county jurisdiction of an offense committed on any vessel navigating the waters of the state "within this state or within five miles of the line thereof," was held to be unconstitutional. Craig v. State, 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 227.

In Texas, the offense of sending a letter threatening to accuse one of crime, is committed in the county where it was mailed. Landa v. State, 26 Tex. App. 580.

A prosecution for acquiring a chattel by false representations, must be in the county in which it was delivered. Sims v. State, 21 Tex. App. 649.

The West Virginia Code, ch. 152, § 12, authorizing an offense committed in one county, within one hundred yards of the boundary, to be prosecuted in another, is unconstitutional. State v. Lowe, 21 W. Va. 783; 45 Am. Rep. 570.

In Wisconsin, one entering a moving car, in one county, intending to commit larceny in such car, is indictable in another county, for a larceny committed in the former. Powell v. State, 52 Wis. 217.

Proc., § 68, prescribing the jurisdiction of the Albany court of special sessions. People v. Parr, 42 Hun (N. Y.) 313.

A libel printed in a Providence newspaper having circulation in a Massachusetts county adjacent to Rhode Island, was held to be indictable in such county. Com. v. Blanding, 3 Pick. Crosswell*, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 264; 5 Am. Dec. 269, where the libelous words were, "a misrepresentative in Congress," etc.; and People v. Crosswell, 3 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 337, a case causing the enactment of the New York Libel Act of 1804.

In California, an indictment for a newspaper libel lies in the county where the paper is published, or where the person libeled resides. In re Kowalsky, 73 Cal. 120.

In Texas, a civil action for a newspaper libel may be brought in the county where the paper was circulated, although not that of its original publication. Belo v. Wren, 63 Tex. 686.

2. So held, in a subornation case in Massachusetts, the deposition, taken in Boston, being in a slander suit pending in New York. Com. v. Smith, 11 Allen (Mass.) 243.

3. Where Griffin, in Morgan county, took on tin, an impression of the key to the lock of a jewelry store therein, and in Chatham county forged a key which he sent to Jones in Morgan county, who had feignedly agreed to steal jewelry and then burn the store, it was held that Griffin was indictable in Morgan county. Griffin v. State, 26

In some states, the jurisdiction in the case of an accessory is expressly prescribed by statute.¹ In the case of an accessory before the fact, the venue may be laid at the place where the party becomes an accessory.²

The attempt must import some overt act. Reg. v. Daniell, 6 Mod. 99. Compare State v. Avery, 7 Conn. 266; 18 Am. Dec. 105. A mere intent, with no movement toward executing, is not an attempt. Bevington v. State, 2 Ohio St. 160; Campbell v. State, 35 Ohio St. 70.

An attempt to commit a crime imports a want of successful purpose. Darrow v. Family Fund Soc., 42 Hun (N. Y.) 245.

1. In California, an accessory is indictable in the county where the accessory offense was committed, although the principal offense was committed in another county. California Penal Code, § 791.

Section 791 does not conflict with section 971, abrogating the distinction between accessories before the fact and principals. People v. Hodges, 27 Cal. 340. In this case, an indictment in El Dorado county for inciting in Santa Clara county, two hundred miles away, a murder committed in El Dorado county, the court, by Shafter, J., quoted Archibald, Cr. Pr. (8th ed.), p. 12, that, to be a principal and not an accessory, the inciter must be "at such convenient distance as to be able to come to the immediate assistance of his associates if required, or to watch to prevent surprise, or the like."

The jurisdiction against a principal not present, is in the same county as if he were present and aiding and abetting. California Penal Code, § 792.

Prize fighting, or a conspiracy thereto, is punishable in any county in which any act is done toward the commission of the offense, or into, out of, or through which the offender passed to commit the offense, or where the offender is arrested. California Penal Code, § 795.

Arkansas, of the steamboat "Martha Washington," the court, by English, C. J., said: "If the crime is the immediate result of his act he may be made to answer for it in our courts, though actually absent from the state at the time he does the act, because he is constructively present, or present in contemplation of law."

In Missouri, in 1842, R. was charged with shooting B. with intent to kill, and Joseph Smith, the Mormon prophet, was charged with being an accessory. On requisition upon the governor of Illinois, Smith was arrested, but on habeas corpus to the United States circuit court for Illinois, he was discharged; the affidavit of B. merely averring belief that Smith was accessory, without stating the facts whereon this was founded. Ex p. Smith, 3 McLean (U. S.) 121.

In California, "the distinction between an accessory before the fact and a principal," is abrogated. California Penal Code 1885, § 971; People v. Rozelle, 78 Cal. 84.

In Connecticut, the doctrine has never been recognized that a resident of one state, who procures a felony to be committed in another state, by a guilty agent, without being personally present to assist in the commission of the offense, cannot be punished in the state where the offense is committed. State v. Grady, 34 Conn. 118.

In Georgia, the common-law rule is still in force, that, in misdemeanors, there are no accessories before the fact; all are principals. Kinnebrew v. State, 80 Ga. 232. As to presence, etc., see Pinkard v. State, 30 Ga. 757, a case of stealing slaves.

In Indiana, in 1862, the conviction of J. for inciting, in Ohio, one B. to commit a larceny in Indiana, was reversed on appeal. Johns v. State, 19 Ind. 421; 81 Am. Dec. 408.

In Kentucky, in 1877, an accessory after the fact of murder, was held to be indictable where the accessorial act was done. Tully v. Com., 11 Bush (Ky.) 154.

In Mississippi, as to the presence of the accessory, see Hogsett v. State, 40 Miss. 522; Unger v. State, 42 Miss. 642.

And the rule is similar, in the case of conspirators.¹

In New Hampshire, an accessory in Maine, to arson in New Hampshire, was held to be indictable in New Hampshire, in the county of the principal offense. State v. Moore, 26 N. H. 448; 59 Am. Dec. 354.

In New York, one may be indicted and tried in the county where he became an accessory, or in that where the principal felony was committed. Birds. New York Stat., p. 793, § 11.

In Wixson v. People, 5 Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 119, the court, by Knox, J., after distinguishing felonies from misdemeanors, where there are no accessories, said: "To warrant one's conviction as principal, it is enough that he be constructively present. By this is meant that he must be of the party, and do some act in execution of the common design, or be near enough to the scene of operations to assist in carrying it out, or to aid those who are immediately engaged in it to escape, should necessity require." State v. Ricker, 29 Me. 84.

As to presence, etc., see People v. Bassford, 3 N. Y. Cr. Rep. 219.

In Texas, one may be prosecuted for aiding his accomplice to fabricate, in another state, a deed purporting to convey land in Texas. Rogers v. State, 11 Tex. App. 608.

In Texas, in 1881, one forging in Chicago, a deed of Texas land, was held to be indictable in Texas. Ex p. Rogers, 10 Tex. App. 655; 38 Am. Rep. 654.

Under the Texas Penal Code, art. 79, and Code Crim. Proc., art. 216, one cannot be held as an accomplice in the county where the stolen property was carried, unless he advised, aided, and encouraged the principal in that county. West v. State, 28 Tex. App. 1.

In Washington, it is provided "no distinction shall exist between an accessory before the fact and a principal." Washington Annot. Stat. 1891, § 1189.

In Wisconsin, an accessory before the fact is punishable in the same manner as the principal felon. Wisconsin Annot. Stat. 1889, § 4613. As to presence, etc., see Connaught v. State, 1 Wis. 159; 60 Am. Dec. 370.

1. In People v. Mather, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 259; 21 Am. Dec. 122, the "Masonry case," charging conspiracy to abduct and imprison William Morgan, the court, by Marcy, J., said: "If conspirators enter into an illegal agreement in one county, . . . go into another county to execute their plans of mischief, and there commit an overt act, they may be punished in the latter county without any evidence of an express renewal of their agreement."

In Pennsylvania, in 1869, a conspiracy to obtain a billiard saloon in Philadelphia, through false pretense of having liquors in bond in New York to pay therefor, was held to be indictable in any county where the overt act was committed. Com. v. Corlies, 3 Brew. (Pa.) 575. Compare the petroleum conspiracy case, Com. v. Tack, 1 Brew. (Pa.) 517; also the lottery-ticket case, Com. v. Gillespie, 7 S. & R. (Pa.) 469.

The fact of confederating is the gist of the offense. A conspiracy in Pennsylvania, to pass counterfeit notes of an Ohio bank, is indictable in Pennsylvania. Collins v. Com., 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 220. Compare Com. v. McGowan, 2 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 341. Similarly, as to a conspiracy in Pennsylvania to get one court-martialed in Fort Columbus, New York, for desertion, and obtain a reward. Com. v. McClean, 2 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 367.

In California, a railway company may be sued for a wrongful refusal to receive and transport lumber, in the county where the tender and refusal was made, although the complaint sets forth a conspiracy therefor in another county. Chase v. South. Pac. Coast R. Co., 83 Cal. 468.

In Michigan, a conspiracy to cheat may be tried wherever an overt act, in pursuance thereof—e. g., getting money from a bank—has been committed. People v. Arnold, 46 Mich. 268.

author of a libel, or of a letter containing false pretenses, is indictable in the place from which it was sent, as well as in that in which it was received.¹

As to indictment for homicide, where death results in one county from a felonious stroke or poisoning dealt in another, many states have reenacted the English statute,² allowing the venue to be in the county of the blow. In others, it may be either in the county where the cause was administered or in the one where the death occurred.³

1. Where R., by mail, sent a note with forged indorsements from New York City to E., in Genesee county, for the purpose of obtaining credit upon it, it was held that the crime was not consummated until the note was received by E., and that, in indicting for uttering, etc., the venue was properly laid in Genesee county. People v. Rathbun, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 509.

Where S., in Ohio, drew and signed receipts falsely acknowledging the receipt of pork, subject to the order of a commission firm in New York, and A. obtained money by exhibiting them to the firm, it was held that, in indicting A. and S. therefor, the venue was properly laid in New York. People v. Adams, 3 Den. (N. Y.) 190; 45 Am. Dec. 468; Adams v. People, 1 N. Y. 173. Compare the lottery ticket case, Com. v. Gillespie, 7 S. & R. (Pa.) 469; 10 Am. In Colorado, bigamy may be prosecuted in the county where the cohabitation with the second wife took place, although the second marriage was without the state. Colorado Annot. Stat. 1891, § 1317.

In North Carolina, in 1799, a person arrested for counterfeiting, in Virginia, money of North Carolina, was discharged, he being punishable in Virginia. State v. Knight, Tayl. (N. Car.) 65.

In Ohio, delivery to a carrier in another county, of a letter containing false pretenses, completes the offense of obtaining, etc. Norris v. State, 25 Ohio St. 217; 18 Am. Dec. 291. As to false pretenses made in another state, see Wilcox v. Nolze, 34 Ohio St. 520.

2. Stat. 2 & 3 Edw. VI., ch. 24, § 2.

3. The Massachusetts Bill of Rights, requiring, in criminal prosecutions, the verification of facts in the vicinity where they happen, etc., is not contravened by Massachusetts Pub. Stat. 1882, p. 1197, §§ 19, 22. Where the mortal injury is inflicted in one county, and death ensues in another, the venue for prosecution may lie in either. So, also, as to an offense committed within one hundred rods of the boundary line of two counties. Where an offense is committed at sea within one league of shore, it may be prosecuted in the adjacent county. Massachusetts Pub. Stat. 1882, p. 1197, §§ 19, 22; Com. v. Parker, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 550.

In Com. v. Costley, 118 Mass. 25, where a pistol shot had been fired in one county, and the body of the deceased was found below a river draw-bridge, in another county, with weights attached, the court, by Gray, C. J., in construing the Massachusetts statute, said: "For the purposes of allegation, prosecution and punishment, each county may be deemed to extend one hundred rods into the county adjoining."

In Tennessee, within Tennessee Code 1884, § 5800, the murder is adjudged to be "committed" in the county in which the blow was struck. Riley v. State, 9 Humph. (Tenn.) 646.

In California, it was similarly held, though the statute was changed between the blow and the death. People v. Gill, 6 Cal. 637.

In Minnesota, so held, where the death was in Wisconsin. State v. Gesert, 21 Minn. 369.

In Alabama, so held, where the death was in Georgia. Green v. State, 66 Ala. 40; 41 Am. Rep. 744.

In New Jersey, it is held that the infliction in New York, of a mortal bruise whereof one dies in New Jersey, is no crime against New Jersey. State v. Carter, 27 N. J. L. 499.

In Kansas, the indictment need allege only that the mortal stab was given in the county of the prosecution; an omission to specify where the death occurred is immaterial. State v. Bowen, 16 Kan. 475.

In Louisiana, similarly held, although the death occurred outside the state, State v. McCoy, 8 Rob. (La.) 545; 41 Am. Dec. 301; or on Lake Borgne, State v. Foster, 7 La. Ann. 255; 8 La. Ann. 290; 58 Am. Dec. 678.

In Michigan, if a felonious, mortal wound be inflicted "on the high seas, or on any other navigable waters, or on land, either within or without the limits of this state, by means whereof death shall ensue in any county thereof, such offense may be prosecuted and punished in the county where such death may happen." Michigan Comp. L., § 5944; Annot. Stat. 1882, § 9420.

In a case already stated supra, this title, Extraterritorial Injuries, Tyler v. People, 8 Mich. 334, the court, by Manning, J., said: "The shooting itself, and the wound which was its immediate consequence, did not constitute the offense of which the prisoner is convicted. Had death not ensued, he would have been guilty of an assault and battery, not murder; and would have been criminally accountable to the laws of Canada only. But the consequences of the shooting were not confined to Canada. They followed Jones into Michigan, where they continued to operate until the crime was consummated in his death. If such a killing did not, by the common law, constitute murder in Michigan, we think it the clear intent of the statute to make it such, to the same extent as if the wounding and the death had both occurred in the state."

In Massachusetts, this decision was approved in a case under a similar statute, Com. v. Macloon, 101 Mass. 17; 100 Am. Dec. 89, the court, by Gray, J., said: "The able and learned dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Campbell, proceeds upon the ground that no part of the criminal act of the defendant was done at the place of the death, a position which seems to us to be untenable."

In the said dissenting opinion (Tyler v. People, 8 Mich. 348), Judge Campbell says: "Tyler committed no act of violence within our borders. For aught that we know, he might have been occupied in yielding aid instead of injury. What then can render him a criminal against this state? When and how did he disturb our peace and good order? Jones was not brought here in the prosecution of any murderous design. So far as Tyler is concerned, he might have been carried to Canada as well. Had Jones lived for a few months, although afterwards dying of his wounds, he might have traversed half the states of the Union, and Tyler could have had no voice in controlling his motions. He might go where murder is punished by death, or he might come here, where it is merely a state prison offense; and yet Tyler would be responsible, if this prosecution can be maintained, to any state or country against which the voluntary choice of Jones might make him a constructive offender. Inasmuch as all present encouraging a prize fight are principal offenders, in case either of the combatants is slain, or subsequently dies of his injuries, and are thus made guilty of murder or manslaughter, in case either of the persons, who have recently [1860] edified the English public by such an exhibition should visit this state, and die here within a year and a day, of injuries there received, the whole distinguished company that attended that exhibition would become guilty of manslaughter against the peace and dignity of Michigan. And the resort of invalids to hospitals and watering places for treatment, may, by the death of anyone, subject any absent aggressor to the criminal laws of a state he has never seen, should his occasion call him thither at any subsequent period of his life. This is making the guilt of the offender spring from the acts of others, and not from his own. And it is importing into the criminal law a principle at variance with its whole reason. How can the public be wronged by the peaceable entrance of a sick or wounded man, or by his dwelling or dying here? We have no right to exclude him unless his disease endangers the public health. And if any harm arises from his coming, he, or those who bring him, are the public disturbers, and not those who have somewhere else contributed to cause his infirmity or disease, but who could not prevent him from going where he should see fit to go."

In U. S. v. Guiteau, 1 Mackey (D. C.) 582; 47 Am. Rep. 247, the court, by Cox, J., adverted to the foregoing Massachusetts and Michigan decisions, said: "This does not militate against the jurisdiction of the original county or state; it simply asserts an additional jurisdiction."

1. In Arkansas, an action to enjoin a sale of land under a fraudulent mortgage, or for an account of the amount due on the mortgage and to cancel fraudulent conveyances and inquire into alleged partnership matters in the land, is not, within the Arkansas Dig. Stat., § 4532, one for the "recovery of an estate or interest in land." An amendment setting up a title and praying recovery may be stricken out. Jones v. Fletcher, 42 Ark. 422.

A suit to enjoin a railway company from removing earth is, within the Arkansas Civ. Code, § 81, "an action for injury to real property," and, therefore, is to be brought in the county within which some part of the subject is situated. Cox v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 55 Ark. 454.

Under California Code Civ. Proc., § 392, an action, by the owner of the undivided interest, to have an administrator's sale of another undivided interest in the same land set aside as fraudulent, lies where any part of the land is situated. Sloss v. DeToro, 77 Cal. 129. Under the said section 392, an action to reform a contract for sale of land must be brought where the land lies. Franklin v. Dutton, 79 Cal. 605.

The California constitutional requirement, that an action to enforce a lien on real estate be local, does not apply to enforcement of a trust on real and personal estate. Le Breton v. San Francisco Super. Ct., 66 Cal. 27.

A suit to compel reconveyance of both real and personal property and for an accounting of rents and profits, and for a personal judgment, must be brought in the county where the defendant resides. Smith v. Smith, 88 Cal. 572.

A suit to enjoin the erection of a dam threatening injury to the defendant's land, must be brought where the land is situated. Drinkhouse v. Spring Valley Water Works, 80 Cal. 308.

In California, as to the venue of a complaint for dissolution of a partnership having an interest in a mine, see Clark v. Brown, 83 Cal. 181.

In Alabama, a bill against the defendants in different counties should be brought in the county where the "material defendant" resides, against whom a decree is sought. Lewis v. Elrod, 38 Ala. 17.

The right, under the Alabama Code, § 3760, of election of jurisdiction, does not exist where the relief sought is as to both land and personal property. Ashurst v. Gibson, 57 Ala. 584.

A bill to foreclose a mortgage of land lying in two counties, may be filed in either. Bolling v. Munchus, 65 Ala. 558.

A judgment debtor, garnished to subject the proceeds of the judgment to a claim against the judgment creditor, is a "material defendant" within whose district, under the Alabama Code, § 3421, the bill must be brought. Street v. Selig, 88 Ala. 533.

In Georgia, a bill to enjoin trespass by felling timber is transitory, and not local. Powell v. Cheshire, 70 Ga. 357; 48 Am. Rep. 572.

Unless praying an injunction to stay law proceedings, a bill must be filed in the county where a defendant resides, against whom relief is prayed. This applies to a collusive agreement of an administrator in fraud of heirs or creditors, although his refusal to sue for land equitably belonging to the estate, would enable the heirs to bring a local action. Edwards v. Kilpatrick, 70 Ga. 328.

Under Georgia Code, § 5169, a suit to annul a fraudulent conveyance lies in the county of the debtor's residence, though the alleged fraudulent grantee resides elsewhere. De Lacy v. Hurst, 83 Ga. 223.

The Georgia constitutional requirement that the defendants, in all civil cases, be sued in the county where they reside, does not apply to equity cases. Rice v. Tarver, 4 Ga. 571.

Although in the Georgia Code, § 2237, stock in a manufacturing company, "whose principal investments are in realty and machinery attached thereto," is deemed realty, yet a bill to set aside a sale of such stock may be brought in another county, wherein one of the defendants resides. Eagle, etc., Mfg. Co. v. West, 61 Ga. 120.

A wife, adopting as her residence the place of her abandonment in Georgia, may there maintain a bill for alimony, the husband, a resident of New York, being served with process in Georgia, when in the act of deserting her. Campbell v. Campbell, 67 Ga. 423.

A bill by executors against an administrator, relating to land in Glascock county, may lie in Washington county, where the defendant, against whom the substantial relief is sought, resides. Fulgham v. Pate, 77 Ga. 454.

A bill to set aside a sheriff's deed must be brought in the county where the grantee resides; he being, within the Georgia Const., art. 6, § 16, pl. 3, the one against whom substantial relief is prayed. Caswell v. Bunch, 77 Ga. 504.

In Illinois, the provision of the chancery code making land suits local, is only declaratory of a general principle of equitable relief. But when the relief sought does not require the court to deal directly with the estate itself, the case is not within the statute. Accordingly a creditor's suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of his debtor may be brought in any county where the debtor and fraudulent vendee are found. In such case the court does not act upon the land itself, but merely declares the conveyance void, and removes the same as an obstacle to the creditor's legal remedy. Johnson v. Gibson, 116 Ill. 294.

Resident creditors of an Alabama corporation, cannot maintain a suit in Illinois to reach unpaid stock subscriptions, until they have recovered judgment in Alabama, and had execution thereon returned unsatisfied. Turner v. Alabama Min., etc., Co., 25 Ill. App. 144.

A partner's suit for an accounting may be brought where one defendant resides, although the partnership personal property is in another county. Quinn v. MacMahan, 40 Ill. App. 593.

In Indiana, an action to restrain a mortgagee of land in Kosciusko county from parting with the mortgage, is not local within the Indiana Rev. Stat. 1881, § 307, and may be brought in Marshall county. Becknell v. Becknell, 110 Ind. 42.

In Iowa, the fact that an injunction is asked as an ancillary remedy, does not render the action a local one. Baker v. Ryan, 67 Iowa 708.

Under the Iowa Code, § 3396, a suit to enjoin collection of a judgment must be brought in the county of the rendition thereof. Phelan v. Johnson, 80 Iowa 727. But an equitable action to cancel an absolutely void judgment and enjoin its collection may be maintained in any court having jurisdiction of such matters, regardless of the court from which execution has issued. State Ins. Co. v. Waterhouse, 78 Iowa 674.

A foreclosure suit, wherein no personal judgment can be had, is not within the Iowa Code, § 2578, and must be brought where the land lies. Orcutt v. Hanson, 70 Iowa 604.

In Kansas, an action to enjoin a fraudulent judgment may be brought in any county in which it is sought to be put in force, though rendered in another county. So held, on a petition by a wife for divorce alleging a collusive judgment between the husband and others to defeat her right to alimony. Busenbark v. Busenbark, 33 Kan. 572.

In Kentucky, an action to rescind a contract for the sale of land is transitory. Kendrick v. Wheatley, 3 Dana (Ky.) 34; Thompson v. Elmore (Ky. 1892), 18 S. W. Rep. 235.

An action to quiet title to land, involving the validity of a certain judgment of the circuit court of one of the two counties in which the land lies, may be brought in the other county. Howe v. Anderson (Ky. 1890), 14 S. W. Rep. 216.

An action by a judgment creditor, to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, may be brought where the land lies, though the debtor resides in another county where the judgment was recovered. Marcum v. Powers (Ky. 1888), 9 S. W. Rep. 255; 10 Ky. L. Rep. 380.

In an action for specific performance of a land contract, the court may also render a personal judgment, although the defendant is not a resident of the county. Collins v. Park (Ky. 1892), 18 S. W. Rep. 1013.

In Massachusetts, one Ohio corporation, which in Ohio has obtained a judgment against another, may maintain a bill in equity against the latter's officers, residing and keeping the books in Massachusetts, for discovery of the stockholders' names and shares, in order, by a suit in Ohio, to enforce a personal liability imposed by the Ohio law. Post v. Toledo, etc., R. Co., 144 Mass. 341; 59 Am. Rep. 86.

In Michigan, a partner's action for an accounting and division of assets as personalty, lies in the county where the parties live and do the firm's business, irrespective of the location of its lands. Godfrey v. White, 43 Mich. 171.

Under Michigan Annot. Stat. 1882, § 6612, the assignee of a judgment recovered in one county, may, in another wherein he resides, maintain a creditor's bill thereon. Rankin v. Rothschild, 78 Mich. 10.

The special provision of Mississippi Code 1883, § 2553, making local a suit for partition, or to quiet title, controls the general provision, section 1847. Nugent v. Powell, 63 Miss. 99.

In New Jersey, when a case has been heard by the vice-chancellor without objection, and the chancellor has adopted his advice and signed a decree, it is too late to raise on appeal the question as to the vice-chancellor's right to hear the case. Delaware Bay, etc., R. Co. v. Markley, 45 N. J. Eq. 139.

In New York, an action against a national bank in another county, may be brought in the county of the plaintiff's residence. Talmage v. Third Nat. Bank, 91 N. Y. 531.

An action by a creditor, as cestui que trust under an assignment, seeking to restrain enforcement of judgments, must be brought in the county where real estate affected thereby is situated. The nature of the action cannot be changed by stipulation. Sweetser v. Smith, 22 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 319.

An action to set aside as fraudulent an assignment for the benefit of creditors that includes real estate, is local within New York Code Civ. Proc., § 982, and can be tried only where some of the land lies. Moss v. Gilbert, 18 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 202.

But an action by a second mortgagee, to compel the first to assign, is not local. Yates County Nat. Bank v. Blake, 43 Hun (N. Y.) 162.

A creditor's action to set aside an assignment of property embracing real estate, is local. Acker v. Leland, 96 N. Y. 383.

A receiver's action to recover real and personal estate, must be brought in the county where the land lies. Thompson v. Heidenrich, 66 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 391.

An action involving the question whether a conveyance is in fraud of creditors, is not necessarily local within New York Code Civ. Proc., § 123, and need not be where the land lies. Rawles v. Carr, 17 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 96. So, also, an action to set aside a statutory foreclosure of a mortgage of real property, and to redeem the land from the mortgage. Hubbell v. Sibley, 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 403.

Under New York Code Civ. Proc., § 982, a suit to compel specific performance of a contract to exchange lands, is triable in the county where the defendant's land is situated. Kearr v. Bartlett, 47 Hun (N. Y.) 245.

In North Carolina, it has been held that a stockholders' suit against officers of a corporation, involving construction of its charter, should be brought in the state of its incorporation, although a suit praying an injunction, etc., may be brought in another state where it has property. Moore v. Silver Valley Min. Co., 104 N. Car. 534.

In Oregon, under the general equity powers of the court, a chattel mortgage may be foreclosed in any county where service may be had upon the defendant. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Davidson, 18 Oregon 57.

In Pennsylvania, ancillary proceedings by bill in equity, execution, or otherwise, must come in whichever court of common pleas took jurisdiction of the original proceeding. Bryan v. Dailey, 14 Phila. (Pa.) 90. Otherwise, as to ejectment by a purchaser at a sheriff's sale. Letchford v. Dewees, 14 Phila. (Pa.) 108.

An action to establish a resulting trust, and thereupon obtain partition, lies in the county where the land is situated; the Pennsylvania Act of 1836, as to the court's control of the trustee, does not apply. Hayes' Appeal, 123 Pa. St. 110.

In South Carolina, in an action to foreclose a mortgage brought in the county where part of the property is situated, and in which one of the defendants resides, the court may render judgment for deficiency against a debtor residing and served in another county. Wagener v. Swygert, 30 S. Car. 296.

Under South Carolina Code, § 146, an action for an accounting and to set aside a judgment and a sale thereunder, lies in the county of the defendant's residence. Bell v. Fludd, 28 S. Car. 313.

A suit to subject devised land to pay the devisor's debts, and to vacate the devisee's deeds, being one to recover an interest in real estate, within South Carolina Gen. Stat. 1882, § 1983, must be brought in the county where the lands are located. Bacot v. Lowndes, 24 S. Car. 392.

In Tennessee, a county may, in its own chancery court, maintain a bill to have declared void an act annexing certain of its territory to another county, in contravention of the Tennessee Const., art. 10, § 4. Union County v. Knox County, 90 Tenn. 541.

Under the Tennessee Code, § 4311, requiring a bill against a non-resident to be in the chancery district in which the cause of action arose, a suit by one partner against the other is properly brought where the firm's business was conducted, although its object is to impound a judgment in the latter's favor in another county. Wells v. Collins, 11 Lea (Tenn.) 213.

A bill to reach trust funds invested in land need not be brought in the county where the land lies. Whittaker v. Wittaker, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 93.

In Texas, a suit to remove an executor and restrain waste lies in the county where the will was probated, though other than that of his residence. Bondies v. Buford, 58 Tex. 266.

As to what is a suit for specific performance of a land contract within the venue statute, see Cavin v. Hill, 83 Tex. 73.

A suit, by an equitable owner for partition of land, lies where it is situated, although other relief is sought which, if alone, would require suit in the county of the defendant's domicile. Coryell v. Linthecum (Tex. 1889), 11 S. W. Rep. 1092.

Under the Virginia Code, requiring a suit for an injunction to be brought where the alleged condemnation of the right of way is threatened to be done, an entry on land can be enjoined only in the county wherein it lies. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Cable Co., 88 Va. 932.

In West Virginia, a grantor's action to have the deed declared a mortgage, may be brought where the grantee resides, though the land lies in another county. Lawrence v. Du Bois, 16 W. Va. 443.

Under the West Virginia Code 1887, ch. 123, a suit to enjoin interference with railroad ties, may be brought in the county where part of them are found, if the defendant was served therein, though he resides in another county, and the contract on which the plaintiff bases title was made there. Toledo Tie, etc., Co. v. Thomas, 33 W. Va. 566.

1. In Alabama, a will must be proved. First, when the testator, at the time of his death, was an inhabitant of the county, in the probate court of such county. Second, when the testator, not being an inhabitant of the state, dies in the county, leaving assets therein, in the probate court of such county. Third, when the testator, not being an inhabitant of the state, dies out of the county, leaving assets therein, in the probate court of the county in which such assets or any part thereof are. Fourth, when the testator, not being an inhabitant of the state, dies, not leaving assets therein, and assets thereafter come into any county, in the probate court of any county into which such assets are brought. Alabama Code 1886, § 1976.

A will contest must come "in the district in which such will was probated, or in the district in which a material defendant resides." Alabama Code 1886, § 2000.

Executors or administrators are liable to be sued in their representative characters, in all cases, in the county in which letters were granted; and service of summons may be made on them in any county in the state. Alabama Code 1886, § 2262.

In Arkansas, "an action to establish or set aside a will must be brought in the county in which the will, if valid, ought, according to law, to be recorded." Arkansas Dig. Stat. 1884, § 4996.

In South Carolina, the court of common pleas of Abbeville county cannot render judgment against an administrator, resident in Greenville county, of an intestate also a resident there, for an account of his administration of an estate of which he had been appointed receiver in Abbeville county, where the estate was located. Ware v. Henderson, 25 S. Car. 385.

In Kentucky, a guardian's action for partition sale of land lying in two counties, may be brought in the one where the ward's ancestor died. Phalan v. Louisville Safety Vault, etc., Co., 88 Ky. 24.

V. JUDICIAL COGNIZANCE OF BOUNDARIES—(See also JUDICIAL NOTICE, vol. 12, p. 169).—Whether a particular place is within the boundaries of a state or county or other political district, is not a question of law for the court, but a matter of fact for the jury to determine.¹

State legislation or agreement cannot restrict federal jurisdiction; but it may give definiteness to some questions which Congress has necessarily left undetermined.²

A court created within and for a particular territory, is bounded in the exercise of its power by the limits thereof, unless there be some special legislative authorization to the contrary.³

A federal court is the supreme judicial tribunal to determine its jurisdiction as against a state court.⁴

The Supreme Court of the United States has original jurisdiction, under the constitution, of controversies between states concerning their boundaries.⁵

The Indian nations are distinct, independent political communities.⁶

1. In U. S. v. Jackalow, 1 Black (U. S.) 484, 487 which was a case of piracy occurring on a vessel five miles east of Lyons' Point, the boundary between New York and Connecticut, the court, by Nelson, J., said: "The description of a boundary must be a matter of construction which belongs to the court; but the application of the evidence in the ascertainment of it, as thus described and interpreted, with a view to its location and settlement, belongs to the jury. Courts take notice of the territorial extent of the jurisdiction and sovereignty, exercised de facto, by their own government, and of the local divisions of their country, as into states, . . . so far as political government is concerned, . . . but not of their precise boundaries, further than they may be described in public statutes." 1 Greenl. Ev. (14th ed.), § 6.

2. Courts take notice of government surveys. Gardner v. Eberhart, 82 Ill. 316. E. g., as to the Hudson river boundary between New York and New Jersey. Hall v. Devoe Mfg. Co., 14 Fed. Rep. 183. Under U. S. Act 1789, making the New Jersey judicial district, "consist of the State of New Jersey," the boundaries of the district and the territorial jurisdiction of the federal courts coincide with the boundaries of the state, and vary with their change by the New York and New Jersey compact of 1833. In re Devoe Mfg. Co., 108 U. S. 401. See People v. Central R. Co., of N. J., 42 N. Y.

3. Ex p. Graham, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 456; Picquet v. Swan, 5 Mason (U. S.) 35.

In Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 300, 337, where the plaintiff was domiciled in Pennsylvania, and the defendant in Massachusetts, but long resident at Gibraltar, and the attached goods were found in Pennsylvania, and where it was not necessary to decide the question of the jurisdiction of the United States courts in foreign attachments, the court, by Taney, C. J., remarked that the circuit court decisions thereon had not been uniform, and that upon this point, "the construction of the act of 1789 is not free from difficulty."

Where an essential portion of the defendants resided in Alabama, and would not voluntarily appear, a bill in equity in Mississippi, praying interpleader, etc., was held to be properly dismissed. Herndon v. Ridgway, 17 How. (U. S.) 424. See also Jobbins v. Montague, 6 Nat. Bank Reg. 117, proceedings under the bankrupt act.

What is to be "deemed" Indian country, within the act of 1834, remains such

In general, the venue must be proven, even though the judge and jury personally know the locus in quo to be within the jurisdiction.¹

The Judiciary Acts of 1887 and 1888, giving the federal courts "original cognizance, concurrent with the state courts," of certain civil suits, require that "no civil suit shall be brought before either of the said courts, against any person, or by any original process or proceeding, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant; but where the jurisdiction is founded only on the fact that the action is between citizens of the different states, suits shall be brought only in the district of the residence of either the plaintiff or the defendant."²

The conviction cannot stand if the transcript fails to show that the venue was proved. Terry v. State, 22 Tex. App. 679; McDevro v. State, 23 Tex. App. 429.

The court will not take judicial notice of the location of a town in order to prove the venue. State v. First Nat. Bank (S. Dak. 1892), 51 N. W. Rep. 780.

The court may know by the name of a plaintiff that it is an incorporation and extraterritorial. Commercial Bank v. Newport Mfg. Co., 1 B. Mon. (Ky.) 13; 35 Am. Dec. 171.

The court will take judicial notice of the county in which an incorporated town is situated. State v. Reader, 60 Iowa 527.

A foreign corporation, organized expressly to own and operate a mine in Oregon, and having there officers and an agent working the mine, is an "inhabitant," within the act of 1888. Miller v. Eastern Oregon Gold Min. Co., 45 Fed. Rep. 345.

A Texas railway corporation, whose principal office was in the eastern district of Texas, was held to be an "inhabitant" of the western district where-in its road extended, and where it had an agent and office for transaction of its ordinary business. Zambrino v. Galveston, etc., R. Co., 38 Fed. Rep. 449. And, in this connection, see also the cases of Riddle v. New York, etc., R. Co., 39 Fed. Rep. 290; Holmes v. Oregon, etc., R. Co., 6 Sawy. (U. S.) 262, 277; Hohorst v. Hamburg American Packet Co., 38 Fed. Rep. 273.

3. See CHANGE OF VENUE, vol. 3, p. 90.

4. In California, where a suit against A and B, residents of different counties, was brought in A's county, and had been dismissed as to A, it was held that B was not entitled, within the California Code, § 395, to a change to his own county. Remington Sewing Mach. Co. v. Cole, 62 Cal. 311.

The California constitution confers no power to transfer an appeal from a justice's court, to another county where-of the defendant is a resident. Gross v. San Francisco Super Ct., 71 Cal. 382.

After a transfer of the cause, at the defendant's request, from a justice of the peace to a superior court, as involving the legality of a tax, it cannot be transferred to another county for trial. Powell v. Sutro, 80 Cal. 559.

Under the California Const., art. 12, § 16, governing the venue of suits against corporations, a railway company whose principal place of business is in San Francisco, when sued in another county outside the state, for the breach of a contract made in San Francisco, is entitled to a change to San Francisco county. Cohn v. Central Pac. R. Co., 71 Cal. 488.

A judgment cannot be impeached by the fact that the county to which the cause was transferred was not the nearest one. Gage v. Downey, 79 Cal. 149.

The right, under the Colorado Civil Code, § 25, to a change to the county where some part of the land is situate, is absolute, and the court has no jurisdiction to proceed. Smith v. People, 2 Colo. App. 99.

The Illinois Statute of 1887, giving three judges to a circuit, obviates the necessity of changing the venue to another county, on account of the alleged prejudice of one of the judges; the practice is to call in another judge of the same circuit to try the cause. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Perkins, 26 Ill. App. 67.

In Indiana, the cause may be sent to a county, although it is named in the affidavit as one of several in which existed a prejudice against the defendant. Michigan Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Naugle, 130 Ind. 79.

In Kansas, a defendant who, on the ground of impossibility of getting a fair trial, has applied for a change to another county in the same judicial district, still retains his constitutional right to object to a change to a county in another district. State v. Knapp, 40 Kan. 148.

In Kentucky, a change will not be made to a county other than the one adjoining, merely because the parties cannot agree on the one adjoining. Miller v. Cabell, 81 Ky. 178.

Under the Michigan statute, the cause may, for disqualification of the judge, be removed to the county where an attorney of record resides, though he was not such at the time of disqualification. Stimson v. Michigan Shingle Co., 71 Mich. 374.

As to the discretion of the court in the selection of the county, see Bolles v. Sault Savings Bank Loan, etc., Co., 86 Mich. 229.

The determination of the first magistrate as to who was "the nearest magistrate," within the Wisconsin Rev. Stat., § 4809, as to the change in a criminal case, is conclusive. Martin v. State, 79 Wis. 165.

In Missouri, as to the discretion of the court in the selection of the county, see State v. O'Bryan, 102 Mo. 254.

In granting the change, a county in the same circuit may be preferred to the requested one in another circuit, although prejudice is alleged as to the former. State v. Higgerson, 110 Mo. 213.

The provision of the New York Laws of 1888, ch. 577, § 3, that "suits for violation of the game laws shall be prosecuted to determination in the county where they shall be commenced, unless, for good cause appearing, a discontinuance shall be directed by the chief game and fish protector," does not prevent the supreme court from changing the place of trial from the adjoining county to the county where the alleged offense occurred, when the convenience of witnesses or the ends of justice demand it. People v. Coughtry, 58 Hun (N. Y.) 245; People v. Rouse, 15 N. Y. Supp. 414; 61 Hun (N. Y.) 618.

In North Carolina, a motion for removal of a suit against a sheriff and parties who executed in his favor a bond of indemnity, to a county where, under the North Carolina Code, § 191, the sheriff alone could be sued, is properly refused after entry of a nolle prosequi, as to him. Harvey v. Rich, 98 N. Car. 95.

In an action to dissolve a firm, and foreclose mortgages on its real estate, it is error to refuse a change to the county wherein the land lies. Falls of Neuse Mfg. Co. v. Brower, 105 N. Car. 440.

The Texas Act of 1874, requiring the change to be to some adjoining county, the court-house of which is "nearest" that of the county in which the suit is pending, means the one the most convenient of access, though not nearest in actual distance; and the court may determine which is nearest by the usual traveled route. Shaw v. Cade, 54 Tex. 307. Compare Boyett v. State, 26 Tex. App. 689.

A change of boundary of an adjacent county was held not to be the "making of a new county," within the provision of the Texas Rev. Stat. 1274, for change of venue. Dodson v. Bunton, 81 Tex. 655.

In Wisconsin, upon one's indictment for murder in Pepin county, and change to Dunn county, without her consent, her motion for a change to La Crosse county, for prejudice of the judge, was held to be no waiver of her right to be tried in Pepin. Wheeler v. State, 24 Wis. 52.

In an application under the Wisconsin statute for a change on the ground of prejudice of the judge, an averment of prejudice of another judge is

In Arkansas, having proceeded to trial in the first court after an order for a change, raises a presumption that the fees were not paid, and that the court retained jurisdiction. Duncan v. Tufts, 52 Ark. 404.

In California, omission to pay the costs is ground for vacating the order for removal, notwithstanding a subsequent tender thereof. Estep v. Armstrong, 69 Cal. 536.

A pending motion for a new trial is, within the California Code, § 398, an "action or proceeding" transferable for disqualification of the judge. Finn v. Spagnoli, 67 Cal. 330.

In an action to try title to land, but not brought in the county wherein the land lies, the defendant's remedy is a motion to dismiss. Fritts v. Camp, 94 Cal. 393.

An ambiguity in a complaint, as between two causes of action, must be resolved against the pleader, in determining the defendant's right to the change. Ah Fong v. Sternes, 79 Cal. 30.

In Colorado, it is not the duty of the court, of its own motion, to change the place of trial of an action brought in the wrong county. Fletcher v. Stowell, 17 Colo. 94.

In Florida, unless the record shows some statutory ground for the change, the second court acquires no jurisdiction. The fact that a kinsman of the judge, not a party to the suit, is interested in property involved therein, is no such ground. Williams v. Robles, 22 Fla. 95.

In Illinois, a proceeding to reduce the alimony allowed in a divorce suit, is a "suit or proceeding in law or equity," wherein the change may be had. McPike v. McPike, 10 Ill. App. 332.

In Indiana, a proceeding supplementary to execution is a "civil action," within the statute governing change of venue. Burkett v. Holman, 104 Ind. 6; 119 Ind. 141. So, also, is a divorce proceeding. Powell v. Powell, 104 Ind. 18; Evans v. Evans, 105 Ind. 204.

A party is entitled to only one change of venue from the county. Failure to perfect the change is no waiver; the opposite party may pay the costs, and cause it to be perfected. An affidavit that the same causes are operating against the party in a certain other county, merely goes to aid the discretion of the court. Michigan Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Naugle, 130 Ind. 79.

A proceeding before a justice, to obtain surety of the peace, is one wherein a change must be granted on affidavit of prejudice, or the subsequent proceedings will be void. Smelzer v. Lockhart, 97 Ind. 315.

In Iowa, even with the parties' consent, an action cannot be transferred from a justice of the peace to the district court, before final judgment. Evans v. Phelps, 77 Iowa 526.

A stipulation not to demand a change will not bind the plaintiff, after additional parties have been brought in; the Iowa statute allowing a change for undue influence of a party, or of his attorney. Bixby v. Carskaddon, 63 Iowa 164.

The prohibition in Iowa Code, § 2591, of a second change for a cause existing at the time of the first, applies whether it was granted for the prejudice of the judge, or of that of the inhabitants. Weare v. Williams, 69 Iowa 252.

Although a change of venue could not have been had of an appealed suit—e. g., one for rent—yet if it be by consent, consolidated with one originally brought in the appellate court, admitting of a change—e. g., one for injuries to the building—this may properly be granted. Browne v. Hickie, 68 Iowa 330.

The remedy under the Iowa Code, §§ 2586, 2589, of a non-resident defendant, is for removal to the county in which he was found; not for a dismissal. Marquardt v. Thompson, 78 Iowa 158.

In Kansas, when an action is commenced before a justice, and the defendant obtains a change of venue to another justice, this will not prevent the plaintiff from obtaining still another change, if he has sufficient grounds therefor. Herbert v. Beathard, 26 Kan. 746.

In Kentucky, the defendant's appearing, etc., was held to be a waiver of his right to object to a change, or to an action to subject land to a judgment recovered in another county. Norton v. Marksberry (Ky. 1887), 5 S. W. Rep. 482.

The provision in Maryland Pub. Gen. L., art. 23, § 261, that the petition for forfeiture of a franchise shall be filed in the circuit court of the county where the corporation had its origin, or has its principal office, imports that the proceeding is not, within the Maryland Const., art. 4, § 8, a suit or action at law wherein a changed venue can be taken. Bel Air Social, etc., Club v. State, 74 Md. 297.

In Michigan, a special proceeding for which the statute designates the court, is not transferable to another court. Scott v. Speed, 58 Mich. 311.

A stipulation as to the taking of proofs, and the docketing for a hearing without further notice, was held not to be a waiver of right to move a change for disqualification of the judge. Pack County v. Simpson, 74 Mich. 28.

A creditor's petition, upon an assignment for the benefit of creditors, that, on the ground of defects, the assignee be required to file a new assignment, inventory, and appraisal, is a "civil proceeding," removable to another circuit court by reason of the judge's interest as a stockholder. Kitttridge v. Washtenaw, 80 Mich. 200.

In Missouri, in the absence of fraud, the fact that the change was made without the statutory verification of the petition, will not avoid the judgment. Stearns v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co., 94 Mo. 317.

The change cannot lie from a probate court. Morris v. Lane, 44 Mo. App. 1. As to the change from one circuit court to another, see Catron v. La Fayette County, 106 Mo. 659.

Under Nebraska Crim. Code, § 445, the change can be ordered only by the court of the county where the offense was committed. Gaudy v. State, 27 Neb. 707.

In Nevada, there can be no change of venue of an action for collection of delinquent taxes on real estate. State v. Shaw, 21 Nev. 222.

In New Jersey, in transitory actions, the court will not change the venue on the ground of inconvenience, upon any nice balancing of circumstances of mere accommodation to the parties; over these the legal right of the plaintiff must prevail. Demarest v. Hurd, 46 N. J. L. 471.

In New York, a defendant's stipulation that issues should stand joined as of the date of a prior order extending the time for answering, was held to preclude from a change of venue. Nash v. Silver Lake Ice Co. (Supreme Ct.), 6 N. Y. Supp. 913.

The New York Code, § 3216, and the consolidation act, New York Laws, 1882, ch. 410, regulating the removal of causes to the common pleas court, do not apply to summary proceedings to recover possession of land. Drummond v. Fisher (C. Pl.), 16 N. Y. Supp. 867.

As to the practice in filing the undertaking, see Scherer v. Hopkins (C. Pl.), 16 N. Y. Supp. 863.

The obtaining the order of interpleader, without making plea to the jurisdiction, was held to raise no presumption of waiver of right to change of venue of an action brought in a county where neither party resided. Baer v. Kempner (C. Pl.), 3 N. Y. Supp. 529.

In an action for breach of warranty of horses, a refusal of the defendant's motion for a change to the county of the sale, where a majority of the material witnesses were, was held to be error, although conditioned with the exaction of a stipulation for their examination before a referee. Belding v. Ladd (Supreme Ct.), 7 N. Y. Supp. 379.

The fact that part of the property, the assignment whereof the suit seeks to set aside, is real estate in another county, is ground for a change of venue. Moss v. Gilbert, 18 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 202.

In an action to set aside a general assignment covering real estate, the defendant's right to a change cannot be defeated by the plaintiff's offer to stipulate not to attempt to reach the real estate. Wyatt v. Brooks, 42 Hun (N. Y.) 502.

In a suit for specific performance of a contract to exchange lands, the defendant whose land lay in a county other than that wherein the plaintiff's land lay, was held entitled to a change to his own county. Kearr v. Bartlett, 47 Hun (N. Y.) 245.

Under the New York Code, § 3216, requiring the application for change of venue to be made before adjournment, an adjournment, after opening of default

b. DISQUALIFICATION OF THE JUDGE.—A change of venue may be founded upon the bias or prejudice of the judge, or on his pecuniary interest, or on the fact that he has been of counsel for one of the parties.¹

and payment of the plaintiff's claim on stipulation, was held to be a waiver of the defendant's right to removal. Krahner v. Heilman (C. Pl.), 9 N. Y. Supp. 633.

In Pennsylvania, mandamus is a "civil cause in law or equity," within the Pennsylvania Act of 1875, providing for the change. Williamsport v. Com., 90 Pa. St. 498.

In Texas, the change will not be granted in a misdemeanor case without express statutory authorization. Hallsell v. State, 29 Tex. App. 22.

In Utah, if the complaint shows the suit to have been instituted in the wrong judicial district, the plaintiff must, within ten days, pay the costs of the change consequently made. Utah Laws 1890, p. 73.

Under the Virginia Statute of 1878, p. 339, the accused may, "upon his arraignment in the county court, demand to be tried in the circuit court." One upon being arraigned for burglary, made a motion for a continuance for material witnesses, which the court refused to consider until after the arraignment. He excepted, and elected to be tried in the circuit court. It was held that such compulsion of alternatives deprived him of his right of free election of forum. Anderson v. Com., 84 Va. 77.

In Wisconsin, the statutory rule vacating an order for a change, if the papers are not filed within twenty days, does not apply to the case of the clerk's refusal to file because of non-payment of his fees. Mantz v. Werner, 64 Wis. 408.

On paying the costs required by the Wisconsin Stat. 1887, ch. 306, § 1, and filing the affidavit of prejudice of the judge, the right to the change is absolute. Bantley v. Stowell, 82 Wis. 244.

1. See CHANGE OF VENUE, vol. 3, p. 93; JUDGE, vol. 12, p. 2.

In California, where a superior court judge, disqualified to try the cause, "called in" another judge to try it, it was held that the parties were not entitled to have it "transferred," within the California Code Civ. Proc., § 398. Upton v. Upton, 94 Cal. 26.

Bias of the judge against the defendant corporation and its president is no statutory disqualification justifying the change. Bulwer Consolidated Min. Co. v. Standard Consolidated Min. Co., 83 Cal. 613.

A judge may order a change for his having been under a general retainer from one of the parties; he has been an "attorney" at least within the spirit of the statute. Kern Valley Water Co. v. McCord, 70 Cal. 646.

In Colorado, the facts that the judge had formerly represented the people in a criminal prosecution of the defendant, and been the plaintiff's counsel in a suit against him, were held to be no ground for the change. Karcher v. Pearce, 14 Colo. 557.

In an action involving a mining lease, it was held to be no ground for disturbing the judge's refusal of the change, asked on his alleged disqualification, from his brother's part ownership of the mine the brother's interest not being covered by the lease nor in any wise affected thereby; he believing he would not be influenced by this fact, nor by the fact that his brother was an attorney for one of the parties, nor by the fact that he himself had been an unsuccessful bidder. Patrick v. Crowe, 15 Colo. 543.

In Florida, in an action to set aside a judgment, the fact that the judge's brother-in-law was a purchaser of property sold therein, was held to be no disqualification of the judge by reason of interest, consanguinity, or affinity, his kinsman not being a party to the suit. Williams v. Robles, 22 Fla. 95.

In Illinois, the fact that the county judge before appointment had, as attorney for the heirs, resisted the allowance of the widow's award, was held to necessitate transmission to the circuit court, not of the whole administration, but only the proceeding relating to such award; nor could he call in the judge of another county court. Graham v. People, 111 Ill. 253.

If any one of the three judges is present and not disqualified to give a fair trial, a change asked on account of the prejudice of the two others, may be refused. Chicago v. Perkins, 125 Ill. 127.

An application on the ground of bias

c. CONVENIENCE OF WITNESSES.—In civil cases the convenience of witnesses may be considered on the question of a change of the judge, if conformable to the statute, cannot be defeated by counter affidavits. Cantwell v. People, 138 Ill. 602.

In Indiana, although the result of a corrupt refusal of the change be fine and imprisonment of the applicant, the magistrate is not liable to him civilly therefor. State v. Wolever, 127 Ind. 306.

In Iowa, in determining whether a cause for change was in existence within the Iowa Code, § 2591, the courts will take judicial notice of who are the judges, and what their terms of office. Upton v. Paxton, 72 Iowa 295.

The amendment Iowa Laws 1884, ch. 94, granting discretion to the judge in case of alleged prejudice, does not affect a vested right; it supersedes the old rule of practice. Eikenberry v. Edwards, 71 Iowa 82.

An affidavit stating that the plaintiff was informed and believed the judge had said that the alleged cause of action was a "damned fraud," but not setting forth any source of the information, was held not to show such ground of change that the refusal should be deemed an abuse of discretion. Garrett v. Bicklin, 78 Iowa 115.

In Kansas, a judge may order the change because he knows he is to be a material witness for the applicant. Gray v. Crockett, 35 Kan. 686.

If the judge has been of counsel, and the issues have not been made up, the party may, up to the time of the judgment, demand a change, have the issues made up, and get a trial thereon. Sumner County v. Wellington Tp., 39 Kan. 137.

The fact that on a former trial of the cause, the presiding judge has been a material witness, is a ground for the change. Burlington Ins. Co. v. McLeod, 40 Kan. 54.

In Kentucky, an affidavit that the judge will not afford an impartial trial, must state the facts on which the belief is founded. Vance v. Field, 89 Ky. 178.

Michigan Annot. Stat., § 6495, allowing the change when the judge "has been consulted or employed as counsel," applies where the judge, before appointment, has given advice about compromising the case although refusing to meddle because other counsel had been employed. Curtis v. Wilcox, 74 Mich. 69.

In Missouri, the change for disqualification of the judge should not be granted until the "reasonable opportunity" has been given the parties to select a special judge, as provided in the Missouri Rev. Stat. 1889, § 2262. State v. Bacon, 107 Mo. 627. Compare State v. Thomas, 32 Mo. App. 159.

In the absence of express statutory provision, a second change for prejudice of the judge will not be granted. State v. Anderson, 96 Mo. 241.

The general provision of the Missouri Rev. Stat., § 1878, applies both to a regular, and to a special judge. State v. Shipman, 93 Mo. 147.

Under the Montana Code, § 62, pl. 4, requiring no change where another judge will appear, etc., a mandate will not issue against the alleged disqualified judge, who has announced the day and hour when another judge will attend to hear the motion. Granite Mountain Min. Co. v. Durfee, 11 Mont. 222.

In North Carolina, when the presiding judge remarked, in a private conversation, after hearing the testimony of a witness, who was thereafter indicted for perjury committed in giving that testimony, that the witness was "a grand scoundrel," this was held to be no evidence of such prejudice as would disqualify him from presiding at the trial for perjury. State v. Johnson, 104 N. Car. 780. Compare a case of the judge's criticism of the jury on a former trial, State v. Reno, 41 Kan. 674.

In Ohio, under section 550 of the Rev. Stat., the interest of the judge, to be a valid ground of change of the venue must be a pecuniary one in the result. State v. Winget, 37 Ohio St. 153.

As to when, in a case under the above section, the facts averred in the affidavit cannot be inquired into, see State v. Shaw, 43 Ohio St. 324.

In Wisconsin, as to the immateriality of an averment that other judges are prejudiced, see McCrary's Will, 71 Wis. 83.

An averment in the words of the Wisconsin Stat., § 4809, that "from prejudice or other cause" the justice will not decide impartially, is insufficient, if neither the prejudice nor the cause be specified. Billings v. Noble, 75 Wis. 325.

Upon the death of the judge, the cause may be tried by his successor in the absence of an affidavit that he is prejudiced. Winn v. State, 82 Wis. 571.

of venue.¹ But in criminal cases, in the absence of statute, the place of trial may not be changed merely for the convenience of the witnesses.²

d. IMPOSSIBILITY OF AN IMPARTIAL TRIAL.—Local prejudice so intense as to render an impartial trial impossible is ground for a change of venue.³

In Indiana, as to the discretion of the court concerning the relative importance of the convenience of witnesses, see Ringgenberg v. Hartman, 102 Ind. 537.

In New York, as to the discretion of the court concerning the relative importance of the convenience of witnesses, see Dexter v. Alfred (Supreme Ct.), 12 N. Y. Supp. 365; Hooker v. Sandford (Supreme Ct.), 12 N. Y. Supp. 890; Trope v. Saratoga Assoc. (Supreme Ct.), 12 N. Y. Supp. 518; Sawyer v. Clark (Supreme Ct.), 14 N. Y. Supp. 252; In re J. F. Pease Furnace Co. (Supreme Ct.), 13 N. Y. Supp. 654.

In an action for personal injuries, a change for the convenience of six witnesses was held to be properly denied, where the retention was more convenient for the plaintiff, her husband, two physicians and four other witnesses. Fowler v. Third Ave. R. Co. (Supreme Ct.), 8 N. Y. Supp. 762. Compare the change in the suit for damages from fraud in repairing the state capitol. People v. Snaith (Supreme Ct.), 8 N. Y. Supp. 668.

Where neither party to a divorce suit is a resident of the county, a motion to change to that of the defendant's residence, must prevail against the plaintiff's counter motion to retain the venue for convenience of witnesses. Stimson v. Stimson (Supreme Ct.), 9 N. Y. Supp. 238.

In a civil suit for assault and false imprisonment, the discretion of the trial court as to what place is most favorable to the convenience of the witnesses will not be disturbed, if not clearly shown to have been improvidently exercised. Thompson v. Narwood (Supreme Ct.), 19 N. Y. Supp. 632.

The fact that the contract sued on was made in another county, will not prevent an adaptation of the place to the convenience of the most of the witnesses. Perry v. Boomhower (Supreme Ct.), 18 N. Y. Supp. 937; nor the fact that the defendants and some of their witnesses reside in another county. Daley v. Hellman (Supreme Ct.), 17 N. Y. Supp. 946. Compare Brower v. Husted (Supreme Ct.), 17 N. Y. Supp. 707.

In an action for libel, a change for convenience of witnesses was granted where the plaintiff's claim to residence in the original county was supported only by his own conclusions, and not by facts. Dunn v. Lewis (Supreme Ct.), 19 N. Y. Supp. 755.

Application for a change of venue for the convenience of the defendant's witnesses will not be refused merely because the plaintiff's witnesses residing out of the state, will be inconvenienced by the change. Bowles v. Rome, etc., R. Co., 38 Hun (N. Y.) 507.

Affidavits showing with reasonable certainty that the change will be for the convenience of a majority of the witnesses, are sufficient. Lyon v. Davis (Supreme Ct.), 7 N. Y. Supp. 564. See also Tuthill v. Felter (Supreme Ct.), 6 N. Y. Supp. 173; Banks v. Bensky (Supreme Ct.), 7 N. Y. Supp. 518; Clanton v. Ruffner, 78 Cal. 268.

The affidavit need not state how the affiant knows that the witnesses will testify as therein averred. Myers v. Lansingburgh, 54 Hun (N. Y.) 623.

2. People v. Harris, 4 Denio (N. Y.) 150.

3. See CHANGE OF VENUE, vol. 3, p. 96; CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, vol. 4, p. 818. A few later decisions may here be noted.

The fact that, owing to newspaper denunciation of the accused, there may be difficulty in impaneling a jury, is not ipso facto a sufficient ground for a change of venue. Muscoe v. Com., 87 Va. 460; Edwards v. State, 2 Wash. 291; Hickam v. People, 137 Ill. 75.

In Alabama, the trial of a negro for killing a popular deputy sheriff came on two and one half months after the homicide. The affidavits showed that the militia had been called out to protect the prisoner from lynching; also, that some of the jurors summoned had threatened to "make short work of the murderer." It was held that the change ought to be granted, although counter-affidavits gave opinions that he could have a fair trial. Seams v. State, 84 Ala. 410.

Where affidavits of the defendant and seven witnesses, that the proceedings were infected by excitement and prejudice, were rebutted by those of sixty-five witnesses, it was held not error to overrule the application for a change without examinations ore tenus. Hawes v. State, 88 Ala. 37.

Where two witnesses testified that people generally believed the defendant guilty, and he testified that a mob had been formed to hang him, but the arresting officer testified that he never heard of any such mob, the refusal of the change was approved. Rains v. State, 88 Ala. 91.

The provision of Arkansas Dig. Stat., 1884, that a criminal cause shall be removed to another county, if it appears that from prejudice of the inhabitants an impartial trial cannot be had within the county, applies to Yell county; Arkansas Act of 1875, allowing a change from one district to another therein, does not control, if the prejudice is averred to extend to the inhabitants of the county. Wells v. State, 53 Ark. 211.

In California, on counter-affidavits showing that the excitement following the crime had subsided three weeks before the application, a refusal of the change was held not to be an abuse of discretion. People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328.

In Colorado, on a prosecution for murder, counter-affidavits showed that, although a prejudice existed in one part of the county, an impartial jury could be obtained from another portion thereof, and that one newspaper had published a guarded account of the homicide, asking a suspension of the popular judgment until the testimony be heard. The court held that the change was not improperly refused. Power v. People, 17 Colo. 178.

In Illinois, the fact that at the county seat where a homicide had been committed, the local prejudice was so strong that the sheriff was obliged to remove the defendant to another county for safe keeping, was held not to be conclusive of impossibility of obtaining a fair trial, the counter-affidavits showing that an impartial jury could be obtained from other parts of the county. Price v. People, 131 Ill. 223.

In Indiana, in an action against a surety, the fact that the plaintiff had, just before the trial, traduced him in public places, and called attention to the absconding of the principal, was held insufficient ground for granting the change. Brow v. Levy, 3 Ind. App. 464.

The requirement in the Indiana Rev. Stat. 1881, § 412, of a change, where it is shown that the opposite party has an undue influence over the citizens of the county, is mandatory, and no counter showing is admissible. Rout v. Ninde, 118 Ind. 123.

In Iowa, an application for change of venue, after the setting aside of a conviction of murder, made on the ground that an unprejudiced trial could not be had, was supported by affidavits of the defendant and seven other persons, and by certain extracts from newspapers published at the time of the arrest. Forty-four counter-affidavits were filed. The court held that the refusal of a change was not an abuse of discretion. State v. Kennedy, 77 Iowa 208. But compare State v. Billings, 77 Iowa 417; State v. Stewart, 74 Iowa 336.

Where there were affidavits of the defendant and fifty residents of the county, as to excitement and prejudice against him, opposed by those of seventy-seven residents, the supreme court, in the absence of proof of abuse of discretion, affirmed the refusal of a change to another county. State v. Cadwell, 79 Iowa 473.

In a prosecution for libel in a political canvas, affidavits of forty-one persons alleging prejudice, were contradicted by affidavits of forty-four persons. The court held that the change was properly refused. State v. Conable, 81 Iowa 60.

Under Iowa Code, § 2590, allowing a change for undue local influence of an attorney, the fact that the defendant's attorney had received an unprecedented vote for a political office in the county, and had great influence, was held to sufficiently establish the plaintiff's affidavits and motion for the change. Deere v. Bagley, 80 Iowa 197. Compare State v. Woodward, 84 Iowa 172.

In Kansas, the fact that immediately after the homicide bitter threats had been made against the accused, and he was denounced in several newspaper articles, was held not to be ground for reversal for refusal of the change, there being affidavits of twenty-one citizens denying such general prejudice as would prevent a fair trial. State v. Rhea, 25 Kan. 576.

In Kentucky, on a trial for murder, it appeared that the militia had been called out to prevent mob violence, but the excitement had subsided at the time of the application for the change, and the majority of the witnesses believed that a fair trial could be had. The court held that the refusal was not a ground for reversal of conviction. Dilger v. Com., 88 Ky. 550.

In Louisiana, where prejudice, as shown by an attempt to lynch the defendant, was sworn to by six witnesses, but fifteen denied its existence at the time of the trial, it was held no abuse of discretion to refuse the change. State v. Dent, 41 La. Ann. 1082.

To entitle the accused to a change on the ground of public excitement, it must be such as will prevent an impartial verdict. State v. Ford, 37 La. Ann. 443.

In Missouri, prejudice in the judge's mind against a party's cause or defense, is not against his person, and is no ground for a change. Bent v. Lewis, 15 Mo. App. 40.

The restriction in Missouri Rev. Stat. 1879, §§ 18, 19, as to change of venue from the St. Louis criminal court, is repealed by section 1877, allowing a change on an affidavit that the judge will not afford a fair trial. State v. Hayes, 81 Mo. 574.

Where the evidence as to the existence of public excitement is conflicting, but no witness averred that he thought the defendant would not get a fair trial, it was held that the motion for change was properly overruled. State v. Brownfield, 83 Mo. 448.

In Nebraska, on a trial for rape, affidavits of leading citizens that there was intense excitement and prejudice against the prisoner, and threats of lynching, were held sufficient to entitle him to a change; and a judgment of conviction was reversed because of its refusal. Richmond v. State, 16 Neb. 388.

An application for change on the ground of prejudice of citizens, may give the reasons of the parties for refusing to make affidavit. Simmerman v. State, 16 Neb. 615.

In New Hampshire, a change should be granted in a civil action on un rebutted presumptive evidence that, with reasonable effort, a fair trial cannot be had in the first county. Hilliard v. Beattie, 58 N. H. 112.

In an action for damages from a railway accident, the fact that the most of the persons injured were residents of the county where it occurred, was held to be ground for a change therefrom, to secure an impartial trial. Stoddard v. Delaware, etc., Canal Co., 16 N. Y. Supp. 621; 62 Hun (N. Y.) 619.

In Oregon, where, after two trials, there was a conviction of murder in the first degree, which was set aside by the supreme court, and it appeared that the leading newspapers had fully reported the trial with declarations of guilt, and that the jury had been obtained only after three hundred names had been drawn, it was held that the change ought to be granted. State v. Olds, 19 Oregon 397.

In Texas, where the accused applies for a change on the ground of prejudice in the county, the state may examine witnesses as to the means of knowledge of the compurgators. Henning v. State, 24 Tex. App. 315.

A combination of influential citizens to suppress crime generally, was held not to be "a dangerous combination," within Texas Code Crim. Proc., art. 578, which specifies the grounds upon which a change of venue may be granted. The combination contemplated is one directed against the accused in the particular case. Cravey v. State, 23 Tex. App. 677.

In West Virginia, on one's indictment for murder, the facts that the sheriff had published a prejudicial letter, and that, ten months after the homicide, a mob of the county threatened to lynch the accused, were held sufficient ground for a change. State v. Greer, 22 W. Va. 800.

In Wisconsin, in an action for damages from fraudulent representations in the sale of a peculiar kind of oats, the plaintiff's motion for the change, on the ground that one defendant was very influential in the county, and that the farmers therein were much excited over the matter, was refused, there being numerous counter-affidavits. This was held to be no abuse of discretion. Ross v. Hanchett, 52 Wis. 491. Compare a case of prosecution of bank officers, wherein was alleged excitement of depositors, etc. Com. v. Balph, 111 Pa. St. 365; Com. v. Delamater, 145 Pa. St. 210. See also Perrin v. State, 81 Wis. 135.

The Wyoming statute requiring the change upon a party's affidavit that he believes that, owing to the prejudice of the people, an impartial trial cannot be had, is mandatory. Perkins v. McDowell, 3 Wyoming 203.

2. NON-RESIDENCE OF PARTIES.—The non-residence of the defendant is sometimes ground for a change of venue.¹

3. Who May Apply.—The question of who may apply for a change of venue has undergone treatment.² In the appended note are a few additional cases.³

In Wisconsin, in an action against a railway company for damage from communicated fire, it appeared that a large region had been burned over, and that fourteen similar cases were pending. An attorney made affidavit that a combination existed to wrongfully charge the fires to the negligence of the defendant, irrespective of justice. It was held that the change should have been granted. Cyra v. Stewart, 79 Wis. 72.

Political prominence of the accused is not, within New York Crim. Code, § 344, "good cause" for the transfer of the case to the court of oyer and terminer; but novelty and importance of the questions involved is "good cause" therefor, especially if the prosecuting officer declares them to have been already decided in the instructions to the grand jury in the court of general sessions. So held, upon an indictment of railway officials for violation of the car-heating act. New York Laws, 1890, ch. 421; People v. Clark (Supreme Ct.), 15 N. Y. Supp. 79.

1. See CHANGE OF VENUE, vol. 3, p. 100. A few later decisions may here be noted. An action by an alien in a Colorado state court, against a New York corporation, is not transferable to the federal circuit court for the Colorado district. Harold v. Iron Silver Min. Co., 33 Fed. Rep. 529.

An action in a Colorado state court by a Colorado corporation, against a citizen of Minnesota and a citizen of Wisconsin, is transferable to the federal court for the Colorado district. Pitkin County Min. Co. v. Markell, 33 Fed. Rep. 386.

In California, where a corporation had manifested no interest in a suit to compel the specific performance of a share-holder's contract to transfer his share, he was held entitled to a change to the county of his domicile. Sayward v. Houghton, 82 Cal. 628.

In an action for breach of warranty of a machine, instituted in A county, where the contract was not made or to be performed, the defendant corporation was held to be entitled to a change to B county, where it had its principal place of business, although it also did business in A county. Byrum v. Stockton Combined Harvester, etc., Works, 91 Cal. 657.

In a suit to quiet title, it is no ground for the change, that neither the residence of the defendants nor the land is in the county where it was instituted. Pennie v. Visser, 94 Cal. 323.

In Michigan, the provision in the Michigan Annot. Stat., § 6499, for a change to the county whereof the party or his attorney of record is a resident, refers to a bona fide attorney of record, and not to one simulating substitution after the proceeding for removal was begun. Kelley v. Simpson, 79 Mich. 392.

The case cannot be sent to a county where no one of the parties or their attorneys resides. Simpson v. Kelley, 81 Mich. 116.

In Montana, as to the relative importance of the fact of the defendant's residence in the second county, see Wallace v. Owsley, 11 Mont. 219.

In New York, in an action by a woman residing in Orange county, against her husband living apart, in Kings county, under an agreement of separation, his application for a change of venue to his domicile was held to be properly refused. Lyon v. Lyon, 30 Hun (N. Y.) 455.

2. See CHANGE OF VENUE, vol. 3, p. 101.

3. In California, an involuntary intervener may demand a change, although the defendant did not. Howell v. Stetefeldt Furnace Co., 69 Cal. 153.

In Colorado, a disqualified judge cannot compel either party to proceed under the statute for a change. O'Connell v. Gavett, 7 Colo. 40.

In Illinois, the statutory requirement that all the defendants join in the application, does not import that a merely nominal defendant must be included. Hill v. Gruell, 42 Ill. App. 411.

In Indiana, an applicant to remove an administrator is not entitled to a change from the county nor from the judge. Bowen v. Stewart, 128 Ind. 507.

One who was joined and answered before, and filed a cross-complaint after the change, is not therefore entitled to a second change. Griffith v. Dickerman, 123 Ind. 247.

After a change on the application of one defendant, a change cannot be granted on another defendant's application. Willard v. Ames, 130 Ind. 351.

In Iowa, upon application by an officer of a corporation, his being such must be established otherwise than by mere averment in the affidavit. McGovern v. Keokuk Lumber Co., 61 Iowa 265.

The court cannot make the change on its own motion. Objection thereto is not waived by going to trial in the second court. Bennett v. Carey, 57 Iowa 221.

In Missouri, the application must proceed from a party appearing to have some vested interest in the subject-matter. Thus, in a proceeding for confirmation of an administrator's report, it was held that the widow could not apply. In re Whitson's Estate, 89 Mo. 58.

In New York, the plaintiff cannot change the amendment as of course. Under New York Code Civ. Proc., § 418, the summons, being the "mandate of the court," can, if irregular, only be corrected by motion. Wadsworth v. Georger, 18 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 202.

In Texas, the trial court may, on its own motion, change the venue of a criminal case. Woodson v. State, 24 Tex. App. 153.

1. See CHANGE OF VENUE, vol. 3, p. 102.

2. For the construction of the Arkansas statute prescribing the practice on the change, as to the time of the motion and transmission of the papers, see Hudley v. State, 36 Ark. 237; Haglin v. Rogers, 37 Ark. 491.

The requirement of the California Code Civ. Proc., § 396, that the motion be in writing, is not met by a merely written notice thereof. Pennie v. Vishner, 94 Cal. 323. An amended affidavit may relate back to the time of filing the original. Palmer v. Barclay, 92 Cal. 199.

In Colorado, the applicant's alleged ignorance, until recently, of the extent of the prejudice created by certain newspaper articles, was held not to bring the case within the exception in the Colorado Rev. Stat., § 634 (Annot.

Stat. 1891, § 4633), forbidding a change after the first term, "unless the cause shall have arisen subsequent to such term." Roberts v. People, 9 Colo. 458.

In Illinois, the application must be made at the earliest opportunity, and the state's attorney be notified. Haskins v. People, 14 Ill. App. 198.

The fact that the opposite party appears and resists the application, will not excuse a failure to give the statutory notice of the motion. Miller v. Pence, 132 Ill. 149.

In Indiana, the application may be made on the trial day, under a rule requiring the time to be "not later than the day fixed for the trial." Hoke v. Applegate, 88 Ind. 530.

The motion for the change is properly overruled, if no sufficient excuse be shown for its noncompliance with the rule of court as to the time thereof. Lott v. State, 122 Ind. 393.

As to when a lawyer's engagement upon a trial—he being the defendant—will not excuse his failure to apply seasonably for the change, see Bernhamer v. State, 123 Ind. 577.

When the defendant's motion for the change has been granted, but he neglects to pay the costs, the plaintiff may perfect the change by a seasonable payment thereof. Michigan Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Naugle, 130 Ind. 79.

For construction of the Iowa statute as to the time of the motion, and other matters of practice in the change, see Perkins v. Jones, 55 Iowa 211; Wint v. Berryhill, 55 Iowa 411; Parker v. Norris, 56 Iowa 295; Hall v. Royce, 56 Iowa 359; Allerton v. Eldridge, 56 Iowa 709; Omaha, etc., R. Co. v. O'Neill, 81 Iowa 463; Kelley v. Cosgrove, 83 Iowa 229.

An objection, that a foreclosure suit is brought in a county without the jurisdiction, may be made at any time; it is not waived by any alleged consent, and may properly be raised by demurrer. Orcutt v. Hanson, 70 Iowa 514.

The motion comes too late, if first made after issue joined. McNamara v. Eustis, 46 Minn. 311.

In Minnesota, extension of the time to answer does not extend the time to move for the change. Allen v. Coates, 29 Minn. 46.

In Missouri, the motion comes too late if first made when the cause is reached for trial, without previous notice to the opposite party. Summers v. Western Home Ins. Co., 45 Mo. App. 46.

5. The Affidavit.—The principles relating to the requirements of the affidavit have been treated already.¹ Additional cases will be found in the appended note.²

In New York, upon a new state of facts, the motion may, as a matter of right, be renewed after a prior refusal. Veeder v. Baker, 83 N. Y. 156. So after a change granted, two trials, and the death of one defendant, a case was retransferred. Abrahams v. Bensen, 22 Hun (N. Y.) 605.

As to the seasonableness, within the New York Code Civ. Proc., § 986, of a demand for change served with the amended answer, see Penniman v. Fuller, etc., Co., 62 Hun (N. Y.) 473; 133 N. Y. 442. As to when, within section 798, thirty days' notice is in apt time, see Lesser v. Williams (Supreme Ct.), 5 N. Y. Supp. 97.

In an action for slander, an application for a change, made before serving an answer, on the ground that a material witness could not attend in the first county, was held premature. Briasco v. Lawrence (Supreme Ct.), 4 N. Y. Supp. 94.

No notice to the defendant is required on the transfer of an indictment from the New York general sessions to the oyer and terminer. People v. Carollin, 115 N. Y. 658.

In North Carolina, the application may sometimes be admitted nunc pro tunc. Shaver v. Huntley, 107 N. Car. 623.

In South Carolina, the motion should be made before the cause is reached on the docket. Blakely v. Frazier, 11 S. Car. 122.

In Texas, a defendant going to trial before disposal of his plea to the jurisdiction, waives it. Watson v. Baker, 67 Tex. 48.

In Wisconsin, a motion based on the ground of prejudice of the judge, comes too late if first made after a reference and the report of the referee. Duffy v. Hickey, 68 Wis. 380. So, also, if first made after the trial was begun. Allis v. Meadow Spring Distilling Co., 67 Wis. 16.

In the Wisconsin Rev. Stat., § 2624, the words, "at the first term at which the action shall be noticed for trial," do not import necessity of an actual notice; nor that the motion must be made at the first term at which the action could be noticed for trial. Main v. McLaughlin, 58 Wis. 628.

The provision of the Wisconsin Rev. Stat., § 2625, that "the court shall change the place of trial of any action upon the application of any party thereto, who shall file his affidavit that he has good reason to believe, and does believe, that he cannot have a fair trial of such action on account of the prejudice of the judge, naming him," is absolute; and the right accrues upon such filing before the adjournment of the term, and opportunity for both parties to be heard upon the motion. Fatt v. Fatt, 78 Wis. 633.

1. See CHANGE OF VENUE, vol. 3, p. 104.

2. The Alabama constitutional requirement that the accused "be confronted by the witnesses against him," refers to the trial proper, and not to the preliminary motion for change of venue. The objection that counter affiants are not cross-examined, goes to the sufficiency of the evidence, and not to its competency. Hussey v. State, 87 Ala. 121.

In California, it is held that an averment that the principal place of business of a corporation is in S., imports its "residence" in S., within the California Code Civ. Proc., § 395. Cohn v. Central Pac. R. Co., 71 Cal. 488.

In Colorado, application for change, on the ground of prejudice of the inhabitants, "shall be supported by the affidavits of at least three reputable citizens of the county, and not of kin to the defendant." Colorado Annot. Stat. 1891, § 4616. Less than three is insufficient. Babcock v. People, 13 Colo. 517.

In Florida, the affidavit must state the facts on which is based the belief that a fair trial cannot be had. Irvin v. State, 19 Fla. 872.

A mere averment that the adverse party had been mayor of a city in the county for three terms, and had great influence over the inhabitants, was held to be insufficient without proof of undue influence. Greeno v. Wilson, 27 Fla. 492.

The affidavit must state facts, and not

6. Effect of the Change.—Questions relating to the effect of a change of venue have been discussed.¹ Some additional light may be thrown upon the matter by the later cases cited below.²

merely the statutory language. Johnson v. Wakulla County, 28 Fla. 720.

The requirement in the Iowa Code, § 2590, that the affidavit be by "three disinterested persons not related to the party making the motion, nearer than the fourth degree," imports that in case of two movers, no one of the three be so related to either mover. Fairburn v. Goldsmith, 58 Iowa 339.

Admission of counter-affidavits is within the sound discretion of the judge. Walker v. Nettleton, 50 Minn. 305.

Mere affidavits are not, within the Missouri Rev. Stat., § 1859, "legal and competent evidence," to establish the petition for a change. State v. Bohanan, 76 Mo. 562.

In Montana, the affidavit should state facts, not mere conclusions. Kennon v. Gilmer, 5 Mont. 257; 51 Am. Rep. 45.

As to the comparative weight of averments in affidavits and counter-affidavits, concerning prejudicial newspaper statements, see In re Davis' Estate, 11 Mont. 1.

In New Mexico, the affidavit must not be on mere information and belief. Territory v. Kelly, 2 N. Mex. 292.

In New York, an affidavit for a change for convenience of witnesses must state that, without the testimony of every witness named, the applicant cannot safely proceed to the trial, as he is advised by his counsel, and verily believes. Carpenter v. Continental Ins. Co., 31 Hun (N. Y.) 78.

In Pennsylvania, not the mere making of the affidavits, but the satisfying the court of the truth and weight of the averments, entitles a party to the change. Philadelphia v. Ridge Ave. Pass. R. Co., 143 Pa. St. 444.

In Texas, where the state files counter-affidavits, the burden of proof, under the Texas Code Crim. Proc., § 583, rests upon the accused. But he cannot object, if the court imposes the burden upon the state. Pierson v. State, 21 Tex. App. 14.

The court may inquire into the motives of the compurgators. Smith v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 14.

In Wisconsin, an affidavit founded on the prejudice of the judge, and which stated that the affiant "has reason to fear and does fear that he cannot have a fair trial," was held not equivalent to the statutory expression "has reason to believe and does believe," and to be insufficient. Smith v. Clarke, 70 Wis. 137. Compare Albert v. State, 66 Md. 325; 59 Am. Rep. 159.

The requirement in the Wisconsin Rev. Stat., § 4809, to "make oath that from prejudice or other cause," etc., imports that the facts constituting the cause, etc., shall be stated. Hager v. Falk, 82 Wis. 644.

1. See CHANGE OF VENUE, vol. 3, p. 105.

2. In Arizona, a party appearing in the second court, and asking a continuance, waives objection to the transfer. Solomon v. Norton (Arizona, 1886), 11 Pac. Rep. 108.

In Arkansas, the jurisdiction of the court to which the change is made, does not attach until the filing of the transcript duly certified under seal. Ball v. State, 48 Ark. 94.

In Illinois, an objection to the certificate of the transcript, upon a change in a criminal case, comes too late if first raised after the verdict. Tucker v. People, 122 Ill. 588.

In a criminal case, the second court will not assume to question the regularity of the order making the change. People v. Zane, 105 Ill. 662.

The order's mention of the name of the judge to try the case on the change is mere surplusage. Story's Will, 20 Ill. App. 183.

An objection to the sufficiency of the clerk's certificate to the transcript, is waived by going to trial. Objection to the regularity of the change, or to the jurisdiction, is waived by the verdict. Langford v. People, 134 Ill. 444.

In Indiana, a motion for a continuance made after the change, is a waiver of any irregularities in the transmission of the transcript. Mannix v. State, 115 Ind. 245.

In a criminal case, the defendant's waiver of non-compliance with the statute, as to filing the transcript in the second court, will not give jurisdiction thereto. Fawcett v. State, 71 Ind. 590.

A record in a criminal case that, after a change, there was a continuance "by consent of parties," raises the presumption that the defendant voluntarily appeared, and this is a waiver of irregularity in the transcript. Burrell v. State, 129 Ind. 290.

An applicant for the change was held to be estopped to plead to the jurisdiction of the original court to which the case was returned, and judgment was rendered without appearance of the other party. Coleman v. Floyd, 131 Ind. 330.

In Kentucky, after an improper change and denial of the plaintiff's motion for a remand, his asking for a confession of judgment on the pleadings is a waiver of his right to object to the jurisdiction. Howe v. Stevenson, 84 Ky. 576.

Under the Mississippi Code, § 3061, leaving the change to the judge's discretion, he may impose conditions as to costs, and cause a feri facias to issue therefor. Ratray v. State, 61 Miss. 377.

Where a suit is instituted in the proper county, under the Mississippi Code, § 2418, the granting of a change on the alleged ground that this was not the proper county, will not confer jurisdiction in the second county. Baum v. Burns, 66 Miss. 124.

In Missouri, a petition for partition, and for an accounting for rents of land in the county, cannot, after a change to another county, be amended so that judgment can be rendered, as in ejectment, for the detention, etc. Fields v. Maloney, 78 Mo. 172.

The second court does not acquire jurisdiction until the first loses it. In re Whitson's Estate, 89 Mo. 58.

The second court retains jurisdiction until the final determination, and after a reversal by the supreme court, notwithstanding the defendant's withdrawal of his application. State v. Hayes, 88 Mo. 344.

Objection to the change comes too late, if first raised in the court to which the cause has been removed. Squires v. Chillicothe, 89 Mo. 226.

Under the Missouri Rev. Stat., § 1870, where the transcript is not properly certified, the clerk of the court to which the case is removed, may rule the other clerk to perfect it. The latter could perfect it without rule. State v. Haws, 98 Mo. 188.

A change of venue at the instance of A, one defendant, does not affect the rights of B, another defendant, who did not join in the application, and who never appeared to the action, and was served only by publication. The court so held, on B's petition in Hickory county, to set aside a sheriff's deed of land therein, the sale having been under execution on a judgment rendered in Pettis county, after change thereto from Hickory county, on A's application. Holland v. Johnson, 80 Mo. 34.

In Texas, an erroneous recital, by the clerk who certified to the transfer, as to the signing of the indictment, was held immaterial. Robinson v. State, 24 Tex. App. 4.

1. See CHANGE OF VENUE, vol. 3, p. 108.

Only upon a clear showing of abuse of judicial discretion will the decision of the court, as to the granting or refusal of the change, be interfered with on appeal. People v. Vincent, 95 Cal. 425; Stephens v. Bradley, 24 Fla. 201; Adams v. State, 28 Fla. 511; Reinhold v. State, 130 Ind. 467; Thorpe v. Bradley, 75 Iowa 50; Stafford v. Com. (Ky. 1892), 18 S. W. Rep. 11; State v. Hunt, 91 Mo. 490; State v. Rider, 95 Mo. 474; State v. Loe, 98 Mo. 609; Com. v. Cleary, 148 Pa. St. 26; Martin v. State, 21 Tex. App. 1.

The court so held where the record failed to disclose all the evidence on which the first court acted thereon, Williams v. Dickenson, 28 Fla. 90; and also so held where the statements thereon were conflicting, State v. Beck, 73 Iowa 616; Hamilton v. Des Moines, etc., R. Co., 84 Iowa 131; White v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 5 Dakota 508; Hasson v. Com. (Ky. 1889), 11 S. W. Rep. 286; and so held under California Penal Code, §§ 1033-1035, when the defendant's application is supported by his affidavit alone, People v. Elliott, 80 Cal. 296. So, also, under Iowa Code, § 4374; State v. Billings, 77 Iowa 417; also, under Kansas Gen. Stat., §§ 5238-5239; State v. Reno, 41 Kan. 674. Especially is this true where the statute expressly leaves the question of change to the discretion of the first court. Quinn v. State, 123 Ind. 59.

The overruling of the application for the change, based merely on an affidavit as to the state of public opinion in the county, is a mere matter of fact and discretion, and presents no question of law for review; and this, though in a territory—e. g., Montana—where an appeal lies. Kennon v. Gilmer, 131 U. S. 22.

In Alabama, where the statute requires an application for a change to be made "as early as practicable before the trial," and the application is renewed at the trial term, the appellate court will consider only the refusal of the last application. Hawes v. State, 88 Ala. 37.

In California, an appeal from an order denying the change does not operate as a stay. Howell v. Thompson, 70 Cal. 635.

In Idaho, the fact that there was a slight preponderance in favor of the application, is not ground for disturbing the decision of the trial court refusing the change, if no palpable abuse of discretion appears. Hyde v. Harkness, 1 Idaho 601.

Under the Indiana Rev. Stat., § 177, in case of an offense not punishable by death, the question of a change of venue for alleged prejudice of the people, is wholly within the discretion of the trial court. Droneberger v. State, 112 Ind. 105.

In Michigan, the decision of the supreme court commissioner, as to the judge's disqualification, is reviewable by the supreme court; it being a question of law whether the testimony brings the case within the Michigan Annot. Stat., §§ 6496-6499. Curtis v. Wilcox, 74 Mich. 69.

In Mississippi, in reviewing the refusal of the change in a criminal case, the supreme court will consider the facts, that the jury was obtained before the defendant's peremptory challenges were exhausted; that his witnesses responded promptly; and that the court, after seeing the temper of the jurors on their voir dire, refused a motion for a new trial. Cheatham v. State, 67 Miss. 335; 19 Am. St. Rep. 310.

In Missouri, when, after the change, the indictment is quashed, and the defendant is re-arrested under a new indictment, a statutory application, and not a mandamus, is the proper proceeding to have the indictment certified to the second court. State v. Normile, 108 Mo. 121.

In Nebraska, if a justice fails to make the change, as required by the Nebraska Code, § 958a, the remedy is not by mandamus, but on error to the district court. State v. Cotton, 33 Neb. 561.

Under the New Hampshire bill of rights, the supreme court may order a change of venue in a criminal case. State v. Albee, 61 N. H. 423; 60 Am. Rep. 325.

In North Carolina, the appellate court will presume that the examination of evidence required by the North Carolina Code, §§ 196-197, was had; and a finding that there could be a fair trial in the original county, is conclusive. Albertson v. Terry, 109 N. Car. 8.

In Ohio, when a party complies with the requirements of the statute for a change of venue, and the affidavit shows the judge to be interested, the clerk must make the order and certificate for a change of venue. State v. Shaw, 43 Ohio St. 324.

Under the Pennsylvania Act of 1875, making the change a matter of judicial discretion, mandamus will not issue on its refusal. Newlin's Petition, 123 Pa. St. 541.

In Tennessee, under the constitutional guaranty in a criminal case, if a change has been made, the record should show that the defendant applied for it, the reasons therefor, and his assent thereto. State v. Denton, 6 Coldw. (Tenn.) 539.

In Texas, upon impeachment of the means of knowledge of the defendant's compurgators, a refusal to put them upon the stand will not be reviewed by the appellate court. Scott v. State, 23 Tex. App. 521.

In Virginia, in a criminal case, jurors may be summoned from another county, if qualified ones cannot be conveniently found. Virginia Code 1887, § 4024. If the prisoner failed to ask for such summoning, and there is no proof that the jury was not impartial, the appellate court will not reverse for the refusal of the change. Wright v. Com., 33 Gratt. (Va.) 880.

In West Virginia, when it is doubtful whether the circuit court intended to remove the entire cause, or only a petition for relief as to part of a certain fund, the entire cause will be considered removed, if this is necessary for administering full justice. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Vanderwerker, 33 W. Va. 191.

I. ETYMOLOGY AND DEFINITION.—The word "verdict" is derived from the Latin, and results from the coalition of the two words, vere, truly, and dictum, a saying.¹ It is a member of the very numerous family of legal terms, and in this sense it has been defined "The unanimous decision made by a jury and reported to the court, on matters lawfully submitted to them in the course of a trial of a cause."²

II. VARIOUS KINDS OF VERDICTS—1. General Verdict—a. DEFINITION.—A general verdict is that by which the jury pronounce generally upon any or all of the issues, either in favor of the plaintiff or defendant.³

2. Bouv. Law Dict.

3. Bouv. Law Dict.; Co. Litt. 228; 4 Bl. Com. 360. See numerous statutory definitions in the codes of various states.

An apt description of a general verdict is noted in the opinion of the court in Smith v. Ireland, 4 Utah 187. "A general verdict," said Lane, C. J., "is a direct statement of a conclusion of law, and an indirect statement of the facts from which the conclusion is drawn; it expressly affirms the law, and inferentially the facts."

In Bacon Abr., tit. "Verdict" (C) it appears, "A general verdict is so called, because the whole matter in issue is thereby found generally."

Criminal Cases.—A response in general terms to the indictment is what is termed a general verdict. Conkey v. People, 1 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 418.

A verdict which finds in general terms in favor of one party or the other, may, nevertheless, be a general verdict, though special facts are stated, as the grounds of the jury's conclusion. Lawson v. Hilgenberg, 77 Ind. 221; Caldwell v. Brown, 43 Tex. 216; Shifflet v. Morelle, 68 Tex. 382.

When Proper—Criminal Case—Louisiana.

ana.—The only verdict, under the law that the jury can render in a criminal case, is a general verdict of guilty or not guilty, which is a decision on both the law and the fact. State v. Jurche, 17 La. Ann. 71.

Criminal Case—Colorado.—A general verdict is according to the course of the common law, in conformity to which all trials for criminal offenses are to be conducted, except where a different mode is pointed out. Kollenberger v. People, 9 Colo. 233.

Separate Counts—Same Offense.—Where there are several counts in an indictment, charging the commission of the same offense in as many different ways, a general verdict is proper. Separate verdicts of guilty on each count might be repugnant. State v. Rounds, 76 Me. 123.

When Improper.—Where two inconsistent causes of action are alleged, a general verdict cannot be sustained. Schofield v. Miltimore, 74 Wis. 194. Similarly it has been held, that when two causes of action are submitted to the jury at the same time, a general verdict for the plaintiff is erroneous. McHoney v. German Ins. Co., 44 Mo. App. 426.

When Sufficient.—In an action to recover several penalties due plaintiff, by reason of defendant's passing plaintiff's toll-gate without paying toll, although the causes of action embraced in the suit were distinct and separate, a general verdict of not guilty is sufficient, though, if the jury had found for the plaintiff, a separate verdict on each count might have been requisite. Hannibal, etc., Plank Road, etc., Co. v. Bowling, 53 Mo. 311. And see State v. Henslee, 54 Mo. 518.

In Mooney v. Kennett, 19 Mo. 554; 61 Am. Dec. 576, it was said "that a general finding for the defendant, on a petition containing several causes of action, may be sustained; but where the finding is for the plaintiff, every consideration of propriety requires that there should be a verdict in each cause of action, and this will all be blended in one judgment."

Where there are several issues, a finding upon either of which for the defendant would discharge him, the jury may find a general verdict, and are not bound to find upon each issue separately. State Bank v. Cason, 10 Ark. 479.

Where the questions of fact, presented by an issue under the first count, were in some respects different from those involved in that upon the second count, so that evidence given under one might not have been competent under another, but the amount which the plaintiff was entitled to recover was the same under both, and the issues were tried together, a general verdict was held to be sufficient. Connecticut L. Ins. Co. v. McMurdy, 89 Pa. St. 363.

May Be Set Aside, But Not Changed.

—When the jury pronounces a general and absolute verdict, the judge may set aside, though he cannot change, their finding. Where the jury declared the defendant, in an indictment for perjury, guilty, the judge has the power to set aside this verdict, but not to go further. He has no power, in the face of such verdict, to pronounce him innocent. State v. Curtis, 6 Ired. (N. Car.) 247.

What It Includes.—A general verdict for the defendant, in an action of trespass to try title, necessarily includes the finding in his favor of every material fact well pleaded touching his right to the relief sought. Hamilton v. Rice, 15 Tex. 382. And see also Wells v. Barnett, 7 Tex. 584; Hardy v. DeLeon, 5 Tex. 211; Smith v. Johnson, 8 Tex.

418; McLaughlin v. Kelly, 22 Cal. 211; Krause v. Cutting, 32 Wis. 687; State v. Lee, 80 Iowa 75; Van Pelt v. Otter, 2 Sweeny (N. Y.) 202.

A general verdict of guilty is a finding only of the facts sufficiently pleaded. Where, therefore, neither count upon the indictment sets forth larceny, a verdict of larceny cannot be sustained. Com. v. Moore, 99 Pa. St. 570.

Conditional Verdicts.—In the case of Coolbaugh v. Pierce, 8 S. & R. (Pa.) 418, which was an action of ejectment, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs "conditioned that the defendants shall, by the first day of next June, deposit a deed or acquittance of his part of the orchard now in possession of the plaintiffs, and $40 in cash, together with costs of suit; then, judgment to be entered for the defendant." The defendant having complied with the conditions of the verdict within the time prescribed, the court directed judgment to be entered in his favor. This judgment was attacked by the plaintiffs in error on the ground that a conditional verdict is unauthorized by law, but Gibson, J., in sustaining the judgment, said: "In this state an action of ejectment approaches very near to a bill in equity, and the verdict of a jury imposing conditions on the party in whose favor it is rendered and performs the office (though imperfectly) of the decree. In our sister states, at least in those that enjoy the benefit of a separate administration of equity, such a verdict would not be sustained; with us it is sustained from necessity."

Again, in Roland v. Miller, 3 W. & S. (Pa.) 390, which was an action of debt on a bond for the purchase-money of land, the jury found a conditional verdict. They were allowed to find for the plaintiff the amount due on the bond, principal and interest to be paid when a certain incumbrance which was proved to exist should be removed from the land purchased by the defendant from the plaintiff. And see Frantz v. Brown, 1 P. & W. (Pa.) 257; Nicholas v. Wolfersberger, 5 S. & R. (Pa.) 167; Decamp v. Feay, 5 S. & R. (Pa.) 323; 9 Am. Dec. 372; McCormack v. Crall, 6 Watts (Pa.) 207; Adams v. Smith, 19 Pa. St. 182; Hoever v. Mugele, 66 Pa. St. 348; Bower v. Fenn, 90 Pa. St. 359; 35 Am. Rep. 662.

c. REQUISITES OF VERDICT—(1) In General.—The rule that a verdict must be supported by evidence adduced at the trial, is too well established to require more than the bare statement of the fact;¹ and that it is peculiarly the province of the jury to say what amount of evidence is necessary for this purpose, is conceded with the same universality.² A verdict must be reasonable; not inconsistent nor contradictory in its provisions;³ for example, a verdict finding the defendant guilty of larceny of certain property and of receiving the same property knowing it to have been stolen, is liable to this objection;⁴ and in a suit instituted for the recovery of a certain sum of money, where the defendant pleaded tender of a part, a verdict finding "no cause of action" was held

2. Weight of Evidence.—Although a verdict be considered against the weight of evidence, the action of the court below in refusing to grant a new trial, will not be interfered with; but where there is no evidence to support a verdict at all, it is the duty of the court to set it aside. Low v. Pardee, 48 Ill. 466; O'Herrin v. State, 14 Ind. 420; Wishmier v. Behymer, 30 Ind. 102; Moellering v. Kayser, 110 Ind. 533; Allen v. Sykes, 5 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 611; Cardaillac v. Duthu, 21 La. Ann. 219; Carroll v. Doughty, 21 La. Ann. 374; Glenn v. Ferguson, 21 La. Ann. 385; Bancker v. Marti, 21 La. Ann. 587; Baker v. Briggs, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 122; 19 Am. Dec. 311; Forsyth v. Hooper, 11 Allen (Mass.) 419; Cicily v. State, 21 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 202; Watts v. Douglass, 10 Mo. 676; Eaton v. Joint School Dist., 23 Wis. 374; NEW TRIAL, vol. 16, p. 554.

Where the evidence is conflicting, the verdict should not be set aside, as against the evidence, except in extraordinary cases, where it is manifest that the jury have either mistaken or abused their trust. Baker v. Briggs, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 122; 19 Am. Dec. 311.

3. Where three defendants were tried on an indictment for robbery, the proof against all being precisely the same, if a jury acquit two of the defendants and find a third guilty, their verdict must be set aside, and particularly where the indictment was for robbery in the first degree, being accompanied by violence and the conviction being for robbery in the third degree, where from the evidence the accused was clearly guilty of robbery with force and violence if he was guilty of any crime at all. People v. Massett (Supreme Ct.), 7 N. Y. Cr. Rep. 393. See Weinecke v. State, 34 Neb. 14.

In Hall v. Spivey, 65 Ga. 693, which was a case involving the title to certain land, the issue was, whether the title was in the claimant, or in the representatives of a certain intestate. The jury returned a verdict finding the title to be in the claimant, and also found an inconsistent right of dower in the land. The verdict was set aside.

A verdict finding damages for the plaintiff, on a count alleging non-performance of a contract, and at the same time finding for the defendant on a counter-demand based solely upon the contract, is invalid for inconsistency. Johnson v. Labarge, 46 Mo. App. 433.

4. Com. v. Haskins, 128 Mass. 60.

North Carolina.—The code of this state, section 1191, expressly permits the joining in an indictment of a count for larceny with one for receiving stolen goods knowing them to have been stolen; and a general verdict in such a case is good, if either count be sufficient. State v. Carter (N. Car. 1893), 18 S. E. Rep. 517.

Wisconsin.—Under the statutes of Wisconsin, which provide the same penalty for one who receives, conceals, or aids in concealing property knowing it to have been stolen, as is prescribed for the stealing of the property, where one is charged in separate counts with both crimes, a general verdict of guilty is sufficient without specifying the count to which it relates. Nelson v. State, 52 Wis. 534.

The local statutes should be consulted in questions of this sort.

void for inconsistency, in this instance, with the pleadings.¹ The jury may not negative a fact admitted by the pleadings,² for if they do this, they transcend their authority. It is only the controverted points, those facts distinctly affirmed on the one side and negatived on the other, with which they have to do.³ The jury are, of course, controlled by statutory directions, to which they should conform their verdict.⁴ Their findings should also

2. Burnett v. Stearns, 33 Cal. 468; Hill v. Den, 54 Cal. 20; Tracy v. Craig, 55 Cal. 91; Silvey v. Neary, 59 Cal. 97; Walker v. Brem, 67 Cal. 599; Bancker v. Marti, 21 La. Ann. 587; Sage v. Evins, 32 La. Ann. 1271; Watts v. Greenlee, 2 Dev. (N. Car.) 87.

Findings should be confined to the facts put in issue by the pleadings, and upon such facts as are admitted by the pleadings, no findings are required. If, however, findings are made upon admitted facts, they should be in harmony with the facts as admitted and not in conflict with them. Walker v. Brem, 67 Cal. 599.

Where the defendant in an action of slander pleaded that the alleged slanderous words were spoken more than six months before the commencement of the suit, and the plaintiff pleaded infancy at the time of speaking the words and bringing the suit, a verdict that the words were spoken within six months before the writ was sued out was held to be void. Watts v. Greenlee, 2 Dev. (N. Car.) 87.

3. The jury is selected and sworn to try the issues joined between the parties. To the decision of those issues they must be confined, and the issues are the propositions affirmatively stated by one and negatived by the other party. Confined to the decision of the questions thus raised, it is not competent for the jury to go beyond the pleadings, to ignore matter which they are sworn to inquire into, or to affirm and pass upon an issue of their own creation, inconsistent with the joinder of pleading. Sage v. Evins, 32 La. Ann. 1271. See also Walker v. Brem, 67 Cal. 599.

4. A jury cannot fix the punishment for certain crimes at a smaller period than the minimum time prescribed by law as punishment for the offense of which they convict. Thus, where a jury might legally commute the punishment of a prisoner from that of death, to imprisonment in the penitentiary from ten to twenty-one years, they had no authority to bring in a verdict declaring him guilty of the offense charged, but fixing his punishment at five years imprisonment. Murphy v. State, 7 Coldw. (Tenn.) 516.

Where imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of one year or less is forbidden by statute, it was held that the court had no right to receive a verdict violating this provision. Alabama Code, § 4492; Ex p. Goucher (Ala. 1894), 15 So. Rep. 601.

The Wisconsin Revised Statutes provide that "in all actions of replevin it shall be necessary for the plaintiff, whether the defendant be present or not, to prove all the allegations of his complaint, and on such proof, the justice or the jury shall find as well the value of the goods and chattels specified in the complaint, and assess the damages which he has sustained by the unjust detention of the property replevied, as that the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the property." It is further provided that "if, on trial of the issues joined, the jury shall find for the defendant, the justice or jury shall assess adequate damages for the caption and detention of the goods or chattels replevied." In this existing state of the law, an action of replevin was brought for a chestnut sorrel horse, the plea being simply not guilty, and the verdict of the jury, "we find no cause of action." It seems that this verdict did not comply with either of the statutory requirements, nor did it respond to the plea of property which it was held was put in issue by the defendant's general denial. Ford v. Ford, 3 Wis. 399.

Though a statute declares that the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact and not of law, where the circumstances are such as render the act conclusively fraudulent in law, the jury are not at liberty to contradict this conclusive legal presumption. Stevens v. Fisher, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 181. See be consistent with the instructions of the court,¹ and not indirect, indefinite, nor argumentative.² The verdict of a jury requiring also Billings v. Billings, 2 Cal. 107; 56 Am. Dec. 319.

Where, however, a certain state of facts is declared merely presumptive evidence of fraud, the jury is at liberty to find against this prima facie presumption. Billings v. Billings, 2 Cal. 107; 56 Am. Dec. 319.

Conformable to General Legal Principles.—If the fact to be found by the jury consists of distinct integral parts, some of law and some of fact, which must exist and be proved before such mixed fact can be said to be legally established, a verdict finding the fact, without the evidence of such legal prerequisites, would be a verdict against law and should be set aside. Bryant v. Commonwealth Ins. Co., 13 Pick. (Mass.) 543.

The plaintiffs sued the city for grading and filling in certain streets, by means of which the water was caused to stand upon their lands to their great damage, etc. The jury returned a verdict: "Believing in the lot is no living stream, we, the jury, find for the defendant." The evidence tended to prove that a living stream ran across the plaintiff's lot, which was dammed up by the improvements, although the evidence varied in regard to the character of the stream. It was, however, clearly shown that water ran in it for most of the year. The jury, it seems, founded their verdict upon the fact that the stream was not a living one, which must mean one constantly running, thus holding, as a matter of law, that the city in making improvements had a right to dam up any watercourse, and thereby flood the lands of others where it does not form a permanent stream. In this view of the law the jury were mistaken, and the court should have set aside the verdict. For this error, the judgment was reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. Rose v. St. Charles, 49 Mo. 509.

2. The issue was whether the prisoner was or was not insane, and the court held that a verdict that he was "sufficiently sane in mind and memory to distinguish between right and wrong," was defective, as it did not directly find anything certain on the point in issue, but avoided it by an argumentative finding. Freeman v. People, 4 Den. (N. Y.) 9; 47 Am. Dec. 216. "On or About."—A verdict that a certain erection was completed on or about the 5th of April, 1879, is not so indefinite as to be a nullity in law, especially where the evidence on the point is confusing, there being enough evidence to sustain the finding. Sturges v. Green, 27 Kan. 235.

A verdict, "we, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment, and that he be sentenced to the state prison for a term of two years," was objected to on the ground mutual acts to be done between the plaintiff and defendant, the performance of which cannot be compelled, is ineffectual and void, as a verdict to be valid and complete must be of such a character as to be readily enforcible by the legal process of the court in which the judgment is pronounced.¹

(2) Number of Jurors.—Usually the members of a jury are twelve in number,² whose unanimous concurrence is necessary that it did not, with sufficient certainty, fix the punishment of the convict; it being insisted that the language should have been that the defendant be imprisoned at hard labor in the state prison, etc. However, as the defendant was sentenced to the state prison pursuant to the verdict in the usual and legal form, the law determining how he was to be disposed of on his arrival at the prison, the verdict was held to be good. O'Herrin v. State, 14 Ind. 420.

Where a verdict fixes the punishment of the defendant at five years' imprisonment, it is sufficient, though it does not specify the place of confinement, since, under the statute, confinement for more than twelve months must be in the penitentiary. Clemons v. State, 92 Tenn. 282. See also Cross v. State, 132 Ind. 65.

Where two defendants were indicted for unlawfully marking six hogs, it was proved that one of the defendants claimed one of the hogs and marked it; two were claimed by the other defendant and marked by him, but no joint act was proved, nor no concurrence in separate acts. The jury brought in a general verdict of guilty, and it was held that the general conviction could not be supported, and that to justify a sentence in such a case the verdict must ascertain the number of hogs marked. State v. Nichols, 12 Rich. (S. Car.) 672.

Twelve Not a Necessary Number.—In most of the states we are so accustomed to juries of twelve men, that we are apt to lose sight of the fact that while that was a favorite number of the common law, in which Lord Coke finds surprising virtue and ample sanction in the fact that there were twelve apostles, twelve tribes, twelve stones, etc. (3th Co. Litt. 459), yet it is not a necessary number. 4 Min. Inst. (2d ed.) 736.

Under the laws and constitution of Mississippi, there is no jury known for the trial of issues except that which consists of twelve good and lawful men who are tried, elected, and sworn. Wolfe v. Martin, 1 How. (Miss.) 30; Dixon v. Richards, 2 How. (Miss.) 771; Scott v. State, 70 Miss. 247. But see opinion of Thacher, J., in Tillman v. Ailles, 5 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 373; 43 Am. Dec. 520, where it is contended that an issue of assumpsit may be tried by a jury of thirteen, though if the number were less than twelve the verdict would be invalid.

The provision in the Missouri constitution, to the effect that trial by jury shall remain inviolable, in substance means that the trial shall be by twelve men; they shall all and each of them be good and lawful men; they must have a good fame, possess integrity and intelligence; they must not be aliens, vagrants, outlaws, nor under conviction of crime. Missouri Bank v. Anderson, 1 Mo. 244.

The constitution of Texas directs that petit juries in the district courts shall be composed of twelve men. It also provides that when, pending the trial of any case, one or more jurors, not exceeding three, die or are disabled from sitting, the remainder of the jury shall have the power to render a verdict. It also adds that parties may by consent, agree in a particular case, to try with a less number, but that no verdict shall be rendered in any cause except upon the concurrence of all the members of the jury trying the same. Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Waller, 56 Tex. 331. See also this case for a construction of the phrase "disabled from sitting."

Less Than Twelve.—"The trial of a criminal cause by a jury consisting of a less number than twelve is unauthorized by law," said the court in Allen v. State, 54 Ind. 461, "and the verdict for a verdict.¹ Generally in civil causes,² and in some instances in such a case is void." See also Jackson v. State, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 461; Hill v. People, 16 Mich. 351. A jury may be waived altogether in criminal cases less than capital, upon agreement of the parties, but where there is a jury at all, it must consist of twelve men. Brown v. State, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 561.

Alienage of Jurors.—A verdict rendered by a jury, two of whom are aliens, is erroneous. However, it is not void, and hence cannot be regarded as a nullity. Foreman v. Hunter, 59 Iowa 550.

1. Adkin v. Blake, 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 40; Lawrence v. Stearns, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 501; Perry v. Mays, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 354; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Waller, 56 Tex. 331; Com. v. Gibson, 2 Va. Cas. 70; State v. Austin, 6 Wis. 205.

A verdict was brought into court, read by the clerk, and assented to by the jury. The clerk then, in open court, saw fit to amend the verdict in an immaterial point, but before the amended verdict could be read one of the jurors was taken ill and retired. The remaining eleven agreed to the amended verdict, yet as the twelve did not assent to it the verdict was held a nullity. Com. v. Gibson, 2 Va. Cas. 70.

In the constitution of Texas, which went into effect the 18th of April, 1876, there was an article providing that in all civil cases, and in criminal cases below the grade of felony, nine members of the jury concurring might render a verdict. The legislature, however, was vested with power by the constitution to change this rule, which it did in August of the same year, restoring that which had formerly prevailed. See Bowen v. Davis, 48 Tex. 101.

Where an intended juror had been sworn, but a stranger appeared in his place, answered to his name, and was put on the jury, the verdict rendered was held to be invalid, as it was the verdict of only eleven men. Dayton v. Church (Brooklyn City Ct.), 7 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 367.

Concurrence in Same View.—In Murray v. New York L. Ins. Co., 96 N. Y. 614, it was held not to be necessary that a jury, in order to find a verdict, shall all agree in a single view of the transaction disclosed by the evidence; if their conclusion may be justified by either of two interpretations of the evidence, the verdict may not be impeached by showing that part of the jury proceeded upon one interpretation and part upon another. However, Morton, J. in Dorr, v. Fenno, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 521, thought differently, declaring that if the jury did not all agree upon the same ground that the verdict might be set aside.

The case of Biggs v. Barry, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 259, depended on two points: first, considerations touching the right of stoppage in transitu, and secondly, concerning an alleged fraudulent sale. The jury found generally for the plaintiff, but, upon being questioned, it appeared that some considered the plaintiff entitled to a recovery on one ground and some on another; for this reason, the verdict was set aside.

In Ross v. Neal, 7 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 407, which was an action for malicious prosecution, the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff in the lower court. The defendant appealed, and, among other assignments of error, contended that the verdict was rendered by a jury of thirteen men. Mills, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It must be admitted that twelve is the right number in such a case as this, and if there were not twelve, but a deficit in the number, it might vitiate the verdict. But here the party had his twelve and one more, and the complaint is, an excess in number, and the grounds of it must be that the verdict was liable to be influenced by at least one more person than the law allowed in the jury room, acting upon the case. If this exception to the verdict had been taken in the inferior court, we have no doubt it must have vitiated the verdict. . . .

But," continues the judge, "would it be proper to permit him to attack the verdict here for the first time? We conceive not." In Berry v. Kenney, 5 B. Mon. (Ky.) 120, the same position is maintained.

Judgment entered upon a verdict of eleven jurors, unless the defendant was in court to waive the objection to the number, is erroneous. Ayres v. Barr, 5 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 286.

in criminal prosecutions,¹ the parties have been allowed to waive a numerical irregularity; and in the former class of actions unanimity of consent has been in the same manner dispensed with.²

(3) Mode of Deliberation—(See also JURY AND JURY TRIAL, vol. 12, p. 378; NEW TRIAL, vol. 16, p. 593).—When it becomes the duty of the jury to pronounce on the issues of fact submitted to them for their decision, their verdict should be the creature of sound judgment, dispassionate consideration, and conscientious reflection.³

The lack of all constraint is an essential characteristic of their deliberations, and influences tending to impair the free exercise of their discretion, within legal bounds, invalidate a verdict

Writ of Inquiry.—Where it appears that on a writ of inquiry only nine jurors were sworn, the judgment will be reversed, unless there is a waiver of record, express or implied, of objection to the number. Oldham v. Hill, 5 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 300.

1. A verdict in a misdemeanor case rendered by eleven jurors will not be set aside for this reason, if defendant's counsel, by consent duly entered of record, agreed that one of the jurors might be withdrawn. Com. v. Daily, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 80; State v. Borowsky, 11 Nev. 119.

2. In Northern Bank v. Buford, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 335, it seems that the parties agreed that a majority of the jurors might render a verdict upon which judgment should be entered. This operated as a mere agreement to dispense with the unanimous concurrence, and not as a submission to arbitrators, whose award should be final.

Where consent to a majority verdict was obtained by one party, in possession of information regarding the jury which, had his opponent known, would have prevented an agreement, the verdict should be set aside. Snow v. Hardy, 3 Minn. 77.

3. Free and Deliberate Finding.—Nothing short of a free and deliberate finding, made upon a conscientious conviction of the judgments of the jurors, will satisfy the law. Merseve v. Shine, 37 Iowa 253.

Passion or Prejudice.—Where the verdict manifests the influence of passion or prejudice it should be set aside. Jeffrey v. Keokuk, etc., R. Co., 51 Iowa 439; Damrille v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 27 Mo. App. 202.

Presumption of Passion or Prejudice.—It was contended, in Conrad Seipp Brewing Co. v. Doody, 25 Ill. App.

305, that the size of the verdict, and the fact that the court required a remittitur of one-third thereof, is conclusive proof that the verdict was the result of passion or prejudice. This contention was not allowed to prevail by the appellate court.

Damages Upon Erroneous Grounds.—Where a verdict showed upon its face that the damages were assessed upon a basis unwarranted alike by the pleadings, the evidence, the charge of the court, and the law governing the case, it must be set aside. Holden v. Belmont, 32 Ohio St. 585.

Duty of the Jury.—It is the duty of the jury to find a verdict upon the evidence given in the course of the trial, and upon that alone. Of course, its weight and credit should be judged by them in the light of their own experience, and that should be done without any addition to it, or modification of it arising out of the peculiar scientific requirements, or actual knowledge of the facts in controversy by one or more of their number. The law is imperative in exacting that oral evidence given upon the trial of civil and criminal cases be detailed under the solemnity of an oath properly administered to the witness, and without any distinction in the character of the information to be conveyed, whether it consists in deductions of science or the knowledge of facts. The universal prevalence and application of this rule excludes jurors from communicating with others for the purpose of influencing their conclusions, the knowledge of any fact, and the existence of any scientific opinions bearing upon the questions submitted to their decision. If a juror has acquired knowledge concerning any circumstances of the case, or has arrived at scientific conclusions bearing upon the controversy pending before the jury, that it is important for the jurors upon the panel to know, it is his duty to be sworn and examined the same as any other witness in the case, and under the responsibility of his oath to state the facts known to him, or the opinions formed by him, in the presence of the parties. People v. Zeiger, 6 Park Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 355.

An action was brought by the plaintiff to recover upon an agreement made by the plaintiff with the defendant for working his farm on shares, alleging in his complaint, among other things, that the defendant appropriated and used more than his half share of the milk and butter, and omitted to pay his half of the school tax. The plaintiff also claimed a large quantity of corn, oats, and potatoes used by the defendant, as well as for work done, beef sold, and money loaned. The defendant, in his answer, pleaded a denial and set-off. The evidence at the trial was very uncertain as to the quantity of corn, oats and potatoes, milk and butter, which the plaintiff claimed the defendant had appropriated. Nevertheless, the jury returned a verdict for $45, in the face of testimony so uncertain that a verdict for any definite amount could not have rationally been rendered. It was held that such a verdict could only have been determined by the wildest conjecture and was not based upon any calculation warranted by the testimony, and such mere conjecture was insufficient. Simpson v. Buck, 5 Lans. (N. Y.) 337.

Compromise Verdicts Condemned.—In the case of Richardson v. Coleman, 131 Ind. 210, the trial judge charged the jury, in relation to their verdict, that the law expected and tolerated reasonable compromises and fair concessions on their part. The supreme court held this to be erroneous, and in commenting thereon uses the following language: "The law does not expect any compromise on the part of the jurors. It expects every juror to exercise his individual judgment, and that when a verdict is agreed to, it will be the verdict of each individual juror. In arriving at a verdict, the juror should not indulge in undue pride of personal opinion, and he should not be unreasonable or obstinate, and he should give due consideration to the views and opinions of other jurors and listen to their arguments with a willingness to be convinced, and yield to their views if induced to believe they are correct. But the law does not expect, nor does it tolerate, the agreement by a juror upon a verdict, unless he is convinced that it is right; in other words, unless it is his verdict—a verdict which his conscience approves, and he, under oath, after a full consideration, believes to be right. To say that jurors may compromise upon a verdict, is to say that twelve jurors, all differing widely in their views as to what verdict ought to be returned, without any of them changing their views, may agree upon a verdict which is not believed to be right by any considerable number of the jurors, but agreed to as a matter of expediency in order to dispose of the case, without the approval of the consciences of any considerable number of the panel approving of it. The instruction tells the jurors the law expects them to make concessions and compromises, and agree upon a verdict which their consciences do not approve, but they should do so as a matter of expediency, in order to dispose of the case."

See INSTRUCTIONS, vol. 11, p. 258.

In the case Goodsell v. Seeley, 46 Mich. 623; 41 Am. Rep. 183, the court, in speaking of the jurors compromising, says: "The law contemplates that they shall, by their discussions, harmonize their views if possible, but not that they shall compromise, divide, and yield for the mere purpose of an agreement."

Compromise Verdicts Not Necessarily Illegal.—Harrison v. Powell, 24 Ga. 530. And see Randolph v. Lampkin, 90 Ky. 551.

It was assigned for error, in Owens v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 67 Tex. 679, that the verdict rendered was a compromise verdict, and hence invalid. The supreme court disposed of this objection by declaring that there are but few verdicts returned giving damages for tort in which the amount is not the result of a compromise between the members of the jury.

1. Georgia R. Co. v. Cole, 77 Ga. 77; Merseve v. Shine, 37 Iowa 253; Fangrieve v. Moberly, 29 Mo. App. 141. In this last case it was observed that trial courts cannot be too careful of unduly influencing the minds of the jury, or swerving them from the dictates of an enlightened conscientious judgment; but within proper bounds, and especially in cases where, from the character of the issue and the evidence, there can be little toleration of obvious unreasonable obstruction to a judgment, the court may urge upon the jury the propriety and importance of reaching the conclusion under the law and evidence.

1. Where the verdict cannot be regarded as the result of deliberate judgment, but as having been brought about by the supposed paramount duty of the jury to agree upon a verdict, rather than by free and unbiased conviction of what their verdict ought to be, and upon the interference of the court it appears to have had such effect upon the jury, their verdict ought to be set aside. Randolph v. Lampkin 90 Ky. 551; Edens v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 72 Mo. 212.

There ought not to be anything in the conduct of the court towards a jury which would appear to press them to give up rational doubts or disregard difficulties which may arise in their minds upon the evidence of the case. State v. Austin, 6 Wis. 205.

Duress.—After a jury had been engaged in their deliberations about twenty-four hours, they sent word to the judge that they were unable to agree upon a verdict. The judge replied that "he did not believe it yet," and that it was essential they agree that night, as he was going away and wouldn't be back for several days, and the jury might not be discharged until his return. This information seemed to have the effect of adjusting the irreconcilable differences of the jury, with the admirable result of a verdict in less than an hour, but the judgment rendered thereon was very promptly and properly reversed by the appellate court. Pierce v. Pierce, 38 Mich. 412.

A Judge May Urge an Agreement to a Reasonable Extent.—It is both proper and commendable that a judge, after the labor and expense of a trial, should endeavor, by all legitimate means, to secure a verdict. To this end he may properly urge a jury to engage in their deliberations in a spirit of liberal concession. He may properly explain to them the theory of trial by jury; that its object is to give the parties the united judgment of twelve minds upon the question at issue between them.

He may properly invite their attention to the importance, both to the parties and to the public, in agreeing upon a verdict, that thus the time and expense of a trial may be saved. These and other considerations may, and frequently ought to be urged upon the consideration of the jury, to induce them to make an honest and faithful effort to bring their minds together, and thus agree upon a verdict. But beyond this he is not at liberty to go. Green v. Telfair, 11 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 260; Watson v. Minneapolis St. R. Co., 53 Minn. 551. And see Cranston v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 103 N. Y. 614; Connors v. Walsh, 131 N. Y. 590; Darling v. New York, etc., R. Co., 17 R. I. 708; Houston v. Ladies' Union Branch Assoc., 87 Ga. 203.

Where a court said to the jury, "This jury is, in the eye of the law, as capable of deciding this case and reaching a verdict as any that may be impaneled hereafter, and I am supposed to give you some further opportunity to consider your verdict. Go to your room and make an honest effort to agree, and follow the rule which I have given you, and I do not think it will trouble you in agreeing." This was held in Parker v. Georgia R. Co., 83 Ga. 539, to be not undue pressure of the jury to a verdict, though it went, perhaps, to the allowable limit. See also Caldwell v. New Jersey Steamboat Co., 47 N. Y. 282; Austin v. Appling, 88 Ga. 54; NEW TRIAL, vol. 16, p. 522.

Detention of Jury.—It has been declared to be in the discretion of the trial judge to refuse to discharge the jury until they arrive at a verdict. Wilson v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co. (Supreme Ct.), 20 N. Y. Supp. 65. See also Darling v. New York, etc., R. Co., 17 R. I. 708.

2. After the submission of the evidence and charge of the court, the jury having been sent to their room about half past eight o'clock Saturday night, and some time before twelve o'clock the judge having sent the sheriff to inquire of the jury whether they were likely to agree, and having received from the jury a reply that they were not, it was error to call them in about half an hour afterward and tell them interference equally avoid the resulting verdict.¹ Litigants in a cause before a jury, are entitled to the exercise of this reasonable discretion and deliberate reflection.² For this reason the jury is not that it "was nearly twelve o'clock, that, the next day being Sunday, they would have to cease their deliberations until after midnight of the next day; that during that time they were not to discuss the verdict, or anything connected with the case; that they would have to keep together during the entire day and night; that the sheriff would provide a place for them to sleep together, and that they would be furnished with their meals, but at their own expense." It is not to be wondered, that thus admonished, an agreement was promptly reached, nor that the verdict was held to be fatally defective. Henderson v. Reynolds, 84 Ga. 159. And see Nel-ling v. Industrial Mfg. Co., 78 Ga. 260.

Remarks to Hasten Jury.—In McIntyre v. People, 38 Ill. 514, the court informed the jury as they retired, that he would hold court open for a specific time to see if they would be able to agree, and if they should not, that he would adjourn until the next morning. It was urged that these words were calculated to prejudice the prisoner by hastening the action of the jury. However, as the jury did not, in fact, agree for several hours after the time indicated by the judge, it could not be maintained that the remarks of the judge had this effect, and the appellate court also adds that, in its opinion, men qualified to act as jurors, and having in charge the life of a fellow being, would hardly be influenced by such remarks.

Admonition to Agree.—After the jury, in a case before a justice of the peace, had retired to deliberate, the justice, in the absence of both parties and their counsel, and without their consent, entered the jury room and held a consultation with them about the case. The foreman of the jury stated that they could not agree, and the justice replied that, on account of the great amount of time consumed, and the expense entailed in the trial of "these law suits," he thought they ought to agree. The jury soon found a verdict. It did not appear that the justice manifested any partiality or had any motive for coercing a verdict. It was, nevertheless, maintained that the jury, after it retires, must remain untrammelled and uninfluenced by any advice which the justice may, though honestly, give in regard to their verdict, without the consent of parties; and on this ground the judgment was reversed. Valentine v. Kelly, 54 Hun (N. Y.) 78.

Promise of Judicial Clemency.—Where the jury, after retiring, asked the court whether or not, if they brought in a verdict of guilty, they could depend upon the clemency of the court toward the prisoner, and the court replied that they could, whereupon a verdict of guilty was rendered, such verdict was set aside. McBean v. State, 83 Wis. 206.

Remarks by Officer in Charge.—In the case of Thomas v. Chapman, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 98, it appeared that the officer in charge of the jury stated to them that the court had adjourned and left orders for him (said officer) to lock up the jury and keep them all night, unless they agreed upon a verdict; that the case was clear for the plaintiff, and that the jury had better agree and go home; that if they did not soon, he should lock them up for the night. The verdict was set aside by the appellate court on the ground that such statements were calculated to influence the verdict.

1. Green v. Telfair, 11 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 260; Caldwell v. New Jersey Steamboat Co., 47 N. Y. 282.

Unwarrantable Interference.—An illustration of what the supreme court of Alabama justly declares a most unprecedented and unwarranted interference with the deliberations and province of the jury, occurred in Perkins v. State, 50 Ala. 154, where the jury, after having retired to consider their verdict, and not having returned, after several hours, the presiding judge, in the absence of the defendant and his attorney, sent for the jury and inquired why they did not find a verdict. When informed that they could not agree, he said to them that he would keep the court open until they did agree, and that under the charge of the court they had nothing to do but convict the defendant, or that they themselves would be guilty of moral perjury.

2. Knight v. Fisher, 15 Colo. 176; Houk v. Allen, 126 Ind. 568; Ryerson v. Kitchell, 3 N. J. L. 998; Memphis, etc., R. Co. v. Pillow, 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 248.

allowed to substitute chance devices, whose contingent result determines what their verdict shall be.¹ True, these experiments may be adopted by the jury for the purpose of ascertaining, for their own information, what the average estimate or opinion is,² although such methods are regarded by the courts with

Where the jury agreed that three of their number should settle the controversy as to the amount of their verdict, the finding of the jury was set aside. It was held that the remaining jurors surrendered their own judgment and their own will and voice in the settlement of this important question, and were mere instruments for the registration of the judgments of the three jurors selected to ascertain the amount they should render by their verdict. Memphis, etc., R. Co. v. Pillow, 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 248.

Verdict Without Retiring.—A jury may, if they choose, render their verdict without retiring from the court room; for example, in Board of Trustees v. Baker, 24 Ill. App. 231, the defendant offered no evidence in his behalf, and it was assigned for error that the court refused to decide upon a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, interposed by counsel for the defendant, when the plaintiff had rested, but permitted the jury to consider the evidence introduced, and to find and return a verdict without leaving the court room. See also Conner v. Jackson, 50 Ala. 384.

Jurors Taking Notes.—The jurors should not be allowed to take notes of the evidence deduced, for such a practice is well calculated to divert the attention from the evidence, as it would naturally be progressing while such notes were being made. The juror should register the evidence, as it is given, on the tablets of his memory, and not otherwise. Cheek v. State, 35 Ind. 492. But the act of a juror in taking notes of the evidence is not misconduct sufficient to set aside the verdict, where he, upon being admonished by the court of the impropriety of his act, ceases taking notes. Batterson v. State, 63 Ind. 531.

Assessment of Damages—Latitude of Discretion.—Although in the assessment of damages the jury has a great and useful latitude in cases of tort, and mixed cases of negligence and tort, where no precise standard of damages is established, in cases of contract, express or implied, where a mere calculation furnishes a uniform standard of right, the jury should indulge in no capricious or conjectural estimate. Walker v. Smith, 4 Dall. (Pa.) 390.

1. Intelligent Reflection.—Jurors are bound by their oaths and consciences to act intelligently—not blindly. They cannot discharge this responsibility by agreeing that the verdict, or any material part thereof, shall be determined by any process, the result of which is unknown to them at the time of the agreement. Knight v. Fisher, 15 Colo. 176.

Where a minority of two jurors decided among themselves that the tossing up of a coin should decide whether they would agree with the majority, and thus make the verdict unanimous, this was held to be a gambling verdict, and as such was set aside. Donner v. Palmer, 23 Cal. 40.

Thus, a verdict arrived at by casting lots is invalid. Obear v. Grey, 68 Ga. 182; Wright v. Illinois, etc., Telephone Co., 20 Iowa 195; Merseve v. Shine, 37 Iowa 253; Wright v. Abbott, 160 Mass. 395; Mitchell v. Ehle, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 595.

Deliberate Judgment.—"A verdict," says the court, in Burke v. Magee, 27 Neb. 156, "should be the result of deliberate judgment, not a chance or hazard."

2. Merely Experimental.—The practice of marking on slips of paper the amount which each juror is willing to find, and dividing the aggregate by twelve, simply resorted to for the purpose of seeing "how near they could come together," without any previous agreement to abide by the result, does not invalidate a verdict rendered for the quotient. Conklin v. Hill, 2 Mow. Pr. (N. Y.) 6; Lee v. Clute, 10 Nev. 149; Batterson v. State, 63 Ind. 531; Hamilton v. Des Moines Valley R. Co., 36 Iowa 31; Haight v. Hoyt, 50 Conn. 583; St. Clair v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 29 Mo. App. 76; Dodge v. Carroll, 59 N. H. 237. As to this practice in criminal cases, see Cochlin v. People, 93 Ill. 410; Batterson v. State, 63 Ind. 531; Glidewell v. State, 15 Lea (Tenn.) 133; Warren v. State, 9 Tex. App. 619; 35 Am. Rep. 745; Thompson's Case, 8 Gratt. (Va.) 638.

disfavor;¹ and where there is no previous agreement to abide by the result of such an operation, a subsequent finding, identical in terms or amount, will not be disturbed on this account.² But let a previous agreement to adopt the contingent and altogether uncertain result of the experiment be shown, and all jurisdictions seem to be uniform in proclaiming the absolute nullity of such a verdict.³

1. A Reprehensible Practice.—The practice of jurors marking severally the amount of damages which they individually were in favor of finding for the plaintiff, and dividing the aggregate of these amounts by the number of jurors, is a reprehensible one. A fair verdict, the deliberate opinion of the jurors upon the evidence, could scarcely in this manner be obtained. Some of the jurors would mark a much larger sum than their candid judgment would sanction, in order to make up the expected deficiency of others, and so the honest jurors would be deceived, and a dishonest verdict obtained. Haight v. Hoyt, 50 Conn. 583.

As a Last Resort.—Where, in an action for damages, the witnesses differ as to the value of the property injured, the ordinary rules of weighing testimony, such as honesty, disinterestedness, opportunity for knowledge and intelligence, should be resorted to before attempting to reach a satisfactory result by averaging the values sworn to. Harvey v. Boswell, 65 Ga. 550. And see Kansas City R. Co. v. Ryan, 49 Kan. 1.

Instruction as to Impropriety.—The court may instruct the jury that it is an improper proceeding for them to arrive at a verdict by each setting down the amount, if any, he is in favor of awarding the plaintiff, and dividing the aggregate by twelve. Sharp v. Kansas City Cable R. Co., 114 Mo. 94.

Previous Agreement.—If jurors previously agree to a particular method of arriving at a verdict and to abide by the contingent result at all events, without reserving to themselves the liberty of dissenting, the verdict should be set aside, but if the mode is adopted merely for the sake of arriving at a reasonable amount, without binding the jurors by the result, the verdict should stand. Lee v. Clute, 10 Nev. 149.

Quotient as Term of Imprisonment.—The fact that the jury, in fixing upon the term of imprisonment to be served by the defendant, took the quotient, resulting from the aggregate of the periods indicated by each juror divided by the number of jurors, as a proposition merely of the term of imprisonment, is not improper, if not done pursuant to a previous agreement to accept such quotient as such term. Batterson v. State, 63 Ind. 531.

(a) How Improper Methods of Arriving at Verdict May Be Shown.—The general rule of law on this subject, as it exists both in England and in the United States, forbids the reception of a juror's testimony, introduced for the purpose of impeaching the verdict in which he has concurred.¹ Hence, it follows that a resort to illegal practices in the jury room, whereby litigants are deprived of the exercise of that sound judgment, and thoughtful consideration of the merits of the controversy, which they have a right to expect

Even where it is uncertain whether or not there was a previous agreement to abide by the quotient, it having been shown that at least four of the jurors believed themselves so bound, a verdict so rendered should be set aside. Johnson v. Husband, 22 Kan. 277.

Verdict by Lot.—The jury being unable to find a verdict, one of the jurors proposed that a certain number of ballots be cast, and that a verdict be rendered for the party receiving the majority of the ballots. This was agreed to, and a verdict rendered in pursuance thereof. Upon appeal, the court maintained that the parties were thus deprived of their right to a verdict according to the consciences of the majority of the jury, and that as the verdict was the mere creature of an agreement in which the jurors had bound themselves in advance, it must not stand. Houk v. Allen, 126 Ind. 568.

Where the jury had been out some twelve hours, they agreed that a certain number of ballots be cast and counted, and if either the plaintiff or defendant received a majority of the ballots so cast that the verdict should be returned for the party receiving such majority, and the agreement was carried out, a verdict being returned in accordance therewith. The court held that a verdict could not be arrived at lawfully in that way, and in the opinion it was said: "It is very clear that the rights of the parties were not determined according to the judgment or consciences of the members of the jury, as was their right, but that the verdict was the mere creature of the agreement to which the jurors bound themselves in advance of the verdict." Houk v. Allen, 126 Ind. 568.

Where an agreement on the part of the jurors, that the amount of the recovery should be determined by each marking down a sum and dividing the aggregate by twelve, rendered the verdict invalid in part, it was held that the valid portion might be permitted to stand if the defendant would enter a remittitur as to the excess. Fuller v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 31 Iowa 211.

No Express Agreement.—In Williams v. State, 15 Lea (Tenn.) 129; 54 Am. Rep. 404, it did not appear that there had been any express previous agreement to abide by the quotient, but the court, nevertheless, held that it was not the deliberate judgment of each member of the jury upon the evidence, and hence that it must be set aside.

1. In England, it seems to have been settled finally that the affidavit of a juror will not be received to show that the verdict was determined by lot. Vaise v. Delaval, 1 T. R. 11; Owen v. Warburton, 1 Bos. & P. 326; Straker v. Graham, 7 Dowl. Pr. Cas. 223; Aylett v. Jewell, 2 W. Bl. 1299.

Where some of the jurors subsequently confessed to the defendant's attorney that the jury drew lots to determine their verdict, such evidence was held to be incompetent to establish ground for a new trial. Aylett v. Jewell, 2 W. Bl. 1299.

In the United States, there has been some conflict of judicial opinion upon the question, especially in the earlier cases, but the practice appears now to be generally settled to reject the testimony of the jurors when offered to impeach their verdict. Bulls' Case, 14 Gratt. (Va.) 613. To this effect see the following adjudications:

Harrison v. Rowan, 4 Wash. (U. S.) 32; Stanton v. State, 13 Ark. 317; Wilson v. Berryman, 5 Cal. 44; 63 Am. Dec. 78; State v. Freeman, 5 Conn. 348; Coker v. Hayes, 16 Fla. 368; *Goodwin v. Connecticut.—The verdict in Warner v. Robinson, 1 Root (Conn.) 194, was obtained by marking down the amount which each juror favored and dividing the aggregate by twelve; which proceeding being proved by inquiry of the jurors, the verdict was set aside. The courts of this state, however, have come to take a different view of the question, for Hosmer, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court, in State v. Freeman, 5 Conn. 348, and considering the question of the admissibility of the testimony of jurors to impeach their verdict, concludes by saying: "The opinion of almost the whole legal world is adverse to the reception of the testimony in question, and, in my opinion, on invincible foundations." Meade v. Smith, 16 Conn. 346.

Illinois.—In an early Illinois case, it was held that the affidavit of a juror who tried the cause may be received to prove improper conduct on the part of the jury. Sawyer v. Stephenson, 1 Ill. 24. This position, however, did not long remain unassailed, for in the case of Forester v. Guard, 1 Ill. 74; 12 Am. Dec. 141, the court says: "The statements of jurors ought not to be received to impeach their verdicts." Later, in Smith v. Eames, 4 Ill. 76; 36 Am. Dec. 515, this case of Forester v. Guard is cited and the rule laid down therein approved, subject, however, to one exception. "There is one class of cases," say the court, "where the affidavits of jurors may be received to impeach their verdict, and that is where a part of them swear that they never consented to any verdict."

Massachusetts.—In Grinnell v. Phillips, 1 Mass. 540, one of the jury, being offered as a witness by the defendant, was admitted to be sworn and examined respecting the conduct of the jury in finding the verdict. This authority, however, is regarded as overruled in Woodward v. Leavitt, 107 Mass. 453; 9 Am. Rep. 49. See also Whitney v. Whitman, 5 Mass. 405; Bridge v. Eggleston, 14 Mass. 245; 7 Am. Dec. 209; Hannum v. Belchertown, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 311; Cook v. Castner, 9 Cush.

(Mass.) 266; Bridgewater v. Plymouth, 97 Mass. 382.

New Jersey.—In the case of Morrow v. McLennen, 3 N. J. L. 477, it seems that certain acts of misconduct on the part of the jury were established by the affidavit of one of the jurors in the case, and the same facts were corroborated in several respects by the affidavit of the officer in charge of the jury. The court does not advert to, nor does its attention seem to have been called to the fact that the knowledge was acquired from a member of the jury, but it simply proceeds to condemn the occurrences in the jury room as disclosed by the affidavit of the juror, and judgment rendered on the verdict was reversed.

The case of Brewster v. Thompson, 1 N. J. L. 32, expressly declares that the verdict may not be impeached by the affidavit of one of the jurors as to the misconduct of the jury. This seems to be the opinion of the court in Kennedy v. Kennedy, 18 N. J. L. 450, and it is so held in Hutchinson v. Consumers' Coal Co., 36 N. J. L. 24. We suppose, on the authority of these cases, that the doctrine may be regarded as settled in this state, notwithstanding the case of Morrow v. McLennen, 3 N. J. L. 477.

New York.—In Smith v. Cheetham, 3 Cal. (N. Y.) 57, the majority of the court were of the opinion that confessions of the jurors to the constable, as well as their affidavits stating that the amount of their verdict was ascertained by each juror marking down an amount, and then dividing the aggregate by twelve, were admissible to establish the fact. This decision was rendered in 1805. That the rule has since changed may be seen by reference to the adjudications in this state cited in the list of cases above. For example, Harris, J., in the case of People v. Hartung, 4 Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 315, says: "No rule of law is better settled than that the evidence of the jurors is not to be allowed for the purpose of impeaching or in any way impairing the effect of their verdict. The doctrine has now been established in England. It has been maintained with singular steadiness and unanimity in the United States."

But aside from all adjudications, the doctrine rests upon the clearest principles of public policy. It is infinitely better that irregularities, which undoubtedly sometimes occur in the jury room, should be tolerated rather than to throw open the doors and allow every disappointed party to intrude into its secrets. The most enlightened jurists have united in deprecating the mischiefs which would flow from such a license."

Balcom, J., in Green v. Bliss, 12 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 428, said: "The law is too well settled to admit of argument, that the affidavits of jurors are not receivable to impeach their verdict, for mistake or error in respect to the merits of the case; or of their own misconduct, or that of their fellows."

"Mischievous and Dangerous."—Motion for a new trial was made on the ground of misconduct of the foreman of the jury who tried the cause. To prove this misconduct, numerous affidavits were produced setting forth declarations of certain of the jurors, after the delivery of their verdict in court. A motion for a new trial was refused. Day, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It would be a most mischievous and dangerous thing to allow verdicts to be overturned or set aside upon the loose, random declarations of jurymen after they have been discharged, not on oath, to third persons, concerning the circumstances upon which they made up their verdict while they were on oath, previous to their delivering their verdict into court. It would open such a door for tampering with weak and indiscreet men that it would render all verdicts insecure; and, therefore, the law has widely guarded against all such after declarations and has considered them as unworthy of notice. Indeed, so cautious has the law been upon this subject that the court will not receive even the affidavits of jurors themselves, to impeach their own verdicts after they are delivered in, and recorded in court." Price v. McIlvain, 3 Brev. (S. Car.) 419.

In Price v. Warren, 1 Hen. & M. (Va.) 385, the court unanimously affirmed the judgment of the district court, refusing a new trial on the affidavits of two of the jurors that they were alone influenced in finding for the plaintiff by a fact stated in the jury room by one of the jury, the ground assigned for such refusal being because it would be dangerous to attempt a new trial on such information from the jurymen, and the new trial would be against the justice of the case. See also Shobe v. Bell, 1 Rand. (Va.) 39.

In Tucker v. Kingstown, 5 R. I. 558, of the jury, must, if at all, be established by the testimony of the officer in charge, or some chance witness to the proceeding.¹

affidavits of jurymen as to what took place in the jury room, and the grounds upon which they found their verdict, were offered to impeach the verdict and rejected.

A Pernicious Practice.—"It would be a most pernicious practice, and in its consequences dangerous to this much valued mode of trial, to permit a verdict, openly and solemnly declared in court, to be subverted by going behind it and inquiring into the secrets of the jury room to find out from some of the members of that body what was the process by which they or others had come to the result declared by their verdict." Washington, J., in Harrison v. Rowan, 4 Wash. (U. S.) 32.

Seriously Objectionable.—In Stanton v. State, 13 Ark. 317, it is declared that there are serious objections to the practice of allowing a juror, who concurred in rendering a verdict, to make an affidavit to impeach it.

Misconduct of Party—Admissible.—In Reynolds v. Champlain Transp. Co., 9 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 7, it was held that, while the affidavits of jurors would not be received to impeach the verdict for mistake or error in respect to the merits, in order to prove irregularity or misconduct on the part of the juror testifying, or of his fellows, there is no objection to the reception of such testimony for the purpose of showing improper conduct on the part of one of the parties to the cause. Thomas v. Chapman, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 98.

Misconduct of Officer—Admissible.—Affidavits of jurors may be received to show the misconduct of the officer in charge. Thomas v. Chapman, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 98.

But this is not the doctrine as declared in Doran v. Shaw, 3 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 411. Here it is held that the evidence of jurors is not admissible to prove the improper conduct of the attending officer, unless upon the prosecution of such officer for such improper conduct.

In admitting the affidavit of a juror to prove the misconduct of one of the parties, or the officer in charge, it might not infrequently happen that it would necessarily involve an account of his (the juror's), own impropriety, as where a juror swears that he only agreed to the verdict in consequence of the statement of the officer. In such case, it would seem that such portion of the testimony (in conformity with the well established rule as stated in the text) as applies to the juror's misconduct, will be ignored, and only such part as tends to prove the misconduct of the officer, or a party to the suit, will be regarded. Thomas v. Chapman, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 98.

In a few States the general rule excluding the testimony of jurors to impeach their verdict, does not prevail. This is noticeably the case in Iowa, Tennessee, and Texas.

Iowa.—In this state, the practice of establishing by the affidavits of jurors the fact that the verdict was the result of the "average process," has been approved. See Wright v. Illinois, etc., Telephone Co., 20 Iowa 195; Darland v. Wade, 48 Iowa 547.

In Tennessee, it has been held that the testimony of jurors is admissible, and may be sufficient to set aside a verdict on the ground of their misconduct. It was so held in the case of Crawford v. State, 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 60; 24 Am. Dec. 467, which was a capital prosecution. In this instance, affidavits of jurymen were received to the effect that one member of the jury assented to the verdict, under the impression that the governor would yield to the recommendation of the jury to pardon the prisoner; for this reason, a new trial was awarded. This case was followed by Cochran v. State, 7 Humph. (Tenn.) 544, under circumstances very similar. It is admitted, however, in Hudson v. State, 9 Yerg. (Tenn.) 408, to be a dangerous principle which should not be extended a single step beyond the extent to which it had already been carried. In Norris v. State, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 333; 39 Am. Dec. 175, the court, adhering to this latter view, examined the prior cases on the subject to ascertain to what extent the practice had prevailed, and modified the rule accordingly.

In Texas, there is a statute providing that such misconduct of the jury as affects the fairness of the trial vitiates the verdict and may be shown by the affidavit of a juror. Paschall's Texas Digest, art. 3187; Anschicks v. State, 6 Tex. App. 524; Jack v. State, 26 Tex. 4.

1. The testimony of the sheriff in

This rule, however, does not exclude the affidavits of jurymen to prove honest mistake on the part of the jury,¹ misentry of the charge is competent to disclose what transpires in the jury room. In Wilson v. Berryman, 5 Cal. 44, 63 Am. Dec. 78, the fact that the verdict was arrived at by the average process, was established by the testimony of the sheriff and the verdict accordingly set aside. See Dana v. Tucker, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 487; Morrow v. McLennen, 3 N. J. L. 477; Kennedy v. Kennedy, 18 N. J. L. 450; Harrison v. Rowan, 4 Wash. (U. S.) 32.

In Wright v. Abbott, 160 Mass. 395, a verdict for the plaintiff was set aside and a new trial granted, on the testimony of the deputy sheriff in charge of the jury to the effect that they had arrived at their verdict by lot. The plaintiff excepted to the admission of this affidavit, but Field, C. J., in sustaining its admissibility, said that while it was certainly not the duty of the officer in charge to listen to the deliberations of the jury, that if he had done so, his testimony could not be excluded.

The objection that the admissibility of the testimony of the officer in charge of the jury, places the verdict entirely at his mercy, is deprived of its force by a reference to the rule which, though excluding affidavits of jurors to impeach, yet admits such testimony in support of the verdict. This, it is said, will always be found a sufficient check against corruption on the part of the officer in charge. Wilson v. Berryman, 5 Cal. 44; 63 Am. Dec. 78. And see Green v. Bliss, 12 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 428, where the affidavit of the constable was not allowed to overturn the verdict in opposition to the sworn declarations of two of the jury supporting the verdict. In this case it was held that the affidavit of the constable, who had charge of the jury, to the effect that the jury did not agree upon the verdict that was signed and sealed by their foreman, before he allowed them to separate, is the felo de se of his credibility; he violated his sworn duty to keep the jury together until they agreed on a verdict, or his affidavit is untrue.

Chance Witness.—In the case of Vaise v. Delaval, 1 T. R. 11, where the verdict was obtained by tossing up a coin, Lord Mansfield said that the court could not receive an affidavit to this effect from any of the jurors themselves, in whom such conduct was a very high misdemeanor, but that the court must derive its knowledge from some other source, as from some person who saw the transaction through a window or by some other means.

Thus, in Harrison v. Rowan, 4 Wash. (U. S.) 32, the testimony of the keeper of the inn where the jury were confined was offered for the purpose of impeaching the verdict, and was received.

As a matter of course, the affidavit of a party based upon information and belief, derived from the statement of members of a jury, is entitled to no more weight than the affidavit of the juror himself. If it were, the rule excluding the testimony of the jurors themselves would be deprived of its salutary effect. Coker v. Hayes, 16 Fla. 368.

1. In Johnson v. Davenport, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 390, the court, in refusing a new trial, said: "The testimony of one or more of the jurors to prove such misconduct in a jury as would invalidate their verdict, or to question the purity of the motives by which they had been influenced in rendering it, or to explain the ground, either of law or of fact, which influenced them, with a view to impeaching the verdict which they had returned, is inadmissible according to the whole current of modern decisions. . . . The dangerous tendency of receiving testimony of the jurors, for such a purpose, is too obvious to require comment." "It is, indeed, very difficult," the court continues, "to lay down any precise rule, the application of which to each particular case would be sufficient to determine whether the affidavits of the jurors ought to be received to invalidate their verdict. It seems to be universally agreed, that if received at all, it should be with great caution, and we are of opinion, that their admissibility should be confined to cases of mistake clearly made out, and which may be conceded as true, without subjecting the jury to any imputation of impure motives or palpable impropriety of conduct; and in relation to the proof of which mistake by their affidavits, there should be no reasonable ground for suspicion, that they might have been tampered with."

verdict,¹ misdirection by the judge,² or that there was in truth no verdict, as where it was only agreed to by a portion;³ nor has Mistake as to Legal Effect.—In Moffett v. Bowman, 6 Gratt. (Va.) 219, a motion was made for a new trial, founded on the affidavit of nine of the jurors stating that the verdict as returned and recorded did not contain the verdict which they intended to render, and that the same was returned by them under a mistake as to its legal effect. The manner in which the mistake was made was also stated in the affidavit. The trial court overruled the motion, but the appellate court, being of opinion, from the evidence adduced on the motion for a new trial, that the intention of the jury was not accomplished by their verdict, and not being satisfied with the verdict on the merits, reversed the judgment and awarded a new trial.

Erroneous Use of Legal Terms.—In Littell v. Larrabee, 2 Me. 37; 11 Am. Dec. 43, the action was a writ of entry, and the court received the affidavits of jurors to show that they intended to find for the tenant, whereas, by mistake in the legal terms, they returned a verdict for demandant and thereon set the verdict aside.

Belief That Majority Prevails.—In Cochran v. Street, 1 Wash. (Va.) 79, the jury were divided in opinion, but the minority believing that the opinion of the majority was to prevail, therefore, concurred in the verdict. The court admitted that to meddle with the verdict of the jury upon the evidence of some of the jurors is a delicate business, and should be proceeded in with caution to prevent the mischief of the jurymen being tampered with, and referred with approbation to the decision of Lord Mansfield in Vaise v. Delaval, 1 T. R. 11. But as it was clear that the verdict was found under a mistake, the fact having been proved by a large majority of the jury and denied by none of them, and it not appearing that there had been any tampering with them to obtain the information, the court awarded a new trial. See also Bull's Case, 14 Gratt. (Va.) 630.

Mistake in Announcing.—The affidavits of jurors are competent evidence to prove a mistake in announcing the verdict actually agreed on. Cogan v. Eben, 1 Burr. 383; Jackson v. Dickinson, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 309; 8 Am. Dec. 236; Sargent v. —, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 106;

Smith v. Cheetham, 3 Cal. (N. Y.) 57; Thomas v. Chapman, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 98; Dalrymple v. Williams, 63 N. Y. 361; 20 Am. Rep. 544; Blackley v. Sheldon, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 32; Cochran v. Street, 1 Wash. (Va.) 79.

1. Affidavits of jurymen as to the extent and character of their private deliberations, cannot be received to impeach or qualify their verdict, but where the verdict has been erroneously stated to the court or erroneously entered by the clerk, the affidavits of jurors may be received to correct such error. Dayton v. Church (Brooklyn City Ct.), 7 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 367; Jackson v. Dickinson, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 309; 8 Am. Dec. 236; Sargent v. —, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 106.

The question submitted to the jury in Jackson v. Dickinson, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 309; 8 Am. Dec. 236, was as to usury in a certain mortgage, and they found by their verdict that there was usury in the note, but meaning another note than that connected with the mortgage. On returning their verdict, the court inquired of the jury if they intended to find that the usury in the note was connected with the mortgage, to which one of the jury replied that they did not intend to so find. But the judge did not hear this reply and entered the verdict. The affidavits of the jurors were, against objections, received to show these facts, and a new trial was granted thereon.

2. It has been held that the affidavits of jurors are admissible to show a mistake in making up their verdict, which arises from circumstances arising at the trial, which are equivalent to a misdirection by the judge. Sargent v. —, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 106; Ex. p. Caykendoll, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 53.

3. Smith v. Eames, 4 Ill. 76; 36 Am. Dec. 515; Bull's Case, 14 Gratt. (Va.) 630.

But where a verdict has been returned by the foreman, read to the jury without dissent, and the jury have separated, an affidavit of one of them that he did not agree to the verdict, so it is held in Breck v. Blanchard, 27 N. H. 100, cannot be received. And see Clark v. Read, 5 N. J. L. 486.

The rule on this subject, as approved in Doran v. Shaw, 3 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 411, is that jurors may not be permitted there ever been objection to a resort to such evidence in support of the verdict,¹ with the qualification, adopted in some jurisdictions, that only such testimony as has reference to the individual conduct of a juror may be offered, and not that respecting the conduct of the jury as a whole.²

to impeach the verdict which they have rendered, though they may prove that there was no verdict, or show that the verdict as rendered was not intended. See also Taylor v. Giger, Hard. (Ky.) 595; Steele v. Logan, 3 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 394.

1. Wilson v. Berryman, 5 Cal. 44; 63 Am. Dec. 78; Barlow v. State, 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 114; Sawyer v. Hopkins, 22 Me. 268; Tenny v. Evans, 13 N. H. 462; 40 Am. Dec. 166; Kennedy v. Kennedy, 18 N. J. L. 450; Hackley v. Hastie, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 252; Dana v. Tucker, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 487; Green v. Bliss, 12 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 428; Moore v. New York El. R. Co., 15 Daly (N. Y.) 506; O'Brien v. Merchants' F. Ins. Co., 38 N. Y. Super. Ct. 482; Dalrymple v. Williams, 63 N. Y. 361; 20 Am. Rep. 544; Hodgkins v. Mead, 119 N. Y. 166; Koiner v. Rankin, 11 Gratt. (Va.) 420. And see State v. Hascall, 6 N. H. 352.

It appears in the opinion of the court, in Dana v. Tucker, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 487, "The better opinion is, and such is the rule adopted by the court, that the affidavits of jurors are not to be received to impeach a verdict, but they will be admitted in exculpation of the jurors, and in support of their verdict."

Affidavits to Explain.—That the affidavits of jurors are admissible to explain the verdict, would seem a natural deduction from the rule allowing such testimony in support; for an explanation which would validate a verdict otherwise invalid for uncertainty or ambiguity, certainly would be in the nature of testimony to uphold, support, or sustain. That the affidavits of jurors are competent to explain their verdict, see Hodgkins v. Mead (Brooklyn City Ct.), 16 Civ. Pro. Rep. (N. Y.) 434; Dalrymple v. Williams, 63 N. Y. 361; 20 Am. Rep. 544. This is denied, however, in Lloyd v. McClure, 2 Greene (Iowa) 139. In this case the court said: "The affidavits of the jurors were introduced in explanation of their verdict and in relation to what items they had allowed and what rejected. Jurors are not permitted in this manner to explain or justify a verdict. When their verdict has been attacked, they have in some instances been permitted to introduce affidavits in support of their verdict; but according to the settled doctrine, for no other purpose." In another Iowa case, Ward v. Thompson, 48 Iowa 588, it is held that "affidavits of jurors are not admissible to show the understanding of the members of the jury."

2. Some English adjudications go to the extreme of holding that the affidavit of a juror may not be received respecting any occurrence in the jury room, whether to impugn, or in support of their verdict. In Straker v. Graham, 7 Dowl. Pr. Cas. 223, Baron Alderson said: "It is entirely against public policy to allow a jurymen to make affidavit of anything that passes in agreeing to a verdict." This statement was quoted with approval by Chief Justice Tindall in Burgess v. Langley, as reported in 1 D. & L. 21. Raphael v. Bank of England, 17 C. B. 161, was a similar instance; upon the offer of affidavits of jurors in support of a motion for a new trial, Willes, J., said: "If the affidavits are to be taken as a statement of something that passed in the jury room, they clearly are not admissible."

However, this rule was held not to exclude the testimony of a juror as to his own individual conduct, but only as to the deliberations in the jury room, or other circumstances relating to the trial. Thus, in Ramadge v. Ryan, 9 Bing. 333, upon motion for a new trial, affidavits were produced that one of the jurors, on the day before the trial, had expressed his surprise about a verdict in a similar case and said: "I shall be on the jury to-morrow, and I will take care that the verdict does not go that way." The court thereupon granted a rule to show cause. Tindall, C. J., saying that the juror would "then have an opportunity of answering the matters with which he is now charged." The juror made an affidavit denying the words alleged to have been used by him, which the court received, and on the strength of it refused a new trial. At

It must be admitted that some judicatures have, with much earnestness and force, and upon grounds not only plausible but substantial, argued in favor of allowing a member of a jury to testify to a resort to those devices productive of chance and quotient verdicts;¹ but the great weight of authority, and particularly of the hearing of the rule, the foreman of the jury also made an affidavit stating that neither he nor any of the jurors was influenced by anything which the accused juror said or did at the trial, but the court refused to receive it, and observed that those in support of the application, referred only to the conduct of the juror before he entered the jury box.

In Addison v. Williamson, 5 Jur. 466, Baron Alderson admitted an affidavit of a juror, offered in support of the verdict, to operate so far as to contradict his having made declarations attributed to him by affidavits of other persons, but excluded so much of it as stated other circumstances relating to the trial. To the same effect, see Standewick v. Hopkins, 14 L. J. Q. B. 16; Rolle, C. J., in Taylor v. Webb, Trials per Pais 224.

In the United States it has been similarly held in several of the states, that the testimony of jurors, even in support of the verdict, is not admissible where it includes statements as to the general conduct of the jury during the progress of the trial, or the mode in which their verdict was arrived at, or made up. But still conforming to the English view of the subject, it is held that this does not exclude the testimony of a juror to facts touching his own conduct or acts when separated from his fellows, or acts or declarations of other persons with or to him. Capen v. Stoughton, 16 Gray (Mass.) 364; Bridgewater v. Plymouth, 97 Mass. 382; Woodward v. Leavitt, 107 Mass. 453; 9 Am. Rep. 49; Heffron v. Gallepe, 55 Me. 563; McCorkle v. Binns, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 340; 6 Am. Dec. 420. See also Haskell v. Becket, 3 Me. 92; Taylor v. Greely, 3 Me. 204; Sawyer v. Hopkins, 22 Me. 268.

1. In Wright v. Illinois, etc., Tel. Co., 20 Iowa 209, after an extensive review of the authorities on this subject, it is held that each case seems to have been decided, not on any recognized or fixed principle, but upon its own supposed merits, according to the individual views of the judge delivering the opinion of the court deciding the case; and although previous cases are sometimes cited, the question seems very often to have been treated as one of first impression. Under such circumstances, it is necessarily impossible to deduce a general rule from, or state one that will be consistent with, all the cases. The court continues: "While we do not feel entirely confident of its correctness, nor state it without considerable hesitation, yet we are not without that assurance, which, under the circumstances, justifies us in laying down the following as the true rule: That affidavits of jurors may be received for the purpose of avoiding a verdict, to show any matter occurring during the trial or in the jury room, which does not essentially inhere in the verdict itself, as that a juror was improperly approached by a party, his agent, or attorney; that witnesses or others conversed as to the facts or merits of the cause, out of court and in the presence of jurors; that the verdict was determined by aggregation and average or by lot, or game of chance or other artifice or improper manner; but that such affidavit to avoid the verdict may not be received to show any matter which does essentially inhere in the verdict itself, as that the juror did not assent to the verdict; that he misunderstood the instructions of the court; the statements of the witnesses or pleadings in the case; that he was unduly influenced by the statements or otherwise of his fellow jurors, or mistaken in his calculations of judgment, or other matter resting alone in the juror's breast." The court explains: "That the verdict was obtained by lot, for instance, is a fact independent of the verdict itself, and which is not necessarily involved in it. While every verdict necessarily involves the pleadings, the evidence, the instructions, the deliberation, conversations, debates and judgments of the jurors themselves; and the effect or influence of any of these upon the juror's mind, must rest in his own breast, and he is and ought to be concluded thereon by his solemn assent to and rendition of the verdict. To allow a juror to make affidavit against the modern decisions, is arrayed against the admissibility of such evidence.¹

(4) Responsiveness.—The members of a jury are sworn to try the issues joined between the parties. When, therefore, their verdict does not include a finding upon every controverted matter-of-fact material to the merits of the cause, such partial performance of their duty is as inoperative and ineffective as no performance at all.² A verdict may be defective in this respect, either by conclusiveness of the verdict, by reason of and as to the effect and influence of any of these matters upon his mind, which in their very nature are, though untrue, incapable of disproof, would be practically to open the jury room to the importunities and appliances of parties and their attorneys, and, of course, thereby to unsettle verdicts and destroy their sanctity and conclusiveness. But to receive the affidavit of a juror as to the independent fact that the verdict was obtained by lot, or game of chance, or the like, is to receive his testimony as to a fact, which, if not true, can be readily and certainly disproved by his fellow jurors; and to hear such proof would have a tendency to diminish such practices, and to purify the jury room, by rendering such improprieties capable and probable of exposure, and consequently deterring jurors from resorting to them." See Wilkins v. Bent, 66 Iowa 531.

An action was brought on a charter party whereby the defendant was to pay fifty guineas a month, the plaintiff claiming five hundred pounds, to which the defendant pleaded that he had paid fifty guineas a month for all the time the ship was in his service. Issue having been taken, the jury found that three hundred and fifty-seven pounds remained unpaid, but said nothing as to the rest of the five hundred pounds. The judgment entered on this verdict was reversed. Hooper v. Sheperd, a variance from the issue joined,¹ or by failing to determine one of several material issues.² A forcible illustration of a verdict invalid for the former reason, was afforded by an action of assumpsit instituted against a guardian for a promise made by an extravagant ward, the guardian pleading that he never promised, while Stra. 1089; Finymore v. Sanky, Cro. Eliz. 133.

In Jenkins v. Parkhill, 25 Ind. 473, which was an action against two defendants, the plaintiff's complaint contained four paragraphs. The jury tried the case and returned a verdict for the plaintiff upon the first two paragraphs of the complaint as against both defendants, and upon the last two paragraphs of the complaint as against one only of the defendants, finding neither for nor against the other defendant on the last two paragraphs. In the lower court, there was a motion for a venire facias de novo, on the ground that the verdict was defective in not finding for or against one of the defendants on the issues joined in the last two paragraphs of the complaint, but the motion was overruled, as was also the motion for a new trial. On appeal, it was held by the supreme court that the venire facias de novo should have been awarded, the court, in effect, saying: "If the jury finds but part of the matter put in issue, and says nothing as to the rest, the verdict is ill, and a venire facias de novo shall issue if no judgment has been given; but if judgment has been pronounced, it will be reversed."

1. Substantial Variance from Issue.—In an action of debt on a bond, with condition, the issue submitted to the jury was whether the condition had been performed or not. Instead of determining this question, the verdict declared that the bond in the declaration mentioned, was the deed of the defendant, and that there was justly due upon said bond a certain sum of money. Under such circumstances, an opportunity was afforded for the application of the rule that a verdict is bad if it varies from the issue in a substantial matter, or if it finds only a part of that which is in issue. The reason of this rule is obvious. It results from the nature and the end of the pleading. Patterson v. U. S., 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 221.

In Groves v. Bailey, 24 Miss. 588, the plaintiffs in error commenced suit by attachment against the defendants in error, on the ground that said defendants "had concealed their effects," so that the plaintiffs' claim could not be made by the ordinary process of law. The defendants appeared and pleaded to the attachment, "that they had not concealed their effects so that the plaintiffs' claim could not be made by law." To this plea, the plaintiffs replied that "at the time of suing out the attachment, the defendants had concealed their effects, so that the plaintiffs' claim could not be made by ordinary process of law." Upon the issue thus presented a jury was impaneled, who found "that the defendants were not concealing their effects at the time of suing out such attachment, so that the claim of the said plaintiffs would be defeated, and that there was not good cause to sue out the attachment." The appellate court declared that the verdict of the jury was clearly not in accordance with the issue made by the parties. The affidavit and replication both stated that the concealment had taken place before the attachment was sued out, and the verdict said that the defendants were not concealing their effects as at the time of suing out the writ. This may have been true and not inconsistent with the affidavit and replication, which did not speak of a concealment of effects then going on, but of one having already taken place. The fact that the concealment had been accomplished would only make the fact found by the verdict true, but immaterial, that the defendants were not, at the date of the writ, concealing their effects. The judgment pronounced on this verdict was reversed.

Under Sanborn & Berryman Annot. Stat., § 4697, which provides that when a special plea of insanity is interposed in a criminal case, that issue is to be first tried by a jury, and their verdict thereon must be confined to that issue, a verdict in such a case, "we find the man sane when he committed the crime," shows that the jury misconceived the issue submitted to them, and it should be set aside and a new trial granted. Hoiss v. State, 79 Wis. 513.

2. "The general rule," says the court, in Wood v. McGuire, 17 Ga. 361; 63 Am. Dec. 246, "is that the verdict must comprehend the whole issue or issues submitted to the jury in a particular cause; otherwise, the judgment founded on it must be reversed." The rule is the same where the verdict does not find the whole of a single issue, but only a part thereof, as where it does not find all of several issues. Bemus v. Beekman, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 667.

Undetermined Issues.—In Meighen v. Strong, 6 Minn. 117; 80 Am. Dec. 441, which was an action instituted for the purpose of determining an adverse claim of the defendants to certain real property, brought under an act of legislature designing to give a party in possession of real property, the same facilities for testing the merits of adverse claims of title that are always at hand for those who are excluded from the possession, but claim an estate therein, adverse to that of the occupant; the plaintiff made the necessary allegation as to his possession, and the defendants by their answer put his possession directly in issue. The verdict of the jury was in special form and ignored this issue. The supreme court held, on this account, that the verdict fell far short of determining the issue joined between the parties, and hence not sufficient to warrant a judgment.

Where issue was joined upon the right of property in two slaves, Charles and Fannie, and the verdict found in favor of the defendant was for two negroes, Charles and Lucy, the verdict was adjudged improper. McCoy v. Rives, 1 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 592.

In an action of detinue for eight slaves, the jury found for the plaintiff and assessed the value of the slaves sued for, naming, however, only seven of them. The verdict was held to be insufficient. Traun v. Wittick, 27 Ala. 571.

In Miller v. Trets, Ld. Raym. 324, an information was exhibited against the defendant for selling lace and silks. The jury found him guilty of selling lace but said nothing as to the silks; the verdict was not sustained.

By statute in Alabama, unlawful detainer and forcible detainer are made distinct injuries; hence, where the complaint was for forcible entry and detainer, a verdict declaring the defendant guilty of unlawful detainer only, does not respond to both issues. Grice v. Ferguson, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 36.

Inconclusiveness.—A minor, leaving his father's house in one state, traveled into an adjoining state for the purpose of obtaining employment. His employer, failing to pay him the agreed compensation, was sued therefor, upon the attainment of full age by the party. The jury were instructed, and properly, as it was held that the plaintiff might recover if his father had emancipated him, or given him his time while he worked for the defendant, or waived the right to recover for his services. Under this instruction, the jury returned a verdict that there was "no evidence that the plaintiff, during the time that he was in the employ of the defendant, was legally emancipated." A general verdict for the defendant was thereupon drawn up by the court and affirmed by the jury. The supreme court declared that the judgment rendered thereon could not be allowed to stand, as the finding of the jury did not necessarily disprove the plaintiff's right to recover. Stiles v. Granville, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 458.

A and B were sued in covenant for the alleged non-performance of the stipulations of a bond. The suit abated on account of the death of one of the defendants, and the jury returned a verdict: "That the surviving defendant hath not paid the plaintiff the debt in the declaration mentioned, as the plaintiff by replying hath alleged." The appellate court held that such a verdict was defective in that it did not negative the payment of the money by the deceased defendant. Triplet v. Micou, 1 Rand. (Va.) 269. And see Buckner v. Blair, 2 Munf. (Va.) 336; Green v. Dulany, 2 Munf. (Va.) 518.

Where the question involved in the issue was whether certain parties had promised jointly, a verdict simply that they were not partners, as had been alleged, was not responsive to the issue. The parties might have promised jointly, although not partners. Jewett v. Davis, 6 N. H. 518.

Where the declaration charged that the defendant promised to do a particular act, and the defendant pleaded that he promised jointly with another, so that the issue was, whether he promised jointly or alone, a verdict that the defendant "did undertake and promise in manner and form as the plaintiff complained," was considered insufficient, for it did not decide whether he promised jointly or alone. Bishop v. Kaye, 3 B. & Ald. 605.

In an action of detinue, the defendant pleaded, first, non detinet; second,

a release; third, Statute of Limitations. Issue was taken on the second and third pleas, and to that of the Statute of Limitations the plaintiff replied a former suit and a non-suit therein, and that the present action was commenced within a year and a day. On this replication, issue was taken by the defendant. The jury returned a verdict to the effect that the defendant did detain, etc., and further found that the Statute of Limitations was no bar assessing the damages at a certain amount. As there was no response to the defendant's plea of release, the supreme court reversed the judgment founded on such defective verdict. Vines v. Brownrigg, 2 Dev. (N. Car.) 537.

Replevin.—One Roys commenced an action of replevin, against a certain Swain, for the unjust detention of personal property. Swain pleaded a general issue and property in himself. The jury found the property replevied to be in the plaintiff, and assessed the value and damages, but failed to find expressly that the defendant unjustly detained the property, although, as the supreme court said, "they doubtless intended to do so." Nevertheless, it was decided that the judgment must be reversed. Swain v. Roys, 4 Wis. 50.

In trespass de bonis asportatis, the defendant pleaded, first, not guilty, and secondly, in bar, that he took the goods as the property of a third person by virtue of a writ of attachment. Issue was joined, and the jury found that the goods were the property of the plaintiff at the time of the taking, and assessed damage. Error having been brought, the verdict was decided to be defective, since while it may have been true, yet the plaintiff might have bailed the goods to the third person for a time which had not expired, in which case he could not maintain trespass—or the goods might have been in the possession of this third person, under such circumstances as to be legally liable to the attachment as his property. Holman v. Kingsbury, 4 N. H. 105; Gerrish v. Train, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 124.

On a suit by the indorsee of a promissory note against the maker, the defendant replied, transfer of the note after maturity to the plaintiff, failure of consideration, and set-off against the payee. A verdict "in favor of the plaintiff" was held insufficient. Hamp-ton v. Walteson, 14 La. Ann. 236.

Assault and Battery.—In an action of trespass for assault and battery, the defendant pleaded, first, not guilty, second, a justification. A jury being impaneled to try the issues, they returned a verdict of guilty generally, without alluding to the justification. It was held that the verdict only replied to the doing of the act, and that the justification was not inquired into; hence that the judgment was erroneous and must be reversed. Fenwick v. Logan, 1 Mo. 401.

Where issue was joined upon an assault and battery, on the pleas of not guilty and son assault demesne, a verdict finding the defendant guilty was thought insufficient to sustain a judgment against him, but it was admitted that such a verdict might be cured by amendment in the proper court. Hanly v. Levin, 5 Ohio 227.

The defendant, who was tried on an indictment for assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to inflict great bodily injury, pleaded not guilty and former acquittal. There was a simple verdict of guilty, without in terms responding to the plea of former acquittal. The judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded. People v. Helbing, 59 Cal. 567. And see People v. Kinsey, 51 Cal. 279; People v. Fuqua, 61 Cal. 377.

Where a party was tried on an indictment for murder, a verdict of guilty of an assault with intent to kill was held to be not sufficiently responsive to the charge in the indictment, and the verdict, therefore, fatally defective. State v. Guillory, 42 La. Ann. 381.

Under an indictment for assault with intent to kill, the jury found the defendant guilty "of an aggravated assault and battery." In this case, the finding was held sufficiently responsive to the charge in the indictment. State v. Robinson, 31 S. Car. 453. And see State v. Jennings, 104 N. Car. 774.

Where the first count in an indictment, though inartificially drawn, contains the substantial requisites of an indictment for manslaughter, a general verdict of guilty, fixing the punishment, was naturally held sufficiently responsive to the indictment. Reed v. State, 8 Ind. 200. In State v. Robb, 90 Mo. 30, a verdict finding the defendant guilty of the "charges in the indictment" was held sufficiently responsive.

1. Brown v. Chase, 4 Mass. 436. The and where the jury find merely as to costs, ignoring the merits of the controversy, the verdict is liable to the same objection.¹ For the latter irregularity a verdict has been declared void, where, to an indictment for obtaining goods under false pretenses, the defendant pleading not guilty and former acquittal, the verdict being simply "guilty" with no response to the plea of autrefois acquit.² Thus, also, if A, B and C be sued jointly by D, and a jury sworn to try the issues as to them all, a verdict finding the issues as to A and B only, and saying nothing as to C, would not be received, or a judgment rendered upon such verdict would be reversed.³ However, the findings of a jury are viewed with court in this case proceeded to give judgment against the guardian, which was, of course, reversed by the appellate tribunal.

1. Finding Merely as to Costs. — A jury in Hall v. York, 16 Tex. 18, returned a verdict in the following words: "We, the jury, agree that the plaintiff pay the costs in this case." Such a verdict was held to be non-responsive to the issue, and in delivering the opinion of the court, Wheeler, J., said: "The form of a verdict is not material, so that it be intelligible, and find substantially the material issue or issues submitted by the pleadings, for the decision of the jury. But nothing is better settled than that the verdict must find the very point in issue between the parties; or if it does not it will not support a judgment." In this case, the verdict is manifestly insufficient in this respect. See also Green v. Cole, 2 Saund. 257.

In Ford v. Taggart, 4 Tex. 492, the plaintiff sued the defendant for shooting his stock, and the defendant answered that they had broken into his inclosure, etc. The jury returned a verdict to the effect that they found "the damages equal," and that each party should "pay equal proportions of the cost incurred, and go out of court." It was held that such a verdict "did not find any issue properly presented by the pleadings," and it was too clear for argument that such a verdict was bad and would not support a judgment.

2. Dominick v. State, 40 Ala. 680; 90 Am. Dec. 496; Nonemaker v. State, 34 Ala. 211; Solliday v. Com., 28 Pa. St. 13.

3. Several Defendants. — Schweichardt v. St. Louis, 2 Mo. App. 571. In Kilbourn v. Waterous, Kirby (Conn.) 424, which was an action of trespass against a number of defendants, who severally pleaded not guilty, the verdict for the plaintiff omitting to mention two of the defendants, was, on motion, set aside by the court as not comporting with the issue; and where, in a suit against two, the jury found against both of the defendants upon the first paragraph of the complaint and against one of the defendants upon the second paragraph, finding nothing as to the other defendant upon the second paragraph, the verdict was held to be "ill for not finding the whole issue," and a venire de novo awarded. Jenkins v. Parkhill, 25 Ind. 473. Nevertheless, in an action against several defendants for wrongful detention, etc., it was held that the jury might return a verdict against one defendant though they could not agree as to the others. Lockwood v. Bartlett (Supreme Ct.), 7 N. Y. Supp. 481. Also, where to an action of trespass there were several defendants, a verdict which failed to find either for or against two of the defendants was directed to be cured by entering a nolle prosequi as to them. Ward v. Taylor, 1 Pa. St. 283.

In Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. James, 73 Texas 12, and Alexandria Min. Co. v. Painter, 1 Ind. App. 587, it is maintained that if the jury undertake to mention the defendants by name in their verdict for the plaintiff, a silence as to any defendant is to be construed a verdict in his favor. See Kinkler v. Jurica (Tex. 1892), 19 S. W. Rep. 359.

Where no issue is joined between the plaintiff and one of several defendants, made so for a merely collateral purpose, a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff would be regarded as responsive to the whole issue. H. G. Old's Wagon Works v. Coombs, 124 Ind. 62; Golden Gate Mill, etc., Co. v. Joshua great leniency,¹ and, as it has been expressed: "Though the verdict may not conclude formally or punctually to the words of the issue, yet if the point in controversy can be concluded out of the Hendy Mach. Works, 82 Cal. 184. See also Garza v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1892), 20 S. W. Rep. 752.

In an action against several defendants, if two of them answer and a third makes default, the verdict is properly confined to those who answer, as there is no issue as to the one who has not appeared. Golden Gate Mill, etc., Co. v. Joshua Hendy Mach. Works, 82 Cal. 184. And see State v. Chambers, 45 La. Ann. 36; Blue v. McCabe, 5 Wash. 125.

Where the merely formal defendants do not appear, the case proceeding against the only substantial defendant, the fact that the verdict is for the "defendants," without specifying which of them, is a mere clerical error, and constitutes no ground for reversal. Shattuck v. North British, etc., Ins. Co., 58 Fed. Rep. 609. And see Sims v. State, 87 Ga. 569; Parrish v. McNeal (Neb. 1893), 55 N. W. Rep. 222.

In an action against a warehouse company and one Morgan, to recover the value of property stored with a warehouse company, it was proved that the warehouse company after bailment, surrendered possession of the warehouse where the goods were stored, together with the possession of said goods to the defendant, Morgan, who, at the time of the loss was in possession of the warehouse and property. Both defendants answered the complaint. At the trial, the jury rendered a verdict against the defendant, Morgan, for $325, the foreman saying, in answer to a question, that the jury had not taken into account the responsibility of the warehouse company. About a week after the trial of the action, the defendants moved, upon notice of motion, to set aside the verdict as irregular, or to dismiss the complaint against the warehouse company, which motion was denied; and the supreme court held properly so, maintaining that the defendants were liable severally and not jointly, each being responsible for any injury occurring while in possession and control of the property, so that there was no irregularity in the verdict as against Morgan, and that the judge could not, after the lapse of such a time, dismiss the complaint as to the other defendant, although he might have done so at the trial. Kaufman v.

Intent of Jury—How Ascertained—In considering a verdict, with a view to its sufficiency, the first object is to ascertain what the jury intended to find, and this is to be done by considering the verdict liberally, with the sole view of ascertaining the meaning of the jury, and not under the technical rules of construction which are applicable to pleadings. If the meaning of the jury can be ascertained, and a verdict on the point in issue can be made out, the court will mold it into form and make it serve. A verdict should be construed with the view that it shall rather stand than fall. Miller v. Shackleford, 4 Dana (Ky.) 271.

Liberality of Construction.—The extreme liberality which some courts show in the construction of a verdict is well illustrated in the case of Small v. Hicks, 81 Ga. 691. In this case, Small sued Hicks and Walker upon a promissory note; Hicks pleaded usury, and Walker pleaded that he was a mere surety on the note, and that, at the time he became surety, it was understood and agreed between the parties that Hicks should give Small a mortgage, with waiver of homestead and exemption upon certain personal property, to secure the payment of the note; that findings, the court shall work it into form and make it serve."¹ This inclination in favor of the sufficiency of a verdict, also sanctions the approval of a finding, which, though it may not respond the mortgage was accordingly given, but that in taking the mortgage, Small took more than a lawful rate of interest from Hicks, and thereby rendered the security valueless and the homestead waiver of no effect, so that Hicks could take a homestead in the property, which he did; in consequence of which, Walker's risk and liability were increased, and that he was therefore discharged from his liability as surety. On the trial of the case, the jury returned a verdict as follows: "We, the jury, find one and sixty-two hundredths dollars usury, and also find for B. F. Walker." Upon appeal, the supreme court in effect said: "We think the verdict is entitled to a reasonable intendment, and that the judgment entered against Hicks for the amount of the principal and interest due on the note, except the small amount of usury stated in the verdict, and directing that Walker be discharged, was proper. Hicks pleaded usury and the jury found a certain amount of usury, thus sustaining the plea that it was an usurious transaction, and this was equivalent to finding the remainder of the debt in favor of the plaintiff; hence, judgment could be made certain from the pleadings in the case."

The utmost favor is always extended to verdicts. They are not to be construed as strictly as pleadings are. Whenever the court can collect the clear meaning of the jury from the finding, it is bound to mould it into form and make it serve. Wittick v. Traun, 27 Ala. 562; 62 Am. Dec. 778; Moody v. Keener, 7 Port. (Ala.) 218; Tippin v. Petty, 7 Port. (Ala.) 44.

Plumer*, 49 Wis. 118.

The general rule is, that the verdict must comprehend the whole issue or issues submitted to the jury in the particular cause, otherwise, the judgment rendered on it may be reversed. To comply with the requirements of this rule, however, it is generally held, that if the verdict is not expressed formally and punctually in the words of the issue, yet if the point in issue can be concluded from the finding of the jury, the court will work the verdict into form and make it serve. Middleton v. Quigley, 12 N. J. L. 352.

The converse of this proposition is also true. Hence it is declared, that if the point on which the verdict is given be so uncertain that it cannot be clearly ascertained whether the jury meant to find the issue or not, it cannot be helped by intendment. Gerrish v. Train, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 124; Coffin v. Jones, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 44; Jewett v. Davis, 6 N. H. 518; Stearns v. Barrett, 1 Mason (U. S.) 170.

Substantial Omissions.—In Kerr v. Hartshorne, 4 Yeates (Pa.) 170, Chief Justice Tilghman very properly limits the authority of the court to cases where the jury have expressed their meaning in an informal manner, and say the court has no power to supply substantial omissions. He also maintains that it is the duty of the court to support the verdict of the jury, if it may legally be done. The court has no power to supply substantial omissions, but if the jury have expressed their meaning in an informal manner, the court not only may, but is bound to, mould it into form. See also Wood v. McGuire, 17 Ga. 361; 63 Am. Dec. 246.

Test of Sufficiency.—In Burton v. Bondies, 2 Tex. 204, it is said that "the test of the sufficiency of a verdict is this:

in terms to each and every issue,¹ yet it is manifest that the contemplation and determination of each point in controversy, formed an element in the general conclusion;² or where it is equally clear that if there had been a distinct pronouncement on each issue presented by the pleadings, the general effect of the verdict

Is it so certain that the court can give judgment upon it?" "This," said the court, "was the test applied in the case of Hawks v. Crofton, 2 Burr. 699, where the principle of the decisions was said by Lord Mansfield to be 'That where the intention of the jury is manifest and beyond a doubt, the court will set right matters of form and the mere act of the clerk;' and the general rule was recognized 'That verdicts are not to be taken strictly like pleadings, but that the court will collect the meaning of the jury, if they give such a verdict that the court can understand them.' And in Pickett v. Richet, 2 Bibb (Ky.) 178, the court say 'Verdicts are to be favorably construed, and technical objections to the want of form in wording them, disregarded. If it can be inferred from the verdict that the jury have found the point in issue, it is the duty of the court to work and mould it into form according to the real justice of the case; a rule founded in good sense and conducive to the ends of justice.'"

It is an established principle that the courts will sustain the verdict of a jury if its legal sense or legal effect makes a response to the pleadings. Boon v. Planters' Bank, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 84. And it is also maintained that the courts will so mould and construe a verdict as to make it legal if possible, and will never give to it the opposite construction, unless forced by the terms in which it is expressed. Toulmin v. Lesesne, 2 Ala. 359; McMurray v. O'Neill, 1 Call (Va.) 246.

Though a verdict need not follow the language of the issue, it must be responsive to it, and so expressed as to show that the jury decided the questions submitted to them. Toulmin v. Lesesne, 2 Ala. 359.

In Lincoln v. Cambria Iron Co., 103 U. S. 412, which was an action of assumpsit to which the defendant made a general denial of the allegations of the declaration, equivalent to a plea of non-assumpsit with notice of special matter, the jury found the defendant "guilty in manner and form as it is alleged in the declaration," and assessed damages. Bradley, J., in delivering the opinion of the supreme court, said: "The form of the verdict is defective, . . . but this is a mere clerical error, properly amendable. It substantially finds the issues made by the pleadings." The verdict, in effect, said that the defendant did promise, and violated his promise, as alleged in the declaration.

1. Specific Response to Each Issue.—

It may be stated, as a general rule, that juries must, by their verdicts, respond specifically to all the issues made by the pleadings, and if they omit any one, their verdict will be set aside, or if judgment be rendered thereon, it will be erroneous. Ronge v. Dawson, 9 Wis. 242. And in Traun v. Wittick, 27 Ala. 570, it is laid down as an elementary principle, that a verdict is void if it only finds a part of the issue.

In Rex v. Cockerill, And. 260, a distinction was sought to be drawn between a cause in which several distinct matters were in issue, and where there were several issues upon the same matter. The court said, nevertheless, that a separate verdict should be given on each issue, for otherwise it would not appear on which pleading it was founded, so that possibly it might be given on a part which was immaterial.

When suit is brought on a bond for the performance of covenants, and breaches are assigned by the plaintiff, the jury should assess damages for each breach which is found to have been committed. Van Benthuyzen v. DeWitt, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 213.

Upon a declaration of several counts, each containing a separate cause of action, the decision of the jury should be had on each issue. Seibert v. Allen, 61 Mo. 482; Ranney v. Bader, 48 Mo. 539.

Where there are two issues of fact, and the verdict of the jury answers to one only, there should be a venire facia de novo. Hite v. Wilson, 2 Hen. & M. (Va.) 268.

Browne, 22 Md. 103; Stout v. Calver, 6 Mo. 254; 35 Am. Dec. 438; Mooney v. Kennett, 19 Mo. 554; 61 Am. Dec. 576; Taylor v. Short, 38 Mo. App. 21; Jenks v. Hallet, 1 Cal. (N. Y.) 60; Thompson v. Button, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 84; Bemus v. Beekman, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 667; Law v. Merrills, 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 268; Atlantic, etc., Co. v. Purifoy, 95 N. Car. 302; Hanly v. Levin, 5 Ohio 238; Markwood v. Doriat, 21 Ohio St. 637; Garland v. Bugg, 1 Hen. & M. (Va.) 374; Danville v. Waddell, 27 Gratt. (Va.) 452; Black v. Thomas, 21 W. Va. 709.

The verdict of a jury which necessarily disposes of all the issues in the case is sufficient, although it may not respond separately to each several issue or fact presented by the pleadings. Thus, in West Virginia, the statute provides that, in actions of debt or assumpsit, when the defendant files an account of set-off, the jury on the trial of the issue in the case, shall ascertain the amount to which the defendant is entitled and apply it as a set-off against the plaintiff's demand, and if the said amount be more than the plaintiff is entitled to, shall ascertain the amount of the excess, including principal and interest. However, where the verdict was simply for a gross sum in favor of the defendant, it was sustained, as it was held that the verdict under the issues was necessarily a finding that the account of the defendant exceeded the amount to which the plaintiffs were entitled, to the extent of that finding. Black v. Thomas, 21 W. Va. 709.

Upon a suit on a promissory note, the defendant replied non-assumpsit and payment, and the verdict was rendered upon the general issue. Chancellor Walworth, speaking for the court, said: "The court has no power to supply substantial omissions in a verdict, but if the jury have expressed their meaning in an informal manner only, yet with sufficient certainty to show that they must have passed upon and decided the whole issue, it is the duty of the court to mould it into form. In the present case, it would have been impossible to obtain a verdict in favor of the plaintiff on the general issue, if the defendant had established his plea of payment. On the last plea, the defendant held the affirmative, and payment can be given in evidence under the general issues as well as under the special plea. Whatever would have entitled the defendant to a verdict under the latter, must necessarily have entitled him to a verdict under the former. This, therefore, though not in form, was, in substance, a verdict for the plaintiff on both issues." Law v. Merrills, 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 268.

In a certain action of assumpsit, the pleas were non-assumpsit and set-off. The jury found for the plaintiff generally, without in terms responding to the plea of set-off. The supreme court held that, though the finding was for the plaintiff generally, it was not inconsistent with the idea that the jury had considered the defendant in the plea of set-off, and had come to the conclusion that he was not entitled to any credit on that plea. Hence, the judgment was not disturbed. Stout v. Calver, 6 Mo. 254; 65 Am. Dec. 438.

Upon the trial of several issues from the orphan's court, the jury returned their verdict generally for the defendants, who were the caveatees supporting the will of a testator; but from the character of the issues, it was absolutely certain that the jury could not have so found without deciding every issue in favor of the defendants. The verdict was not disturbed. Browne v. Browne, 22 Md. 113.

In the case of Porter v. Rummary, 10 Mass. 64, the facts were, that the defendant to a writ of right pleaded not guilty and a plea of non tuum and disclaimer, to which the plaintiff replied that the defendant was in possession, and on which issue was joined as well as on the plea of not guilty. On these issues, the jury returned a general verdict of not guilty; judgment was rendered for the defendant, and the plaintiff prosecuted his writ of error. It was held by the supreme court of Massachusetts that the judgment was well enough, for the jury could not have returned the verdict they did, unless they had also passed on the special issue.

Where the defendants, in an action quare clausum fregit, pleaded not guilty as to the force and arms, and a special justification as to the residue, the jury returned a general verdict of not guilty, the court held such verdict to be sufficient, as the jury could not have so found if the defendants had failed in proving their justification.

must have been the same.¹ Where there are several separate and distinct issues involved, the determination of any one of which might decide the fate of a cause, the verdict should specify on Hodges v. Raymond, 9 Mass. 316; Hanly v. Levin, 5 Ohio 238; Taylor v. Short, 38 Mo. App. 21.

In an action for the breach of a contract, the petition stated the contract sued upon in certain specific terms. The answer denied the allegations relative to the terms of the contract, setting forth the contract in other terms and claiming damages for the breach thereof. A verdict entitling the defendant to recover a specified sum, in effect finds the contract as stated in the answer and its breach as there alleged, and is sufficiently responsive to all issues. Markwood v. Doriat, 21 Ohio St. 637.

In detinuit, the defendant pleaded non detinet and a special plea in bar, to which pleas there was a general replication denying the truth of them both and issues were joined. A general verdict for the plaintiff was considered sufficiently responsive to both issues. Garland v. Bugg, 1 Hen. & M. (Va.) 374.

Where several issues were distinctly presented by the pleadings, and the verdict found "all the issues in favor of the defendant," such a finding was construed as a verdict on each issue. Glenn v. Sumner, 132 U. S. 152.

Replevin.—In an action of replevin, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff generally where the defendant had pleaded, first non cepit, second, an avowry, averring that the goods taken were the property of the defendant. The finding was objected to on the ground that it ignored the second plea, but the appellate court declined to disturb the judgment on this ground. It was maintained that it was very evident that the jury would not have found the defendant guilty upon the general issue, if he had made out his justification according to the avowry. Also that the intention of the jury could not be mistaken, and that the omission to enter a verdict applicable particularly to the second issue, is a mere matter of form which the court may rectify. Thompson v. Button, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 84. Under similar circumstances in Bemus v. Beekman, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 668, a different position is assumed, for here it is declared that a verdict for the plaintiffs, in an action of replevin upon the plea of non cepit, determines no question between the parties where a plea of property is interposed, except the taking, and this results from the peculiar character of this action and the situation of the parties. Hence, such a verdict assessing no damages and in response to the plea of property, simply holding it not to be in the defendant, but not finding it in the plaintiff, was held to be defective in substance.

The court in this last case comments on the decision of this question in Thompson v. Button, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 84, and the contradiction is sought to be reconciled by the explanation that in Thompson v. Button the determination of the court was expressly upon the ground that the intention of the jury could not be mistaken from the fact that they found the defendant guilty upon the general issue, which the court assumed would not have been done if he had made out a justification according to the avowry.

In Wisconsin, where both the title to, and right of possession of the property for which replevin has been brought, is put in issue, it is held that a finding generally for the plaintiff disposes of all the issues; and it is also maintained that the plea of "not guilty" to a declaration in the cepit and detinet, puts in issue as well the right of the plaintiff to the possession of the property, as the wrongful taking and detention thereof by the defendant. Ford v. Ford, 3 Wis. 399; Everet v. Walworth County Bank, 13 Wis. 420; Krause v. Cutting, 32 Wis. 687.

In Indiana, the practice seems to be similar, in this respect, to that of Wisconsin, for it is declared, in VanGundy v. Carrigan, 4 Ind. App. 333, that a general finding in an action of replevin, though both the title and right of possession are in issue, is not so defective and uncertain that judgment cannot be rendered thereon, nor is it objectionable because it does not cover all the issues. See also Rowan v. Teague, 24 Ind. 304; Crocker v. Hoffman, 48 Ind. 207; Payne v. June, 92 Ind. 252.

1. Where the fact to be determined was, whether the defendant had committed any act which would deprive which it is founded;¹ but because there are several counts in a declaration, it does not necessarily follow that several issues are involved, since the successive counts may be but a re-statement of the same cause of action.²

The same principle which dictates the rule that juries should reply to all the material matters involved by the litigation, also prescribes a limit to their determinations. The verdict of a jury should not embrace the consideration of matters outside of and him of the right to a certificate of discharge as an insolvent debtor, under the laws of Massachusetts, and a number of such acts, any one of which would have such an effect, were submitted to the jury, a verdict finding against him one such act only was declared to be sufficient. Vennard v. McConnell, 11 Allen (Mass.) 555.

An omission to find as to one count of an indictment which contains several, where the offense charged in the count as to which no finding is made is substantially the same as charged in the other counts, is immaterial. U. S. v. Keene, 1 McLean (U.S.) 429.

Where the first count in an indictment charged the defendant in a general way, and the second stated the same offense, together with the means used to consummate the criminal act, a verdict on the first count, without mentioning the second, was held to be sufficient. Com. v. Spink, 137 Pa. St. 255.

1. This question is sometimes regulated by statute; for instance, Georgia Code, par. 3960, provides, "If there are several pleas filed by the defendant, a verdict for the defendant must show upon which of the pleas it is rendered." Williams v. Gunnels, 66 Ga. 521.

Upon a declaration consisting of several counts, each containing a separate cause of action, the decision of the jury should be had on each issue. Ranney v. Bader, 48 Mo. 539; State v. Harmon, 106 Mo. 635; Seibert v. Allen, 61 Mo. 482.

In Yarber v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1894), 24 S. W. Rep. 645 (where the case is reported in the briefest possible manner), this statement appears: "When both counts in an indictment are good, it is not necessary that the verdict state the count on which it is based." We submit it for what it may be worth.

2. Hanley v. Mayor, 6 Bing. 100; Dillard v. Noel, 2 Ark. 449; Ranney v. Bader, 48 Mo. 539; Owens v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 58 Mo. 386; Lan- caster v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co., 92 Mo. 460; Campbell v. King, 32 Mo. App. 38; Long v. Armsby, 43 Mo. App. 253; State v. Haycroft, 49 Mo. App. 488; Carter v. Graves, 9 Yerg. (Tenn.) 446.

As a general rule, it is unquestionably true that the finding of the jury must embrace all the issues joined and be responsive thereto, but when all of the issues are essentially the same and such as may be distinctly and severally responded to by a general verdict for either party, there is no principle of law which requires a separate finding as to each issue, and in such case it cannot be understood what benefit either party could derive therefrom. Dillard v. Noel, 2 Ark. 449.

To an action of assumpsit, three pleas were put in by the defendant, and the jury returned a verdict that "they found" the issue "in favor of the plaintiff." The supreme court, in its desire to uphold the verdict and to discourage objections which might be only the result of clerical mistakes, held that the three pleas, not guilty, non-assumpsit and of special performance, made substantially but one issue, and that the word "issue" covered the whole. Carter v. Graves, 9 Yerg. (Tenn.) 446.

It is held, in State v. Harmon, 106 Mo. 635, that a verdict of guilty, upon an indictment for larceny, containing several counts each charging a distinct offense, should specify upon which counts the defendant is found guilty and upon which acquitted. This is not required, however, where all the counts relate substantially to the same transaction. State v. Bean, 21 Mo. 267; State v. McCue, 39 Mo. 112; State v. Pitts, 58 Mo. 556; State v. Noland, 111 Mo. 473.

Where there are two counts in the declaration, and the evidence is applicable to both, though the allegations in one admit of its application with more distinctness and perspicuity than in the other, the jury are not restricted in beyond those submitted to them,¹ although if the excess in a too comprehensive finding consists merely of harmless redundancy, that portion may be regarded by the courts as surplusage, in their liberality of construction, and in such character rejected.²

In fine, a jury should determine each issue involved, and the whole of each issue.³ They should neither exceed nor fall short their finding to either but may give a general verdict. Porter v. Pequonnoc Mfg. Co., 17 Conn. 249. And see Stamford Bank v. Ferris, 17 Conn. 259.

1. Facts Not in Issue.—A verdict can legitimately find no fact that has not been put in issue. U. S. v. Stereoscopic Slides, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 467; Deering v. Halbert, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 291; Swearengen v. Pendleton, 4 S. & R. (Pa.) 389; Moriarty v. McDevitt, 46 Minn. 136; Swan v. Smith, 13 Nev. 257; Hardy v. DeLeon, 5 Tex. 211.

2. See infra, this title, Surplusage.

Though a verdict in terms does not find the issue joined by the parties, if the court can collect the point in issue out of the verdict, it will be held sufficient. Stearns v. Barrett, 1 Mason (U. S.) 153. In this case the court, in discussing the sufficiency of a verdict, said: "There are many authorities in the books respecting this subject, some of which are not easily reconcilable with sound sense or with legal principle. From the mass of cases, however, some rules may be extracted which commend themselves to the judgment of all of us. If, for instance, the jury find the point in issue, and also another matter out of the issue, the latter finding is void, and may be rejected as surplusage. But it is otherwise, if the matter so found be contained in the issue, for then if it be material and contradictory, it cannot be rejected as surplusage. So if the point on which the verdict is given be so uncertain that it cannot be clearly ascertained whether the jury meant to find the issue or not, it cannot be helped by intentment; and a fortiori if it be repugnant to other facts expressly found." The court added, that where a verdict was not expressed substantially in the terms of the issue, the cause should be extremely clear which would induce a court to make it the ground of a final judgment.

Verdict Broader than Issue.—In some cases it is highly expedient, if not absolutely necessary, that the verdict should be more extensive than the issue, and find facts in addition to it. For instance, under the statutes of Maine, in an action of replevin the defendant must plead the general issue, non cepit, on which issue must be joined, though the only question to be tried may be whether the plaintiff is the owner of the property replevied. In such a case the jury may find the formal issue in favor of the plaintiff; but they must also find that the property replevied, at the time of the taking, belonged to the plaintiff, if such is proved to be the fact. Pejepscot v. Nichols, 10 Me. 256.

At the request of the parties, the jury may express an opinion on matters distinct from those necessarily involved in their verdict. Den v. Wright, Pet. (C. C.) 72.

In actions against personal representatives, where issue is taken upon the plea of plene administravit and a verdict rendered for the plaintiff, the finding should specify, with sufficient certainty, what portion of the assets which have come to the defendant's hands remained unadministered at the time of the suing out of the plaintiff's writ. If a verdict lacks this characteristic, it will be set aside as irresponsible to the issue. Fairfax v. Fairfax, 5 Cranch (U. S.) 19; Nixon v. Bullock, 9 Yerg. (Tenn.) 414; Booth v. Armstrong, 2 Wash. (Va.) 301; Eppees v. Smith, 4 Munf. (Va.) 466; Sturdivant v. Raines, 1 Leigh (Va.) 481; Gardner v. Vidal, 6 Rand. (Va.) 106.

Where a verdict found a promise different from that alleged as inducement in the declaration, and also varied in other essential respects, it was held that, though a mere informality might be immaterial, a substantial variance rendered the verdict void. Garland v. Davis, 4 How. (U. S.) 131.

Where the defendant traversed a substantially defective declaration, instead of demurring to it, he cannot object to a verdict found according to the issue and the evidence. French v. Thompson, 6 Vt. 54.

Findings of Judge Without Jury.—The

of their authority.¹ (As to the inclusion of excess in a verdict, see supra, this title, Surplusage.)

(5) Certainty.—A substantial requisite of a verdict is the element of certainty,² not absolute certainty, but, as it has been same requirements exist where a judge tries a case without a jury. Here as well, the finding must respond to the issues.

Where the plaintiff, in his petition, charges an unlawful taking and that the defendant still detains the property, the defendant denying the wrongful taking and alleging a delivery lawfully made to himself, claiming a lien upon the property for keeping and feeding, a finding that the defendant did wrongfully detain the property, saying nothing about the wrongful taking and nothing as to the lien, is not a sufficient finding upon the issues, and the judgment rendered thereon was reversed. Allison v. Darton, 24 Mo. 343; Jones v. Snedecar, 3 Mo. 390; Pratt v. Rogers, 5 Mo. 52; Dunbar v. Bittle, 7 Wis. 143; Smith v. Lewis, 20 Wis. 350.

1. See supra, this title, Responsiveness, and authorities cited in notes.

A jury should remember that theirs is not the province of arbitrators but of jurors, and their finding must constitute a legal verdict on which the judgment of the court may rest. An arbitrary award, therefore, though it may address itself to the sense of justice of the parties, is not a fulfillment of their duty as jurors unless it determines the actual issues involved. Ford v. Taggart, 4 Tex. 492.

2. People v. Sepulveda, 59 Cal. 342; Smith v. Mohn, 87 Cal. 489; Lawrence v. People, 2 Ill. 414; Walker v. Walker, 5 Ill. App. 289; Weirick v. Hoover, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 379; Penny-packer v. Co. v. Hathaway, 75 Tex. 557; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. White, 76 Tex. 102; Munn v. Martin (Tex. App. 1890), 15 S. W. Rep. 195; Heiligmann v. Rose, 81 Tex. 222; Sherman v. Lumber Co., 77 Wis. 14; Richards v. Sperry, 7 Wis. 219.

Several Defendants.—In Richards v. Sperry, 7 Wis. 219, which was an action of tort against several defendants, the verdict of the jury was in these words: "The jury, in this case, say they find the defendant guilty and assess plain-tiff's damages at $28." On this verdict judgment was entered against all the defendants, which the supreme court reversed, resolving that such a verdict did not authorize a judgment against any, as it did not specify which one.

Similarly, it has been held that, upon an indictment against two defendants, a verdict, "we, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment," is void for uncertainty. People v. Sepulveda, 59 Cal. 342; State v. Weeks, 23 Oregon 3. But see Porter v. Cotney, 3 Ala. 314; Steed v. Barnhill, 71 Ala. 157.

Amendment.—Nor can such a verdict be amended to show that it was intended to convict both defendants. State v. Weeks, 23 Oregon 3.

However, where two defendants, although answering separately, make the same defense, a verdict "for the defendant" is not void for uncertainty, but it will be presumed to include both defendants. Waddingham v. Dickson, 17 Colo. 223. And see Houston v. Ladies' Union Branch Assoc., 87 Ga. 203.

Two defendants, jointly indicted for an alleged offense, were jointly arraigned and pleaded not guilty. The jury returned a verdict finding "the prisoner at the bar guilty." This finding lacked the requisite certainty, as the terms of the verdict left it in doubt which of the two prisoners at the bar the jury intended to convict. Favor v. State, 54 Ga. 249; Richards v. Sperry, 7 Wis. 219; Brannigan v. People, 3 Utah 488.

But where, in a criminal prosecution against several defendants, the verdict finds the "prisoners at the bar guilty as charged," this is sufficient to support a judgment against them all, it being unnecessary that each defendant be designated by name. State v. Anderson (La. 1893), 12 So. Rep. 737. And see Hays v. State, 30 Tex. App. 472; Caesar v. State, 30 Tex. App. 274; Little v. State, 30 Tex. App. 597.

Also, where one defendant was jointly indicted with another person, but was tried alone, a verdict against "the within-named defendant" is not void for uncertainty. Hughes v. Com. (Ky. 1890), 14 S. W. Rep. 682. See also described, certainty to a common or reasonable intent.¹ The inclination of the courts has always been in favor of the validity of a verdict, no matter what requisite may be apparently lacking, and it will be supported if, from the terms of the finding and the contents of the record, enough material can be gathered for the State v. Lee, 80 Iowa 75; State v. Elvins, 101 Mo. 243; State v. Mason, 42 La. Ann. 714.

To the same effect, it was held in Hronek v. People, 134 Ill. 139, that upon a separate trial of one of several defendants, the record showing the coming of the people by the state's attorney, and J. H. (the defendant) impleaded, the selection of the jury and trial, a verdict finding the "defendant" guilty, without specifying him by name, is not too uncertain as to the party found guilty.

Action Against Partners.—In a joint action against partners a verdict finding for the "defendant," instead of the defendants, is not voidable for uncertainty. Davis v. Suah (Ind. 1894), 36 N. E. Rep. 122.

In an action against a corporation and several other defendants, a verdict, "we, the jury, find for the plaintiffs as against the defendants, The Alexandria Mining & Exploring Co.," is sufficiently certain and free from ambiguity. It was insisted by the appellants that it was so uncertain and ambiguous that the court could not render judgment upon it, the ambiguity being held to consist in the use of the word "defendants" in place of "defendant," the verdict being against the corporation only. This objection was not sustained, the court holding that it was quite clear that the jury found against the one defendant, and that the use of the plural noun instead of the singular was a mere clerical error. Alexandria Min., etc., Co. v. Painter, 1 Ind. App. 587.

Several Plaintiffs.—Though there are several plaintiffs, it has been held that a verdict, "We, the jury, find the issue for the plaintiff," is valid. Daft v. Drew, 40 Ill. App. 266.

Several Amounts.—In an action of assumpsit, the plaintiff's bill of particulars demanded a certain sum, but the plaintiff's counsel, in his remarks to the jury, stated that another and smaller sum would be satisfactory. A verdict finding the full amount of the plaintiff's claim was held, under the circumstances, to be ambiguous and uncertain, as it did not determine which sum the jury intended to find. Gerhab v. White, 40 N. J. L. 242.

Fixed Meaning of Terms Employed.—A verdict must be couched in terms which have a fixed meaning. Where the jury declared that the plaintiff was entitled to a certain quantity of water according to "miner's measurement," the verdict was held not sufficiently certain, as different localities have different standards of "miner's measurement." Dougherty v. Haggin, 56 Cal. 522.

Where matters, not properly involved by the issues, have been presented to the jury and so mingled with what should have been rightfully taken into consideration by them, as to make it doubtful upon what ground they based their verdict, a judgment rendered thereon cannot be sustained. McFall v. Smith, 32 Ill. App. 463.

A jury, in an action for damages, were erroneously instructed that they might give exemplary damages under the circumstances of the case. Their verdict not showing whether it included exemplary damages was set aside, though it was for an amount not greater than might have been given by way of compensation. Patry v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 77 Wis. 218.

In an ordinary case, it does not seem to be necessary that the jury should expressly state whether their verdict consists of exemplary, or merely compensatory damages. Where a suit was instituted for the purpose of recovering the value of three dogs alleged to have been poisoned by the defendant, a verdict for $75 was returned, but the defendants insisted that as the verdict did not specify whether it consisted of actual or exemplary damages, it was insufficient to support a judgment. However, as the court is not required to submit the issues of actual and exemplary damages separately, unless requested to do so, it was held that it would be inconsistent to require the jury to make separate findings upon issues not separately submitted. Heiligmann v. Rose, 81 Tex. 222.

Glover, 2 Port. (Ala.) 174; Alexandria Min. etc., Co. v. Painter, 1 Ind. App. 587.

In Alabama, under a statute declaring that if it appears to the jury that the plaintiff is over-paid, they shall give a verdict for the defendant and, withall, certify to the court how much they find the plaintiff to be indebted, a verdict, in determining the mutual demand between the plaintiff and defendant, "that they find the plaintiff indebted to the defendant in the sum of two dollars and forty cents over and above the plaintiff's demand in this behalf," is a substantial compliance with the statute, and hence such a verdict is valid. Pledger v. Glover, 2 Port. (Ala.) 174.

A verdict finding the plaintiff guilty of waste as charged in the declaration, where the plaintiffs waive a recovery of the place wasted, need not set out the locus in quo with greater particularity than to assess damages for the particular parts of the waste charged, nor need it find any part of the issue for the defendant. Dejarnatte v. Allen, 5 Gratt. (Va.) 499.

According to this principle, a verdict which is so uncertain that it cannot be clearly ascertained whether the jury meant to find the issue or not, is bad. Allen v. Aldrich, 29 N. H. 63; Coffin v. Jones, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 45; Brunswick v. McKean, 4 Me. 508; Holman v. Kingsbury, 4 N. H. 104; Jewett v. Davis, 6 N. H. 518.

And where a verdict was uncertain to such an extent that it would require the finding of another jury to ascertain the intention of the jury who found the first verdict, such a verdict must be set aside. Heyward v. Bennett, 3 Brev. (S. Car.) 113.

Some Instances of Verdicts Held Insufficiently Certain.—See Jackson v. Jackson, 40 Ga. 150; Turbaville v. State, 58 Ga. 545; Ottawa Gas Light, etc., Co. v. Thompson, 39 Ill. 598; Richardson v. McCormick, 47 Iowa 80; De Clemente v. Winstanley (Brooklyn City Ct.), 28 N. Y. Supp. 513; Diehl v. Evans, 1 S. & R. (Pa.) 366; Hawkins v. Lee, 22 Tex. 544; Brown v. Horless, 22 Tex. 645; Ryan v. Hays, 62 Tex. 42; Smith v. Roberts (Tex. 1890), 15 S. W. Rep. 126; Pendleton v. Van Devier, 1 Wash. (Va.) 381; Richards v. Tabb, 4 Call (Va.) 522; Rogers v. Chandler, 3 Munf. (Va.) 65; Cocke v. Com., 13 Gratt. (Va.) 750; Com. v. Smith, 2 Va. Cas. 327.

The jury, in the case of Diehl v. Evans, 1 S. & R. (Pa.) 367, brought in a verdict in these words: "We find for the plaintiff and are of opinion that the plaintiff has already received, out of the property of the defendant, payment in full for the amount of freight to which he is entitled." In view of the fact that this was an action brought for freight and demurrage, which the plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant, it will be seen that such a verdict was altogether vague and unsatisfactory. The jury begin by finding for the plaintiff, but end by declaring that he has already been paid; then they say that the plaintiff has been paid for the freight, totally ignoring the claim for demurrage; and even if this could be treated as an intentional finding for the plaintiff, yet as the jury find no specific amount, no judgment could be rendered on it.

An action was brought for the recovery of certain personal property named in the petition of the plaintiff, and the jury returned a verdict as follows: "We, the jury, find the intervenor, Elizabeth Richardson, entitled to the following property described in her petition, viz. (naming the articles) and the damage in the sum of $458." The property claimed by the plaintiff consisted of two mules, one colt, one lumber wagon, and one set of double harness, about which the evidence adduced at the trial was not the same; hence, as no article was named in the verdict, the supreme court held that it was impossible to tell whether the jury found the plaintiff entitled to all or only to a part of these articles, and if to a part, what part. The judgment rendered on this verdict was accordingly set aside. Richardson v. McCormick, 47 Iowa 80. It may be conducive to a thorough understanding of this case, as set forth by us, that the language in the quotation marks above is an exact transcript of the verdict as rendered. The words "naming the articles" appeared in parentheses in the verdict, but no articles were named.

One Ryan sued the International and Great Northern Railway Co. and R. S. Hays, its receiver, appointed by the U. S. circuit court, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by himself while a passenger on a train belonging to the company. Ryan alleged that he received the injury at a time when the railway was in the exclusive management and control of Hays as receiver, and in due course of time the case went to the jury. A verdict was returned as follows: "We, the jury, find at the time of the accident that R. S. Hays was receiver of the International Railroad, and since the first day of November of 1879, it has been in the possession of the International and Great Northern Railway Co.; we find for the plaintiff, John Ryan, the sum of $2,200." This was held, by the court, to be neither a special nor a general verdict, and was not sufficient to authorize judgment. Ryan v. Hays, 62 Tex. 42.

Smith sued Roberts upon a promissory note, claiming a certain balance due, Roberts pleading failure of consideration. The case was tried by the jury and the following verdict rendered: "We, the jury, render verdict for the defendant, and allow plaintiff the amount per month agreed upon between him and defendant, and allow nothing for commissions." It will be observed that this verdict found first for the defendant and then for the plaintiff an indefinite amount. It was held to be insufficient to support a judgment. Smith v. Roberts (Tex. 1890), 15 S. W. Rep. 126.

In Jackson v. Jackson, 40 Ga. 150, a suit was brought on a certain promissory note on which were several credits, one of which was uncertain both as to amount and date and which was also disputed altogether on the trial. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for principal, interest, and costs. The jury should have found whether they allowed or disallowed the disputed credit by finding a sum certain for the plaintiff, as they did not, the judgment rendered on the verdict by the inferior court was reversed.

In the case of Turbaville v. State, 58 Ga. 545, the jury returned a verdict of "guilty of involuntary manslaughter without due caution and circumspection." This finding was held to be so uncertain as to justify the judge in refusing to receive it.

Rep. 760; Heilgmann v. Rose, 81 Tex. 222; Grayson v. Buchanan, 88 Va. 251; Newton v. Allis, 16 Wis. 197; Little Josephine Min. Co. v. Fullerton, 58 Fed. Rep. 521.

A verdict finding that the plaintiffs were entitled to a certain sum of money, is equivalent to saying that the issues are found in favor of the plaintiffs and assessing damages at that sum. Thus, in an action for damages against the defendants for failure to deliver certain lumber received by them, whereby damage resulted to the plaintiffs, a verdict that the plaintiffs were entitled to the sum of $2,500, is not void for uncertainty. Mendelsohn v. Anaheim Lighter Co., 40 Cal. 657.

In an action on two bonds for $1,000 each, executed by the defendant to the plaintiff for the last two deferred payments of purchase-money for a certain tract of land, the defendant offered a special plea of set-off, averring that the tract was represented by the vendor to contain one hundred and forty acres and that it included within its limits one-half of a certain spring which greatly added to the desirability of the property; and that, relying on these representations, he contracted to purchase it. The defendant then proceeded to show that the actual number of acres contained in the said tract was only one hundred and twenty-six, and that the tract did not include the spring mentioned—placing his damage at $3,000. The jury found for the plaintiff the debt in the declaration mentioned, and further found for the defendant as offsets to the said debt, $600 damages for loss of one-half of the spring in controversy, and $540 as a payment for the deficit of the fourteen acres. The verdict also provided that the difference should be applied to the payment of the bonds as they fell due. This verdict was attacked for vagueness and uncertainty, but the contention was not supported by the appellate court. Grayson v. Buchanan, 88 Va. 251.

In Meeker v. Childress, Minor (Ala.) 109, a verdict, "We, the jury, find the defendant," was upheld. The court said the entry of the verdict would have been more certain if the word "for" had been inserted before the words "the formation of a complete verdict in all its essential details.¹ But this desire to regard a verdict as sufficient to sustain a judgment, must not divert the attention of the court from or outside of the record.² Thus, in a case of trespass to try title, when the verdict found defendant," but taken in connection with the issue submitted and the judgment which followed it was sufficiently certain.

However informal a verdict may be, if it is responsive to all issues and its meaning be clear, it will be held good, but if its construction is doubtful, no judgment can be rendered upon it. Van Valkenburg v. Ruby, 68 Tex. 139.

If the meaning of the jury in their verdict is certain from its terms, or becomes so when rendered in the light afforded by the pleadings of which it is a duty of a court to take judicial notice, it is sufficiently certain for all practicable purposes. Fries v. Mack, 33 Ohio St. 52.

A verdict, "We, the jury, find the paper in evidence is not the will of Martin Muller," was attacked for uncertainty on the ground that two wills had been read in evidence, and the jury did not distinctly say which one. The court held, however, that there could be no question as to which was meant by the jury, as the pleadings in the case specifically described a certain one as the writing, the validity of which was contested. Muller v. St. Louis Hospital Assoc., 73 Mo. 242.

The Kentucky Code of Practice, § 371, provides that a verdict finding for the debt in the declaration mentioned, is sufficiently certain. Brannin v. Foree, 12 B. Mon. (Ky.) 506.

In Mississippi, in Maulding v. Rigby,

1 How. (Miss.) 579, the verdict, "We, of the jury, find for the plaintiff the debt in the declaration mentioned, to be discharged by the payment of the same, etc.," was held to be a sufficient finding.

In Fromme v. Jones, 13 Iowa 474, it was held that a verdict defective in form may be received by the court when the intention of the jury can be ascertained from the data given in the verdict or referred to in the pleadings, but the court cannot supply omissions to name the amount of the finding by referring to evidence outside of the record. The court may not look to matters dehors the record, for the purpose of fixing that which it is the sole province of the jury to determine. Fries v. Mack, 33 Ohio St. 52. See also Spieres v. Parker, 1 T. R. 141; McArthur v. Porter, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 626; Lee v. Campbell, 4 Port. (Ala.) 198; Watson v. Damon, 54 Cal. 278; Fryberger v. Carney, 26 Minn. 84; Heyward v. Bennett, 3 Brev. (S. Car.) 113.

Cates v. Nickell, 42 Mo. 169, was an action instituted upon a promissory note; and the cause being submitted to the jury, the following verdict was rendered: "We, the jury, find the issue in favor of the plaintiff." The jury were thereupon discharged, and the court proceeded to ascertain the amount then due upon the note, including the principal and interest, and rendered judgment for the sum. It was held that the verdict as rendered was not sufficient to support a judgment and that the court invaded the province of the jury by its interposition. The judgment was reversed. See also Burghart v. Brown, 60 Mo. 24.

In Bartle v. Plane, 68 Iowa 227, it was held to have been error for a justice of the peace to render judgment on a verdict which failed to state how much the plaintiff should recover, where all infor the plaintiff the lands described in the petition, less a certain number of acres, as set forth in a deed read in evidence, the pleading itself containing no description of the land conveyed by the deed, it would have been necessary for the court to look outside of the verdict, and the pleadings, to the evidence given upon the trial, for the facts upon which to render judgment;¹ and in another instance, a verdict finding for the plaintiff "the full amount specified in the promissory notes adduced in the case," was held to debtedness is denied by the defendant. In such case, the jury should have been requested to retire and find how much the plaintiff ought to recover.

On an indictment for theft of certain cattle, a verdict that, "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of a misdemeanor and assess his punishment at $100," was held to be entirely insufficient to support a judgment, on the ground that it did not sufficiently appear that the misdemeanor of which the jury found the defendant guilty was that charged in the indictment. *Howell v. In an action of trespass to try title, a verdict describing the lands as bounded on the west and south by lands which were vacant in 1804, was held to be void for uncertainty. Sturdevant v. Murrell, 8 Port. (Ala.) 318. And in Bennet v. Morris, 9 Port. (Ala.) 171, a verdict describing land by reference to a boundary commencing at the center of a house occupied by James Wilson in 1817, was declared defective for the same reason. And see Wallace v. Elder, 5 S. & R. (Pa.) 143.

In the case of Singleton v. Ake, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 626, which was an action of ejectment, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant for all the land in the declaration mentioned except fifty acres upon which the defendant formerly resided, but as these fifty acres were described with sufficient particularity in the record, so that the sheriff could have no difficulty in giving possession according to the terms of the judgment, the supreme court declined to interfere on the ground of uncertainty.

A verdict for the plaintiff, in an action of trespass to try title, should specify the lands with sufficient certainty, so that the sheriff, upon judgment being rendered, may enter and make delivery of that portion to which the plaintiff has shown himself entitled, else the verdict must be set aside for uncertainty, as the sheriff cannot be informed of what he is to deliver possession. Crommelin v. Minter, 9 Ala. 594; Huffaker v. Boring, 8 Ala. 87.

A verdict not specifying the lands found illegally in a party's occupancy, with such certainty as will show where they lie or the number of acres and boundaries, will not be sustained. Sturdevant v. Murrell, 8 Port. (Ala.) 317; Jenkins v. Noel, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 75; Fenwick v. Floyd, 1 Har. & G. (Md.) 172; Clark v. Clark, 7 Vt. 190; Clay v. White, 1 Munf. (Va.) 162; *Gregory v. In an action of trespass to try title and to ascertain the boundaries, where the jury found that the "old league line" was the true line, but did not find which of the three lines in dispute was the "old league line," the verdict was held void for uncertainty. Jones v. Leath, 32 Tex. 329.

A verdict in an action of trespass to try title, describing the premises as lot number 28 in the plat of the town of Pickensville, Pickens county, is sufficiently certain to warrant a judgment. Henley v. Mobile Branch Bank, 16 Ala. 552. And see Farrow v. Farrow, 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 390; Paul v. Smiley, 4 Munf. (Va.) 468; Tryon v. Carlin, 5 Watts (Pa.) 371.

be void for uncertainty, as the court could not render judgment without going outside of the pleadings for the ascertainment of the amount.¹

The maxim, Id certum est quod certum reddi potest, is readily applicable to verdicts.² Whenever the amount for which judgment should be rendered can be determined by a simple arithmetical calculation, this may be done by the clerk at the request of the judge, or by the judge himself,³ and a judgment entered accordingly.⁴ Hence, though it is the province of the jury to

The verdict of the jury was for a certain sum, with interest from the date of a certain writ of attachment named in the pleadings, and in the service of which it was claimed that the defendant, as sheriff, committed the trespass of which the plaintiff complains. It was held that as there was but one attachment referred to in the issues made by the pleadings, the date of which was not controverted, that the court might with propriety render judgment upon such a verdict. Hattenback v. Hoskins, 12 Iowa 109.

An action was brought for work, labor, and money loaned at sundry times; the plaintiff admitting certain credits. The defendant alleged the contract for work and labor to be at a figure which would, with the credits allowed by the plaintiff, make a balance in his (the defendant's) favor. On the trial in the district court, the jury found, as a matter of fact, that the plaintiff worked for the defendant thirteen months and that the reasonable value of such services was $36.50 a month. Taking the verdict of the jury in connection with the facts admitted by the pleadings, a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $124.25. It was insisted that this verdict was not in conformity with the requirements of the code and not sufficient to support a judgment. The Colorado Code, § 200, provides, that when a verdict is found for the plaintiff in an action for the recovery of money, or for the defendant, when a counter-claim for the recovery of money is established exceeding the amount of the plaintiff's claim as established, the jury will also find the amount of the recovery. The supreme court, however, resolved that this was a special verdict which the jury in their discretion were authorized to render, and while the verdict should not be commended as a model, still it determines the controversy between the parties, leaving the amount of the recovery a mere matter of arithmetical computation. The verdict was upheld. Knight v. Fisher, 15 Colo. 176.

Where the verdict of a jury did not in terms specify the amount in dollars, find the exact amount of damages by their verdict,¹ where the finding is for a certain sum with a specified rate of interest from a designated date, judgment may properly be rendered for the principal sum, and the interest calculated in conformity with the terms of the verdict.² A simple expression of opinion is not, in but simply that the plaintiff should recover a specified amount per month from the institution of the suit to the rendition of the verdict, such a finding was held sufficient, in that it might be made certain. Secrest v. Jones, 30 Tex. 596.

But in a suit to recover a slave illegally withheld, and for his hire during that time, a verdict finding the slave for the plaintiff, and finding his hire to be $150 per year, but not finding any particular sum for hire, will not authorize a judgment against the defendant for $450 hire for the time during which the defendant had possession. Bradshaw v. Mayfield, 24 Tex. 481.

Where, though a verdict is informal and omits to state the result, if it can be ascertained and rendered certain by a simple operation in arithmetic, the maxim, Id certum est quod certum reddi potest applies, and the verdict is held to be amply sufficient upon which to found a judgment. Gibson v. Lewis, 27 Mo. 532.

A verdict and judgment for the debt claimed in the declaration, with interest from a certain time and subject to the credit of a specified sum, is sufficiently certain. Barrett v. Wills, 4 Leigh (Va.) 114; 26 Am. Dec. 315; Grays v. Hines, 4 Munf. (Va.) 437.

1. Meeke v. Gardella, 1 Wash. 139.

This case goes to the extreme of holding that a verdict for a certain sum, "with legal interest," is too uncertain to support any verdict whatever, unless the words "with legal interest" be disregarded as surplusage.

App. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 219; Barrett v. Wills, 4 Leigh (Va.) 114; 26 Am. Dec. 315.

The jury returned a verdict for a certain sum with six per cent. interest thereon from a previous date named. As only a simple computation was necessary to fix the exact amount of the verdict so that it might be expressed in one sum, the supreme court was of the opinion that the verdict was sufficient. "It is a maxim of the law," says the court, "that that is sufficiently certain which can be rendered certain." As only a simple arithmetical calculation was necessary in this case, the court might make it and render judgment accordingly. Gaff v. Hutchinson, 38 Ind. 341.

In another case, where the jury found the rate of interest and the amount upon which it was to be calculated, and the date from which it was to run, leaving nothing but a mere arithmetical operation to determine the amount of the judgment, such a verdict was held sufficiently certain. Buchanan v. Townsend, 80 Tex. 534.

In Griffin v. Chadwick, 44 Tex. 406, it is held that where the date can be determined from the pleadings from which the interest, found in the verdict for the plaintiff, shall be computed, a verdict for a "sum certain and interest" is not void for uncertainty.

In the case of Barrett v. Wills, 4 Leigh (Va.) 114; 26 Am. Dec. 315, a verdict for the plaintiff, for the debt in the declaration mentioned, with interest from the tenth of September, 1826, subject to a credit of $53, paid on the 26th of September, 1826, was held to be good, and that the court might render the proper judgment thereon.

In Georgia, a verdict on two promissory notes, "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff the sum of eleven hundred and fourteen dollars and four cents, with interest and cost of suit, etc.," was held sufficiently certain. The court contended that the amount could be made certain and that the jury, having found the exact sum of the two notes with interest thereon, meant of course interest from the time the notes respectively legal contemplation, a verdict,¹ as there must be a definite affirmation or negative of the facts in issue.² Juries may frequently adopt a roundabout way of arriving at a proper conclusion, but if their course can be followed with certainty by the court, their finding will be upheld.³

In criminal cases, where the indictment charges an offense of which there are several grades, the verdict should state, if it finds the defendant guilty, the degree of which the jury mean to convict;⁴ and in prosecutions for larceny, or for the reception of became due. Beckwith v. Carleton, 14 Ga. 691.

The jury, in an action of assumpsit, found a verdict for ten dollars and interest from a certain date. Such a finding clearly warranted a judgment for the principal with interest added. "The calculation of interest," says the court, "was a mere clerical act; in fact, the result of the calculation may be presumed to have been submitted to the jury and approved by them." Page v. Cody, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 115.

Where the demand was for unliquidated damages, a verdict for a certain sum and interest was objected to on the ground that the jury could only give interest by way of damages, and they had not so allowed it. It was held, however, that the jury had found for the plaintiff on the issue, and although they had not assessed a specific sum for his entire damages, they had furnished certain data upon which the court could, with the same facility, ascertain the amount as in the case of a promissory note. State Bank v. Bowie, 1 McMull. (S. Car.) 429.

Verdict Ignoring Interest.—But a court cannot give interest on the sum found by a jury, unless some stipulation therefor is in terms made by the verdict, according to, Hallum v. Dickinson, 47 Ark. 120; Bedford v. Jacobs, 5 Martin N. S. (La.) 448; Commandeur v. Russell, 5 Martin N. S. (La.) 457; Dale v. Downs, 7 Martin N. S. (La.) 225; Chain v. Kelso, 7 Martin N. S. 1. Diehl v. Evans, 1 S. & R. (Pa.) 366.

2. The object of a verdict is to announce to the court the judgment of the jury as to how far the facts established by the findings conform to those which are alleged and put in issue by the pleadings. As the facts thus declared constitute the basis of the judgment, it follows that the verdict must either affirm or negative such of the disputed facts as will, in connection with those admitted, if any, support a legal judgment. Darden v. Mathews, 22 Tex. 320. And see Mendelsohn v. Anaheim Lighter Co., 40 Cal. 657.

3. Dougherty v. Ward, 87 Cal. 81.

4. For instance, on a trial of an indictment for murder, a jury should ascertain by their verdict the precise grade of which the defendant is guilty, or the court may not pass sentence on the verdict. Robertson v. State, 42 Ala. 509; Hall v. State, 40 Ala. 698; and see Edgar v. State, 43 Ala. 312; Weatherford v. State, 43 Ala. 319; Hall v. State, 31 Fla. 176; Lovett v. State, 31 Fla. 164; Nelson v. State, 32 Fla. 244.

In Arkansas, it has been held that the statute (Mansfield's Arkansas Digest, § 2284) providing that "the jury shall in all cases of murder, on conviction of the accused, find by their verdict whether he be guilty of murder in the first or second degree," applies only where the indictment is for murder in the first degree; and on indictment for murder in the second degree a verdict of "guilty as charged in the indictment" is sufficient. Porter v. State, 57 Ark. 267; Carpenter v. State, 58 Ark. 233.

Forgery is divided by an Alabama statute into three different grades, and a general verdict in a trial on an indictment simply charging forgery, would not be sufficient, as it would be necessary for the jury to specify the grade of offense of which they desired to convict; but where the indictment charges forgery of a certain degree, a verdict of "guilty as charged in the indictment" is as certain and free from doubt as a more specific finding could be. Anderson v. State, 65 Ala. 553. And see Davis v. State, 52 Ala. 357.

The California Code provides that whenever a crime is distinguished by stolen property, where the value of the subject-matter of the offense forms a statutory element in the commission of the crime, the jury must find the value of such property, in order that it may clearly appear that the prescribed punishment can be legally inflicted.¹

d. AMOUNT—ASSESSMENT OF DAMAGES.—It is a generally recognized rule of practice that a verdict rendered in a suit seeking damages, liquidated or unliquidated, should, if it be for the plaintiff, expressly state the amount to which the jury deem him entitled.² In some jurisdictions this is true, even in actions of debt it into degrees, the jury, if they convict a defendant, must find the degree of crime of which he is guilty; hence, in the case of People v. Coch, 53 Cal. 627, where the defendant was indicted for arson, a verdict of "guilty as charged in the indictment" was held defective for being too general, as arson is divided into degrees by the code; and in People v. Campbell, 40 Cal. 129, where the defendant was tried on an indictment for murder, a similar verdict was criticised for the same reason; and in People v. Gilbert, 60 Cal. 108, which was a prosecution for the crime of robbery, a verdict, "we, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the information," was declared sufficient, though it was insisted, that as the crime of robbery included as well that of larceny, the jury should have particularly specified for which crime they intended to convict; but it was held that as the charge in the indictment was robbery, a verdict finding the defendant guilty as charged was amply sufficient, as there is but one degree of the crime of robbery. Under the circumstances it is reasonable to presume that if the jury had intended to find guilty of larceny, they would have said, "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of larceny;" and see also People v. DeCler, 60 Cal. 382; People v. Wing (Cal. 1890), 24 Pac. Rep. 1026; People v. Bannister (Cal. 1893), 34 Pac. Rep. 710; People v. Cornwell (Cal. 1894), 35 Pac. Rep. 566; People v. Lee Yune Chong, 94 Cal. 379.

When a defendant is charged with grand larceny, a verdict, "guilty as charged," is a sufficient finding of the degree of the crime. People v. Whiteley, 64 Cal. 211; People v. Perez, 87 Cal. 122.

Where, on a trial for murder by poisoning, the verdict of the jury was, "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty and assess his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for life," the verdict was held to be fatally defective for non-compliance with the provision of the Texas code, which requires that if the jury shall find any person guilty of murder, they shall also find by their verdict whether it is of the first or second degree. This statute is mandatory, and the fact that the verdict was committed by poison, which is murder in the first degree per se, does not affect the application of the statutory rule. Johnson v. State, 30 Tex. App. 419.

1. In Illinois, there can be no imprisonment in the penitentiary for the offense of receiving property obtained by robbery, unless the value of the property exceeds $15, and in such a case, to justify sentence of imprisonment in the penitentiary, a verdict must find the value of the property, so that it can be shown to be a case where the punishment of imprisonment in the penitentiary can be legally inflicted. Tobin v. People, 104 Ill. 565; Sawyer v. People, 8 Ill. 53.

Likewise, on trial of an indictment for larceny, where the verdict was "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty, and sentence him to the penitentiary for the term of three years," it was held that the value of the goods stolen must be ascertained by the verdict, as the statutes declare that no person convicted of larceny shall be condemned to the penitentiary unless the money or value of the thing stolen shall amount to $5. Highland v. People, 2 Ill. 392.

At common law, the rule that the jury must assess the damages was applicable to a special as well as a general verdict, and the failure of the jury to assess damages was ground for venire facias de novo. Kynaston v. Mayor, 2 Stra. 1052.

In Miller v. Hower, 2 Rawle (Pa.) 53, in pronouncing a judgment rendered on a verdict assessing no amount as void, Huston, J., observed: "It is useless to talk about judgment for default of plea, or by nil dicit, etc. There, a writ of inquiry will ascertain the sum, or it may be done by the officer of the court; but who ever heard of a writ of inquiry of damages, or the sum being ordered to be ascertained by a prothonotary after a jury sworn at the bar, trying the cause and giving a general verdict?"

The Indiana Rev. Stat. of 1881, § 548, provides that in actions for the recovery of money, the jury must assess the amount of the recovery. This provision is not restricted to general verdicts, but is applicable as well to special. Wainwright v. Burroughs, 1 Ind. App. 393.

In an action of assumpsit, the jury returned a verdict that the defendants "did assume as alleged," without assessing any damages. For this reason the verdict was held to be too imperfect to afford a foundation for a judgment. Ames v. Sloat, Wright (Ohio) 577.

In Van Shaick v. Trotter, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 599, which was an action on a promissory note executed by two defendants jointly, one of whom suffered judgment by default, and the other pleaded to the issue, it was held that the jury who tried the issue must assess damages against both at the same time.

In suits on bonds for the performance of covenants, it is compulsory on the plaintiff to assign breaches and have his damages assessed, and when breaches are assigned, the jury at the trial must assess damages for such breaches as the plaintiff shall prove. Van Benthuyzen v. DeWitt, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 213.

In an action on two promissory notes and on accounts stated, non-assumpsit and set-off were pleaded. The case was tried before a jury who returned a verdict finding for the plaintiff, but not specifying the amount for which they so found. The verdict was duly recorded and the jury separated. It was held that such a verdict was fatally defective. Gaither v. Wilmer, 71 Md. 361.

In a suit on an open account, if the jury find generally for the plaintiff, without ascertaining the sum due, it is error to render judgment thereon for the sum demanded. Taylor v. Hathaway, 29 Ark. 597.

In Neville v. Northcutt, 7 Coldw. (Tenn.) 294, which was an action to recover an account due for goods, wares, and merchandise, upon the return of the jury into court, after having retired to consider their verdict, they were asked by the clerk if they had agreed. The foreman replied that they had and found for the plaintiff. The jury were then asked the amount they had found, and the foreman replied that they had not agreed upon the amount, but the understanding was that the amount of the account should be their verdict. Upon this finding the court pronounced judgment for the amount of the account and costs. The judgment was reversed on appeal by the supreme court.

Action of Ejectment.—If the jury, in an action of ejectment, render a verdict for the plaintiff without assessing any damages, a judgment for the plaintiff, for the possession of the premises and damages, is not sustained by the verdict. Cannon v. Davies, 33 Ark. 56.

Detinue.—In actions of detinue, the jury should not find a verdict in the alternative; that is, the property sued for, or a certain sum in lieu thereof. The proper course is to describe the property and assess its value, so that if the property cannot be had, its value as estimated by the jury may be recovered. In Crozier v. Gano, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 257, the jury found a verdict for certain slaves, naming each separately, if to be had; and if not, then in lieu thereof, certain sums. The court denounced this brought for a specific sum,¹ though in such cases, reference to the pleadings has generally been allowed to determine the amount verdict as informal, but seemed to think the intention of the jury was plain, that the sums found were intended as the value of the slaves. Hence, the court overlooked the informality and regarded the true intent of the jury.

Trover.—In trover, a verdict should not be in the alternative. This proceeding demands the value of the property at the time of the conversion, and a verdict finding in favor of the plaintiff for the possession of the property described in the complaint, or its value, if a return cannot be had, is erroneous. However, the portion of the verdict relating to the return of the property may be disregarded as surplusage if it can be separated from that part which is as it should be. Swan v. Smith, 13 Nev. 257.

Replevin.—In actions of replevin, where there has been a delivery to the plaintiff under the writ, the property being in his possession at the time of the finding and judgment, it is not necessary that a judgment should be recovered for the possession or delivery, and a finding of the value of the property is wholly unnecessary. Van Gundy v. Carrigan, 4 Ind. App. 333.

In actions for the recovery of property susceptible of a division and a distinct valuation, the jury should find the separate value of each article; thus, where an action was brought for the recovery of certain slaves, a judgment rendered on a verdict assessing the value of a woman and her child in the aggregate, was reversed for this reason. Blakely v. Duncan, 4 Tex. 184.

Where suit is brought for the recovery of a specific piece of property, in a case where judgment, if the plaintiff prevails, would be rendered in the alternative; namely, for the recovery of the matter in controversy, or its value, it is generally necessary that the verdict should assess the value of the property. Blakely v. Duncan, 4 Tex. 184; Avery v. Avery, 12 Tex. 54; 62 Am. Dec. 513.

In Avery v. Avery, 12 Tex. 54; 62 Am. Dec. 513, while the general rule is recognized, an exception is noted. This case, was also an action for the recovery of a slave, and the jury found a verdict, "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff with $80 damages and cost of suit." This verdict was objected to on the ground that the jury should have found the value of the slave sued for. In considering this question, the appellate court said: "In many cases it is essential to the interest of the parties that this should be done. If the property sued for was beyond the reach of the jurisdiction of the court at the time of the verdict and judgment, nothing but compensation for it could be obtained, and the amount of that compensation should be determined by the jury. This would be necessary to the interests of both plaintiff and defendant; but where one particular piece of property is sued for and that is sued for in specie, and not in the alternative of damages, if the plaintiff establishes his right to the property, ample and complete justice can only be awarded by a judgment for the restitution of the property so claimed. In this case the prayer of the petition was for the specific property; and to secure this object the plaintiff had secured the sequestration of it for the purpose of keeping it within the jurisdiction of the court. Under such circumstances, the necessity of assessing its value is not perceived. The fact that the property sued for was under the control of the court was, doubtless, the reason why the verdict was so found, it being sufficient on which to base a judgment in accordance with the prayer of the petition." The decision of the court in Blakely v. Duncan, 4 Tex. 184, is not necessarily disturbed by this case, as in the former instance it did not appear that the slaves were under the control of the court. See also Van Gundy v. Carrigan, 4 Ind. App. 333.

Separate Assessment—Each Item.

Where the plaintiff claims damages for so much diminished ability, and another amount for suffering, and recovers a verdict for less than either sum, the defendant cannot complain that the court declined to require an assessment of each item separately. Bonner v. Green (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 24 S. W. Rep. 835.

A verdict in an action of debt finding no specific sum, is void, and a judgment rendered thereon will be reversed on this ground alone. Schmertz v. Shreeve, 62 Pa. St. 457; 1 Am. Rep. 439; Whitesides v. Russell, 8 W. & S. (Pa.) 44.

In Missouri, there exists a statutory provision to the effect that when a verdict shall be found for the plaintiff in an action for the recovery of money only, the jury shall also assess the amount of the recovery. Hence, in an action on a promissory note, where the execution of the note was denied by the answer, it was the duty of the jury to assess the amount due upon the note. Upon a finding by the jury of the issue in favor of the plaintiff, the court had no right to invade the province of the jury to ascertain the amount due upon the note and render judgment therefor. Cates v. Nickell, 42 Mo. 170; Burghart v. Brown, 60 Mo. 24; Poulson v. Collier, 18 Mo. App. 604.

In Poulson v. Collier, 18 Mo. App. 583, the verdict of the jury was in the following language: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff the amount of the note sued on, under the instructions of the court," whereupon, the counsel for the plaintiff made the calculation and announced to the court that the amount of the note sued on was $184, and the court changed the verdict as returned by the jury by interlineation, so as to make it read as follows: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff the sum of $184, the amount of the note sued on, under the instructions of the court." It was held that the amount of the note was a material fact and the jury alone could find it, courts not being allowed to substitute their findings for those of the juries. Henley v. Arbuckle, 13 Mo. 111. And even though the jury assented to the amended verdict, the error was not cured. The verdict in this case was held to be manifestly imperfect without the amount of the note, and not even valid when amended by the court to this extent.

The California Code of Civil Pro- cedure provides that where a defendant establishes a claim for the recovery of money, in an action for the recovery of money, greater than the claim established by the plaintiff the jury must find the amount of the recovery. California Code Civ. Proc., § 626.

In Electric Imp. Co. v. San Jose, etc., R. Co. (Cal. 1892), 31 Pac. Rep. 455, the jury returned a verdict for the defendant "for its costs." Such verdict was held not to be within the statute just referred to, because, it being for costs only, there is no actual recovery by either party.

In an action of debt on a bond, the jury found for the plaintiff and assessed his "damages" at $154. This was held insufficient, as it did not find the amount of the debt, "which," says the court, "is a fact which a party has a right to have found by the jury." Hinckley v. West, 9 Ill. 136; Frazier v. Laughlin, 6 Ill. 358.

In Drage v. Brand, 2 Wils. 377, the jury found that the defendant in the suit owed the debt, but omitted to assess damages for the breach assigned. The verdict was held to be erroneous and the judgment was reversed. See also Goodwin v. Crowle, 1 Cowp. 357.

In Hardy v. Bern, 5 T. R. 636, error was brought in the exchequer, chamber upon the judgment, because, as the alleged breaches of the bond sued on were denied by the defendant and issue joined thereon, the jury had found the issues for the plaintiffs and had given damages only for the detention of the debt and had not assessed damages for the breaches. Upon the opinion of Lord Kenyon and Mr. Justice Buller that damages must be assessed, the judgment was reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

Action on Foreign Judgment.—A verdict in an action of debt, on the decree of a court of a sister state, should find the amount of the debt due. Williams v. Preston, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 600; 20 Am. Dec. 179.

An action was brought on a contract which, if established, would entitle the plaintiff to recover $63. The jury declared themselves satisfied that such contract had been made, but rendered a verdict for only $50, although the evidence in the case tended to show that the plaintiff was entitled to $63, or nothing. It was held, however, that as the jury recognized the existence of the contract, at any rate the defendant could not object to the amount of the

for which judgment should be rendered.¹ A distinction may be noticed under circumstances where the amount is not actually in issue. Here, a simple finding for the plaintiff or defendant is sufficient without specifying any particular sum.² This proposition may be verdict, for the error, if error there was, was in his favor and not to his prejudice. Fischer v. Holmes, 123 Ind. 525.

1. Smith v. Mohn, 87 Cal. 489; Mitchell v. Geisendorff, 44 Ind. 358; Brickley v. Weghorn, 71 Ind. 497; Wainwright v. Burrows, 1 Ind. App. 393; Newton v. Ker, 14 La. Ann. 715; James v. Wilson, 7 Tex. 230; Avery v. Avery, 12 Tex. 54; 62 Am. Dec. 513.

The amount claimed in the petition was $639.75, with interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum from a certain date. The verdict of the jury was for the full amount claimed, and on this verdict a judgment requiring the defendant to pay the full amount of the plaintiff's demand with interest as it appeared in the petition, was upheld, as the precise amount due could be made certain by reference to the pleadings. Newton v. Ker, 14 La. Ann. 715.

A verdict for the plaintiff in the sum sued for, where the petition claimed a certain sum of money due as principle and claimed interest in general terms is sufficiently certain to authorize a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. James v. Wilson, 7 Tex. 230.

Pl.) 454; Buckley v. Bramhall, 24 How. Pr. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 455; English v. Goodman (N. Dak. 1892), 54 N. W. Rep. 540.

In an action brought to recover the penalty of $500, which is imposed by the Alabama statutes upon a judge of probate for issuing a license, contrary to the provision of the article in which that section is embraced, the verdict was simply, "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff." However, in a suit for a sum of money which is fixed by law as a penalty for a certain act, if the plaintiff recovers at all, he must necessarily recover the specific sum which the law prescribes as the penalty. Such a verdict merely finding for the plaintiff and assessing no damages is, nevertheless, sufficient to authorize a judgment for the statutory penalty and the costs of the action. Cotten v. Rutledge, 33 Ala. 110.

Although the Kentucky Code provides that, where by a verdict either party is entitled to recover money of the adverse party, the jury in their verdict must assess the amount of the recovery, yet in an action on a promissory note where the defense was usury, and the issue was upon that plea alone, a verdict simply finding "for the plaintiff" is sufficient to support a judgment for the amount of the note and interest. Cooper v. Poston, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 92; 85 Am. Dec. 610.

The general rule is, that in a verdict for the plaintiff the amount of the recovery should be assessed; but where it was agreed between counsel that the only issue to be tried was whether a certain contract had been entered into or not, and where the jury had been instructed by the court that the only question to be considered was whether the defendant in the case had made such contract, a verdict simply for the plaintiff, without finding the amount of the recovery, is valid. Redmond v. Weismann, 77 Cal. 423.

The defendants in Hall v. Emporia First Nat. Bank, 133 Ill. 234, had allowed judgment to go against them by default, and the court thereupon assessed damages and rendered final judgment. On motion of the defendants, the court stayed the judgment and allowed the defendants to plead, but refused to set aside the judgment, allowing it to stand as security for the plaintiff until the trial of the issue presented by the pleadings. If the defendants failed to establish their defense, the judgment was to stand. Under such circumstances, the verdict of the jury simply finding the issue for the plaintiffs and assessing no damages, was not erroneous in form or substance. The question of damages was not submitted to them and the defendants availed themselves of the leave of the court to plead to the merits, the former judgment still standing as security. The question of damages clearly illustrated by an action on a promissory note, the execution of which is admitted, the only defense being lack of consideration. In such a case, a verdict generally for the plaintiff sufficiently determines the controversy, and, by reference to the note, judgment may be rendered for the proper amount.¹ Where double or treble damages are recoverable, if the jury find a general verdict for the plaintiff, they should assess single damages, leaving it for the court to pronounce judgment for the multiple of the sum so found, in accordance with law;² and, in the absence of statutes regulating the subject, it has been resolved, in an action of assumpsit, that if the jury are of the opinion that an amount tendered and paid into court by the defendant is insufficient, their proper course is to render a verdict for the entire amount of the plaintiff's demand, leaving it to the court to deduct the amount of the tender and render a judgment for the balance.³ An English case is authority for the statement that when a jury find generally for the plaintiff, but further find that there is no evidence as to the amount of damages, the court should enter a verdict for nominal damages.⁴ It is also maintained that, upon a verdict for nominal damages, a judgment for one cent is not improper.⁵ Where the jury find a general verdict for a certain sum, if concomitant special findings show the

was not in issue. As upon a simple finding for the plaintiff or defendant, the former judgment was to be enforced or annulled.

In an action on two promissory notes, where the amount of the notes and interest was admitted by the counsel for the defendants, it was held to be not absolutely necessary that a special verdict establishing the defendant's liability should contain an assessment of the amount of the recovery. Bulkly v. Marks, 15 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 454; Buckley v. Bramhall, 24 How. Pr. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 455.

1. California Code of Procedure, § 626, provides that, when a verdict is found for the plaintiff in an action for the recovery of money, the jury must also find the amount of the recovery. However, where the record showed that there was no issue between the parties as to the execution, terms, or amount of the promissory note, the only issue being whether or not the note had been made without consideration, a verdict finding for the plaintiff without assessing the amount of the recovery would seem to respond to the issue and to be sufficiently certain to found a judgment upon, although it must be admitted that a verdict in such form would be irregular. However, taken together, the record and verdict showed the exact sum which the jury meant to find for the plaintiff as surely as if the verdict had contained the amount in terms. Hutchinson v. Inyo County, 61 Cal. 119.

"One Mill" Damages.—Under the laws of New York, all fractions of money less than cents are, in judicial proceedings, rejected; hence, on a verdict for "one mill," no judgment could be rendered. Brown v. Smith, 3 Cal. (N. Y.) 81.

In Gold Coin.—Where there is no issue as to whether the plaintiff's demand is payable in gold coin, and the complaint contains no averment on that point, a verdict finding for the plaintiff a certain amount in "gold coin," though irregular, may be sustained by rejecting the words "gold coin" as surplusage. Watson v. San Francisco, etc., R. Co., 50 Cal. 523; Chamberlin v. Vance, 51 Cal. 85; Marquard v. Wheeler, 52 Cal. 445.

plaintiff to be entitled to a different amount, judgment should be rendered in accordance with the special findings, notwithstanding the fact that the plaintiff may thus recover more than he is allowed by the general verdict.¹

A plaintiff should not be awarded a greater amount of damages than is demanded by him,² but it is immaterial if a verdict exceeds the amount indorsed on the writ, so it corresponds with the amount claimed in the declaration.³

c. REDUCTION OF AMOUNT BY REMITTITUR.—If a verdict, in other respects valid,⁴ is excessive in amount, the court may, in its discretion, instead of unconditionally awarding a new trial, give the successful party the option of reducing the amount of his recovery to the extent of the excess.⁵ The exercise of this authority is generally confined to cases where the damages are so excessive as to induce the belief that the jury have been influenced

2. Wathen v. Byrne (Ky. 1889), 12 S. W. Rep. 197.

The plaintiff's complaint contained three counts. The first, in substance, that on October 30, 1877, he got upon the rear platform of one of the defendant's cars as a passenger; that the conductor, without asking him for his fare or giving him opportunity to pay it, violently threw him off in front of a car passing upon an adjoining track, and he was run over and injured to his damage $10,000. The other two counts related to the same accident, alleging that it occurred through defendant's negligence, each closing "to his damage $10,000." In the prayer for relief, the plaintiff asked damages "to the amount of $20,000." Upon the trial the court ruled in substance that the plaintiff could only recover on the first count. He obtained a verdict for $15,000. The defendant claimed that as the said first count only alleged $10,000 damages, the verdict was unauthorized; the court held, however, that the general prayer for damages at the close of the complaint controlled, but that if, in order to sustain a recovery, the first count should have alleged $15,000 damages, the defect was one that could be amended on appeal. Schultz v. Third Ave. R. Co., 89 N. Y. 242.

3. Williams v. Williams, 11 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 393.

4. Dickinson, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Craig v. Cook, 28 Minn. 232, said: "It may naturally be supposed, that in general, where other issues than merely the amount of damages arise in a case, the same passion and prejudice which is indicated by the awarding of excessive damages, may have affected the determination of the jury upon other issues also; and if this should be deemed a fact, a new trial should be awarded. But, while it may hence be considered, that the trial court ought not generally to refuse a trial de novo, where a verdict is so excessive as to lead to the conviction that the jury has been influenced by passion or prejudice in awarding it, yet, in a particular case, the court might feel satisfied that the verdict of the jury is right, and ought to stand, only that it is excessive in amount; and where it does not appear that the court has exceeded the limits of discretion in such a case, its determination will not be disturbed."

The New York Code of Civil Procedure confers the power, upon an appeal from a judgment or order, on the appellate court, to reverse, affirm, or modify the judgment or order appealed from. It is the settled practice of the court, on a motion for a new trial for excessive damages, to refuse to set aside the verdict if the parties will consent to deduct the amount deemed excessive. Sears v. Conover, 3 Keyes (N. Y.) 113.

Malicious Prosecution.—In the case of Blunt v. Little, 3 Mason (U. S.) 102, the plaintiff recovered $2,000 in an action for damages for malicious prosecution. Justice Story, delivering the opinion of the appellate court, and considering the question of excessive damages, says: "After full reflection, I am of opinion that it is reasonable that the cause should be submitted to another jury, unless the plaintiff is willing to remit $500 of his damages."

Action on Warranty.—An action of assumpsit was brought on a contract of warranty given upon the sale of a horse. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff assessing the damages at $18 for breach of the warranty contained in the contract as to the age of the animal, and $44 for breach of the warranty as to his physical condition. The appellate court held that according to the contract there was no warranty as to the age of the horse and that the verdict for damages on this account was improper. Accordingly, it ordered that if the plaintiff would remit the $18 assessed for breach of the warranty as to age, he might take judgment for the remainder. Willard v. Stevens, 24 N. H. 271.

Assault and Ejection.—The plaintiff sued the defendant railroad in trespass for an assault and ejection from the defendant's cars while lawfully riding therein, causing him damage to his business by the detention, and subjecting him to expense and great mortification.

The verdict was for an amount which the court deemed exorbitant. The supreme court held that if the plaintiff would consent to remit $200, judgment might be entered on the verdict with costs of the suit. Belknap v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 49 N. H. 358.

Injury to Passenger.—Collins v. Albany, etc., R. Co., 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 492, was an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained while the plaintiff was a passenger on the defendant's cars. Here, the verdict was excessive, so the supreme court thought, and it was held that the finding could not be allowed to stand unless the personal representative of the plaintiff would consent to have it reduced by such a sum as would obviate this objection.

In Illinois, in an action for damages for personal injuries, the jury found for the plaintiff and assessed his damages at $10,000. On motion by the defendant for a new trial, the plaintiff's attorney remitted $6,000 of the finding, whereupon the trial court overruled the motion for a new trial and rendered judgment for the balance, and for this amount the verdict was sustained. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Ebert, 74 Ill. 399.

Corcoran v. Harran, 55 Wis. 120, was a civil action for assault and battery, commenced in a justice's court, where the plaintiff recovered a judgment for $100. Defendant appealed to the circuit court, and the plaintiff was there awarded $200 damages. The defendant then moved for a new trial on the ground of excessive damages, when the circuit court permitted the plaintiff to remit $100 from the amount of the verdict, and thereupon denied the motion and entered judgment in the plaintiff's favor for $100. The defendant then appealed, contending that the judgment should be reversed, because the plaintiff, on the defendant's motion for a new trial on account of excessive damage, had been allowed to remit as above stated, and then have judgment for the balance. The supreme court declined to disturb the judgment.

Option to Remit—When to Be Exercised.—A period is always set within which the option must be exercised. Chils v. Gronlund, 41 Fed. Rep. 145; Deblin v. Murphy, 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 19; Kinsey v. Wallace, 36 Cal. 463; Roberts v. Taylor, 17 Neb. 184.

Long*, 1 Wils. 30; Percival v. Spencer, Yel. 45. Others limit the period to the same term in which judgment has been given. Harris v. Jaffray, 3 Har. & J. (Md.) 543; Herbert v. Hardenbergh, 10 N. J. L. 222. It seems that the more recent English decisions, however, permit a remittitur to be entered both after judgment and the term in which it has been given. Usher v. Dansey, 4 M. & S. 94; Hardy v. Cathcart, 1 Marsh. C. P. 180; Pickwood v. Wright, 1 H. Bl. 642; Corning v. Corning, 6 N. Y. 97. See also 2 Tidd's Pr. 942.

Reversal for Excess, Indicating Proper Amount.—The supreme court of Wisconsin, in the case of Potter v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 22 Wis. 615, instead of allowing a remittitur, preferred to reverse the judgment and indicate an amount for which they thought it reasonable that a verdict should be upheld. This practice was followed in Goodno v. Oshkosh, 28 Wis. 306, but departed from, it seems, in Corcoran v. Harran, 55 Wis. 120.

Voluntary Remittitur.—The remittitur may be voluntary and without the dictation or suggestion of the court. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Ebert, 74 Ill. 399; International, etc., Co. v. Wilkes, 68 Tex. 617; Herbert v. Hardenbergh, 10 N. J. L. 222.

Peremptory Remittitur.—Where it not only appears from the record that the judgment of the inferior court is excessive, but also what it should have been, the appellate tribunal sometimes adopts the practice of peremptory remittitur instead of allowing the plaintiff the option to relinquish.

In Georgia, the supreme court adopted this practice. In Western Union Tel. Co. v. Carroll, 84 Ga. 597. Here the plaintiff sued the Western Union Telegraph Company for the erroneous transmission of a certain message and recovered a verdict for $25. It appearing by the evidence that the plaintiff had offered to settle with the defendant for $10, Blandford, Jr., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It is manifest to us that there should have been no greater recovery in this case than for the sum of $10, and that the verdict for $25 was erroneous; but inasmuch as the plaintiff had offered to compromise and settle the case with the defendant at a fair sum, which was due him, viz., the sum of $10, we affirm the judgment of the court below, with the direction that the court cause to be written off from the judgment and verdict all in excess of the sum of $10." See also Black v. Carrolton R. Co., 10 La. Ann. 33; 63 Am. Dec. 586.

In actions of tort as well as contract, where the damages are clearly excessive, the trial judge may either grant a new trial absolutely, or give the plaintiff the option to remit the excess, and if he does so, order the verdict to stand for the residue. Hurry v. Watson, 4 T. R. 659; Blunt v. Little, 3 Mason (U. S.) 102; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Ebert, 74 Ill. 399; Fuller v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 31 Iowa 211; Collins v. Council Bluffs, 35 Iowa 432; Lombard v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 47 Iowa 494; Howard v. Grover, 28 Me. 97; 48 Am. Dec. 478; Craig v. Cook, 28 Minn. 232; Pratt v. Pioneer Press Co., 35 Minn. 251; Breck v. Smith, 44 Miss. 690; Belknap v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 49 N. H. 358; Collins v. Albany, etc., R. Co., 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 492; Clapp v. Hudson River R. Co., 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 461; Murray v. Hudson River R. Co., 47 Barb. (N. Y.) 196; McIntyre v. New York Cent. R. Co., 47 Barb. (N. Y.) 515; Dublin v. Murphy, 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 19; Corcoran v. Harran, 55 Wis. 120.

Several Items.—Though there are several disputed items included in a verdict, the failure of the court, in ordering a remittitur, to specify to which of the items it applies, is not a reversible error. Ingalls v. Allen, 43 Ill. App. 624.

1. Pickwood v. Wright, 1 H. Bl. 643; Woodruff v. Richardson, 20 Conn. 238; Lewis v. Cooke, 1 Har. & M. (Md.) 159; Jewell v. Gage, 42 Me. 247; Scott v. Chope, 33 Neb. 41; Furry v. Stone, 1 Yeates (Pa.) 186; Guerry v. Kerton, 2 Rich. (S. Car.) 507; Clapp v. Walters, 2 Tex. 130; Robson v. Watts, 11 Tex. 768; Bowe v. Rogers, 50 Wis. 602; Corcoran v. Harran, 55 Wis. 120.

Passion or Prejudice.—In an action of trover, where it appeared to the supreme court that the jury, in their indignation at the defendant's conduct, gave a greater amount of damages than they were by law authorized, departing from the legal measure of damages, it was held that there must be a new trial unless the plaintiff released the amount which was deemed to be in excess. Guerry v. Kerton, 2 Rich. (S. Car.) 507.

In Woodruff v. Richardson, 20 Conn. 238, which was an action of slander for charging the plaintiff with dishonesty, the jury returned a verdict for an amount so large that, to use the language of the reporter, "the judge at the circuit entirely dissented and returned them to a second consideration." In doing this, he expressed his own views and urged reasons upon the jury against so large an amount of damages; the result was a verdict more nearly commensurate with justice. The supreme court upheld the course of the trial judge in the matter.

In Ohio, the court in Pendleton St. R. Co. v. Rahmann, 22 Ohio St. 446, maintains that where the statute provides that if damages materially excessive appear to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice, the verdict shall be vacated, such statute is peremptory in its nature, the presence of passion or prejudice in producing the excess, vitiating the verdict in toto, thus excluding the authority of the court to validate any part of it, unless indeed with the consent of both parties, by recourse to this practice of allowing a remittitur.

It has also been held that where the verdict of a jury, in favor of the plaintiff, is so large that the irresistible conclusion is that the jury did not consider the defendant's side of the case at all, the error cannot be cured by a remittitur, no matter for what amount, for to allow this would be in fact to permit the plaintiff to make up his own verdict. Koeltz v. Bleekman, 46 Mo. 320.

Misapprehension or Mistake.—In all cases where there is no rule of law regulating the assessment of damages, and the amount does not depend on computation, the judgment of the jury and not the opinion of the court is to govern, unless the damages are so excessive as to warrant the belief that the jury must have been influenced by partiality or prejudice, or have been misled by some mistaken view of the merits of the case. Worster v. Canal Bridge, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 541; Ketchum v. Mukwa, 24 Wis. 303.

Impropriety in Mode of Deliberation.

—Where it was shown that, to a certain extent, the verdict of the jury was regularly found, but that the amount beyond a certain sum was determined by a chance device, it was held that if the plaintiff would remit the portion so erroneously found, that the verdict might be allowed to stand as to the residue. Fuller v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 31 Iowa 211.

Damage in Excess of Demand.—The plaintiff's counsel, upon inspecting the declaration, found that the damages allowed by the verdict were considerably more than the damages called for in the declaration. He therefore prayed the court, while the record was still before them, to allow the plaintiffs to enter a remittitur for the excess and take judgment for the residue, which the court allowed them to do. Furry v. Stone, 1 Yeates (Pa.) 186; Lewis v. Cooke, 1 Har. & M. (Md.) 159.

In an action of assumpsit, the plaintiff was given a verdict for six hundred and eleven pounds, which was the sum really due him, and entered up judgment for that amount besides costs, while the damages laid in the declaration were only six hundred pounds. The plaintiff was allowed to remit the excess and have a verdict for the residue. Pickwood v. Wright, 1 H. Bl. 643.

Where, upon the plaintiff's own showing, he was not entitled to more than $150, a verdict for $377.46 must be set aside, unless the plaintiff will consent to remit the excess. Jewell v. Gage, 42 Me. 247.

Where the jury find for the full amount of a note on which there appears an admitted credit, the plaintiff may remove this objection to the verdict by remitting the sum by which the verdict exceeds the proper amount. Robson v. Watts, 11 Tex. 768.

Where the court has general jurisdiction over a cause, and a verdict is found for more than the sum demanded, a remittitur may be entered as to the excess, and judgment taken for the residue, or the verdict may be set aside and leave then given to amend. Hirt v. Molony, 2 N. H. 323.

In Barber v. Rose, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 77, Cowen, J., said: "There is no doubt of the plaintiff's right, when the damages found in his favor exceed the amount claimed in his declaration, to remit the excess and take judgment for the sum demanded; and no good reason has been urged against his doing so in any case." See also Corning v. Corning, 6 N.

the verdict will operate to cure the effect of an erroneous instruction of the judge,¹ or the improper admission or exclusion of evidence.² A practice, the converse of that of allowing a remittitur, has also been recognized, and a verdict manifestly too small has been

1. In Hayden v. Florence Sewing Mach. Co., 54 N. Y. 221, the defendant was sued for illegally dispossessing the plaintiff of the possession of certain premises, and destruction of the plaintiff's property which was removed under the defendant's direction. The damages to the plaintiff's property were, by undisputed evidence, proven to be $4,645. The plaintiff also claimed to have sustained heavy pecuniary losses on account of the breaking up of his business. The court charged the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recovery for both. The defendant excepted as to the damage to the business, and the plaintiff obtained a verdict for $8,695. The general term reversed the judgment unless the plaintiff would stipulate to deduct as much as was allowed for damages to his business, and in case he so stipulated, judgment as to the residue was to be affirmed. The plaintiff acquiesced, and judgment for the proven value of his property destroyed was entered. On appeal, it was maintained not only that the general term had the right to order the conditional reversal, but that the erroneous charge of the judge as to the recovery for damages to the plaintiff's business was cured by the remittitur. See also Jones v. Hughes (Pa. 1889), 16 Atl. Rep. 849.

2. Improper Admission of Evidence.—In an action of trespass on the case to recover damages for personal injuries, the court allowed the plaintiff to prove what amount he had been compelled to pay for labor, which, had he not been injured, he would have done himself. The plaintiff testified that he had paid out for this purpose about $300, and, it being contended that the admission of such testimony was error, the plaintiff's counsel, when the verdict was rendered, entered a remittitur for that sum. This was held to have cured whatever error there was in the admission of this evidence. Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Beals, 50 Ill. 150.

Improper Exclusion of Evidence.—Where the case did not show the precise finding of the jury on the question of betterments, the plaintiff's evidence on that point having been erroneously excluded, it was held that the verdict must be set aside unless the tenant would remit the amount found for betterments. Wendell v. Moulton, 26 N. H. 41.

In an action of slander, in which evidence of bad reputation was erroneously excluded, the court ruled that the plaintiff might retain his verdict if he elected to have it reduced to one of nominal damages. Smith v. Williams, 116 Mass. 511.

On an assumpsit upon an open account for attorney's fees, a deposition of part payment was improperly rejected at the trial, but the appellate court permitted the plaintiff to enter a remittitur for the amount proved by the deposition, with interest up to the rendition of the verdict. Anderson v. Tarpley, 6 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 507.

Ignorance of Evidence.—In an action of assumpsit, the defendants introduced uncontradicted testimony to the effect that they paid the plaintiffs for three bales of cotton for which, among other things, the defendants were sued. The jury disregarded this testimony and rendered a verdict, not only for the other sums, but included the value of the cotton as well. The trial court decided that a new trial should be granted unless a remittitur was entered for the value of the said cotton, which was done. The court then overruled the motion for a new trial and rendered a judgment on the verdict after deducting the amount of the remittitur. Upon this judgment, an appeal was prosecuted, the error assigned being that the court below erred in refusing to grant a new trial. The supreme court commended the course of the court below. Young v. Englehard, 1 How. (Miss.) 19.

In Underwood v. Parrott, 2 Tex. 168, a suit was brought for the proceeds of certain cotton, to which the defendant pleaded set-off of an account embracing numerous articles of merchandise alleged to have been sold and delivered by him to the plaintiff. A verdict having been rendered for the plaintiff, the defendant moved for a allowed to stand upon the defendant's consenting to increase it to a reasonable amount.¹ Some judicatures hold, and it seems with reason, that it is only in cases where the law recognizes some fixed rules and principles to regulate the measure of damages, by which it may be determined how much the verdict is excessive, that the plaintiff may be allowed to remit such an amount as the court may declare excess, and have judgment for the remainder;²

new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to law and to the evidence. This motion was overruled by the court, but being of opinion that the verdict was for a sum exceeding that established by the proofs, the plaintiff was permitted to remit the excess and have judgment for the residue. The supreme court held that there was no error in permitting the remittitur to be entered.

In an action brought for the recovery of a slave, the verdict being for the return of the slave or the payment of $1,200, the plaintiff was allowed to reduce the assessment of the value of the slave to $900, there being no evidence to prove that the slave was worth more than the latter amount. Clapp v. Walters, 2 Tex. 130.

1. Where, in an action of tort to recover damages for the negligence of the defendant's servant, in driving his omnibus against the plaintiff, negligence was proved, and it appeared that the plaintiff's thigh had been broken and considerable expense incurred for the attendance of a surgeon, who also testified that it was doubtful whether the plaintiff would ever entirely recover. The jury brought in a verdict allowing "one farthing" damages. The court ordered a new trial, unless the defendant would consent to increase the verdict to an amount sufficient to cover the surgeon's bill. Armstrong v. Haley, 4 Q. B. 917. See also Collins v. Albany, etc., R. Co., 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 492; Clapp v. Hudson River R. Co., 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 461.

2. In Cromwell v. Wilkinson, 18 Ind. 369, it was held, that in a case where the damages depended upon calculation, as upon a promissory note, the court might take a remittitur of excess and it would cure the error, but where the damages depended upon judgment, on conflicting evidence or notions of compensation for tort—questions for the jury—that the nisi prius court had no power to fix the amount itself and then render judgment upon it.

Again, in Thomas v. Womack, 13 Tex. 580, it was maintained that, where the law recognizes some fixed rules and principles to regulate the measure of damages by which it may be determined in how much the verdict is excessive, as in actions on contracts and for torts done to property, the value of which may be ascertained by the evidence, a remittitur of the excess may be received as an answer to a motion for a new trial, on the ground of excessive damages, but where there are no such rules and principles by which to ascertain the excess, and it is uncertain and considerable, a new trial ought to be awarded, for to permit a verdict to be reduced to an amount which the court might think reasonable in such a case would be to substitute the opinion of the judge for that of the jury.

In Coffin v. Coffin, 4 Mass. 45; 3 Am. Dec. 189, which was an action to recover damages for slander, the court said: "Were we impressed with the belief that the damages were too great, and that a less sum would have been an adequate compensation to the plaintiff, yet whether our impression or the impression of the jury is the more correct, as judges, we are not authorized to determine. The plaintiff's counsel has intimated that he did not wish for larger damages than the court should think reasonable, as the object of his client in the prosecution was to obtain justice for his character, not to dispose of it for money. It is not the province of the court to advise either party, but as the jury have done ample justice to the plaintiff's character, we are satisfied that a liberal remission of a part of the damages would not in any manner operate to the plaintiff's dishonor. But unless there be a remission of a part of the damages, judgment must be entered according to the verdict."

The Chicago & North Western Railway Co. were sued for negligently causing the death of a girl about ten years old. The jury rendered a verdict for $3,375. The case being carried to the supreme court, it was suggested by the counsel for the plaintiff that if the damages should be deemed excessive, the court might indicate the amount of the excess and allow it to be remitted, and then affirm the judgment. The court held that it adopted such a practice where a portion of the judgment was illegal and readily severable from the rest and clearly ascertainable by the record, but where such was not the case, it would not substitute its judgment for that of the jury and allow the party to remit. Potter v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 22 Wis. 615. And see Park v. Hopkins, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 408.

In Nudd v. Wells, 11 Wis. 426, which was an action against an express company to recover damages for the non-delivery of a box of machinery. The plaintiff obtained a verdict for $1,087, and a motion to set aside the verdict and for a new trial was granted, unless the plaintiff would consent to reduce the verdict to $821, which he did. Judgment was thereupon entered, and the defendant appealed to the supreme court. In delivering the opinion of the court, Paine J., said: "The practice of remitting, where the illegal part is clearly distinguishable from the rest, and may be ascertained by the court without assuming the functions of the jury and substituting its judgment for theirs, is well settled. . . . But it ought not to be carried so far as to allow the court, when the jury has obviously mistaken the law, or the evidence, and rendered a verdict which ought not to stand, to substitute its own judgment for theirs, and, after determining upon the evidence, what amount ought to be allowed, allow the plaintiff to remit the excess, and then refuse a new trial." See also Corcoran v. Harran, 15 Wis. 127; Bigelow v. Doolittle, 36 Wis. 115.

In Pendleton St. R. Co. v. Rahmann, 22 Ohio St. 446, the distinction is made in questions concerning the allowance of a remittitur between actions, the subject of which is a contract, commercial, or other established standard of valuation, where the amount of the verdict, or the facts where known becomes a mere matter of computation, and in actions, the subject of which is without such standard of valuation, where the amount of the verdict is not a matter of computation but of opinion. In the first class of cases, it is maintained that any excess in the verdict, above what the evidence satisfactorily establishes, may, with the assent of the party in whose favor it is rendered, be eliminated by remittitur and judgment entered for the residue; but in the class of actions in which the opinion of the jury, unaided by any known standard of valuation, determines the magnitude of the recovery, the power of the court over the excessive finding is, in some instances, controlled by statutory conditions. Thus, where the statute provides that if damages materially excessive appear to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice, the verdict shall be vacated and a new trial granted, the terms of the statute being peremptory in their nature; although the verdict, if purged of any supposed excess, might, in the opinion of the court, be well sustained as to the residue by the facts disclosed, yet the presence and influence of passion or prejudice in producing the excess, vitiates the verdict in toto, and excludes the power of the court to validate, or save any part of it without the consent of both parties.

In Maffett v. Sackett, 18 N. Y. 522, it was held that it is competent for a court sitting at general term, on appeal from the special term, to allow or reject a claim of either party where its extent has been definitely fixed or can be clearly determined; but where the amount is indefinite and uncertain, it cannot be determined by the court without its assuming the province of the jury. And see Chouteau v. Suydam, 21 N. Y. 185; Cuff v. Dorland, 57 N. Y. 560.

Notwithstanding the cases in New York, holding that, in actions of tort for damages to the person, the general term has, on appeal from an order of the special term, made on motion to set aside a verdict for excessive damages, the right to make a conditional order reversing the judgment and granting a new trial, unless the plaintiff will consent to reduce the damages to a specified sum, and affirming it, if thus purged of the excess, in Whitehead v. Kennedy, 69 N. Y. 462, which was an action for attorney's services, the supreme court reversed the order of the general term, reversing a judgment for the plaintiff and ordering a new trial, unless the plaintiff would stipulate to reduce the damages to a certain amount, and, in that event, affirming the judgment for the part deemed not to be excessive. At the same time the supreme court declared that it did not intend to disturb the authority of those decisions which sanctioned the practice of allowing a remittitur in suits to recover damages for personal injuries, but contended that they must be regarded as applicable only to the class of cases in which such decisions were made.

A justice of the peace rendered a verdict for several dollars more than the proper amount. This judgment was affirmed by the county court, then reversed by the supreme court, and eventually found its way to the court of appeals. The amount seems to have been easily calculable as the suit was on a promissory note, and the court of appeals held that the judgment of the supreme court must be affirmed, unless the plaintiff would stipulate to remit the excess as of the day the judgment was rendered by the justice, in which latter event, the judgment of the supreme court must be reversed, and that of the justice and county court affirmed as modified. Brownell v. Winnie, 29 N. Y. 400; 86 Am. Dec. 314.

In Lambert v. Craig, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 199, a part of the plaintiff's demand was for wages, and it was proved that he had received, before the commencement of the action, sundry articles of value which should have been deducted from the amount due him on account of wages. Immediately after a verdict for the full amount, the plaintiff offered to remit such sum as should seem reasonable to the court on account of the articles received. On appeal, it was held that as the jury had allowed the plaintiff's whole claim, notwithstanding it had been proven that certain articles had been received which should have been deducted therefrom, which the plaintiff himself admitted by offering to remit, a new trial must be granted. "If the full value had been ascertained," said the court, "the amount might now be remitted and judgment entered for the residue, but unless the parties can agree as to the value, it must be ascertained by a jury and a new trial granted for that purpose."

Recovery of Original Debt After Compromise.—Where a party was sued on an indebtedness which had been compromised for a certain proportion of the original amount, and the jury returned a verdict for the entire amount of the debt, it was held that the excess might be remitted to the extent of the compromise, and the verdict might stand for the residue. Pierce v. Wood, 23 N. H. 519. The terms of this compromise were for a certain percentage of the original indebtedness, so the extent of the excess could be easily ascertained by a mathematical calculation. See also Sanborn v. Emerson, 12 N. H. 57; Pierce v. Wood, 23 N. H. 519; Willard v. Stevens, 24 N. H. 271; Odlin v. Gove, 41 N. H. 478; 77 Am. Dec. 773.

Under some circumstances, it is undeniably proper to allow a remittitur, although the amount of the excess is admittedly uncertain. Thus, where the plaintiff recovers the aggregate amount upon a demand consisting of several entire particulars, one of which embraces in part an erroneous claim, it has been held that the plaintiff may agree to remit the whole item and have judgment for those which are not vitiated by the inclusion of error. For example, Kavanaugh and wife sued the city of Janesville for injuries to Mrs. Kavanaugh by reason of a defective sidewalk, and a verdict was rendered which included the loss of the wife's services as well as the husband's expenses for nursing and medical attendance. It was established that if a recovery could be had at all for this loss and expense, it must have been in an action by the husband alone. Nevertheless, the verdict was allowed to stand on condition that the plaintiff and his wife would remit the highest amount which, under the evidence, could have been allowed for these items. Kavanaugh v. Janesville, 24 Wis. 618.

In an action for injury to the plaintiff's mare from which she died, and which was alleged to have been caused by a defective highway, it was held to be error to admit evidence of the value of the use of the animal during the period which intervened between the injury and her death, including the plaintiff's services in taking care of her. The plaintiff was allowed to testify that he estimated his loss from deprivation of the use of the animal during the interim between the accident and her death, including his services in taking care of the animal at $36, and the jury brought in a verdict which must be presumed to have included this amount. The supreme court held, that while recovery might be had for the plaintiff's services in taking care of the mare, no recovery could be had for loss of her services between the time of the injury and her death, and hence that the judgment be reversed unless the plaintiff would remit the whole of the $36, al-

f. INTEREST ON AMOUNT OF VERDICT.—Where the party, against whom a verdict in an action on an interest-bearing claim has been recovered, delays the award of judgment by some act of his own, as by motion for a new trial or in arrest of judgment, the prevailing party should be allowed interest on the amount of though a portion of this amount must have been for what plaintiff had a right to recover; but as no one could say how much, the entire $36 would have to be relinquished before recovery could be had for the value of the mare, of which the remainder of the verdict presumably consisted. Page v. Sumpster, 53 Wis. 652. From the facts of this case, it will be seen that the supreme court, in allowing this remittitur, admitted that the exact amount which should be relinquished could not be ascertained, but the plaintiff was allowed at his option to remit a sum which must include the excess, though it also included an amount to which he was justly entitled. There was manifestly no way of estimating the exact amount to be remitted, but it was thought that to avoid the trouble and expense of a new trial, the plaintiff might prefer to remit the whole of the $36, which he was accorded permission to do.

Action of Ejectment.—Where the plaintiff, in ejectment, has obtained a verdict for the land claimed in his declaration, the court, after the entry of an order upon the verdict, and the discharge of the jury, cannot alter the verdict by declaring that it will grant a new trial unless the plaintiff abate the verdict as rendered, by taking judgment for a certain part of the land sued for. Shiflet v. Dowell (Va. 1894), 19 S. E. Rep. 848.

1. Many of the authorities cited in the foregoing note treat the exercise of this right to allow a remittitur as an invasion of the sacred province of the jury. In dissenting from this view of the question, however, the court, in Corcoran v. Harran, 55 Wis. 120, delivers itself as follows: This is a practice well calculated to advance the ends of justice and lessen the expense to litigants and the public, and the allowance of such power is no more an exercise of arbitrary authority by the trial judge than it would be for him to set aside the verdict absolutely, upon the sole ground that it is excessive, and then in effect direct the jury to bring in a verdict for a smaller sum, or not in excess of the amount named by the court.

In Diblin v. Murphy, 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 19, it was held that the practice of allowing a remittitur is very common in actions upon contract, where the party has recovered more than he is entitled to; but there is some doubt as to whether this practice is permissible in actions of tort; however, upon consideration of the matter, the court seems to find ample sanction, both of reason and authority, for its application to a verdict rendered in an action to recover for personal injuries to the plaintiff, so the verdict which was deemed excessive was ordered to be set aside on payment of the costs, unless the plaintiff, within ten days, would stipulate to reduce it to a sum which the court thought consonant with the right of the case.

Howard v. Grover, 28 Me. 97; 48 Am. Dec. 478, was an action on the case against the defendant for alleged malpractice as a surgeon. The jury returned a verdict for such a large amount that the supreme court maintained that justice required a reduction of the verdict; accordingly, it was determined that unless the plaintiff would agree to remit $500, the verdict must be set aside and a new trial granted. This, it will be observed, was an action for unliquidated damages, where there was no precise rule by which the court could arrive at the exact amount of the excess, or the exact amount which the plaintiff should be allowed to recover. Nevertheless, the court took it upon itself to say that the verdict was too large. See also cases cited to this effect in foregoing notes.

Works Well in Practice.—The right of the trial court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, when it deems a verdict excessive, and the result of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury, to refuse a new trial upon condition that the prevailing party remit such sum as shall leave the recovery not excessive the verdict from the date of its rendition.¹ In the absence of legislative enactment, the rule has generally been confined in its

in the judgment of the court, has often been exercised, and whatever criticisms may be made upon the logical consistency of such a rule, it works well in practice. Pratt v. Pioneer Press Co., 35 Minn. 251; Craig v. Cook, 28 Minn. 232; Corcoran v. Harran, 55 Wis. 120.

Curtis*, 4 Me. 207; 14 Am. Dec. 216; Williams v. Smith, 2 Cal. (N. Y.) 253; 2 Am. Dec. 209; Henning v. Van-Tyne, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 101; Lord v. New York, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 426; Bull v. State, 3 Ind. 86; Johnston v. Atlantic, etc., R. Co., 43 N. H. 410.

In Dowell v. Griswold, 5 Sawy. (U. S.) 23, it was held that when an action was brought upon an interest-bearing claim, and there was a verdict for the plaintiff and the defendant delayed the giving of judgment by a motion for a new trial or otherwise, the plaintiff was entitled to legal interest from the date of the rendition of the verdict to the time of giving judgment.

The rule of the supreme court of Connecticut in this connection, regarding motions for new trials, is, in substance, that where execution is stayed by reason of reserving a case on motion for a new trial, if the judgment be not reversed, interest should be added to the judgment from the time it was stayed. See Rules of Practice, Supreme Court of Errors, 18 Conn. 575; Weed v. Weed, 25 Conn. 494.

In Buckman v. Davis, 28 Pa. St. 211, an award was filed May 17, 1856, and judgment rendered upon it at the December term of the same year and the execution issued for judgment with interest from the date of the filing of the award, the court saying: "The award made pursuant to the submission would, like a verdict, draw interest from the date of filing its entry." The contrary doctrine seems to have been announced by the supreme court in Kelsey v. Murphy, 30 Pa. St. 340, but Judge Strong, delivering the opinion of the court in the subsequent case of Irvin v. Hazelton, 37 Pa. St. 465, reviewed the decision of the court in Kelsey v. Murphy, 30 Pa. St. 340, and said that it decided nothing more than that a judgment entered, generally operated from the day of its entry, so as to carry interest only from that time; holding in the case before the court, that it was not error in the court to enter judgment with interest from the date of the verdict.

In Sproat v. Cutler, Wright (Ohio) 157, interest was allowed upon an award from its date, when the court said: "If it were the verdict of a jury and judgment had been delayed, we should allow interest, if asked."

In Kintner v. State, 3 Ind. 86, the court supported a judgment upon an award including interest from the date of the award to the date of the judgment. In this case it appears, in the opinion of the court, "The judgment is objected to because interest was added to the amount of the sum awarded. This objection is untenable. If a judgment had been rendered at the time the award was made, interest would have accrued upon it as a matter of course. The defendants, therefore, are not injured by the addition of such interest, while it would be clearly unjust to the plaintiff to compel him to lose the interest on his debt during the delay caused by the motion of the defendants." While, as is seen, this was the case of an award, and not a verdict, the reasoning would apply with the same force, it would seem, in the latter case.

In Bowman v. Wilson, 2 McCrary (U. S.) 394, one of the distributees of a fund paid into court, claimed interest on his portion from the time of the payment into court, including the time when it was held awaiting the settlement of a controversy among several claimants. This was denied him, the court holding that interest was never allowed where, by the order of a court of competent jurisdiction, or by the interposition of the law, or the act of the creditor, payment of the debt has been suspended, during the time of such suspension. This is not in point, but by analogy it might seem to oppose the allowance of interest where the rendition of judgment on a verdict has been application to interest-bearing claims,¹ though this has not been invariably the case.² At present, statutes in not a few jurisdictions provide for interest on all verdicts for the recovery of money, whatever may have been the nature of the action.³ delayed by the hand of the law, even though its aid were invoked by the defendant, as where a stay was granted upon motion for a new trial. We hardly think such a construction would be given, however, nor would it be warranted.

1. Blickenstaff v. Perrin, 27 Ind. 527; Vredenberg v. Hallett, 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 27; Williams v. Smith, 2 Cal. (N. Y.) 253; 2 Am. Dec. 209; Henning v. Van Tyne, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 101; Lord v. New York, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 426; Bull v. Ketchum, 2 Den. (N. Y.) 189; People v. Gaine, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 343. And see Bonner v. Copley, 15 La. Ann. 504.

In People v. Gaine, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 343, which was decided before the enactment of any statutes on the subject, the court said: "In all cases where the defendant applies to set aside the verdict and thereby delays the plaintiff, interest is awarded; provided the cause of action be such as to carry interest."

In the case of Blickenstaff v. Perrin, 27 Ind. 527, the plaintiff, in an action for slander, recovered a verdict during the April term of the court. A motion in arrest was made and overruled. Judgment was not rendered until the succeeding term, in October, when interest was computed on the verdict from its date to the date of the judgment. The supreme court held that, as the recovery was not upon an interest-bearing claim, and as the statute did not authorize interest on verdicts, that interest in such cases could not be allowed before judgment. The rule on this subject in Indiana has been changed by statute. See Indiana Statute set forth in note below.

2. One Gibson sued the Cincinnati Enquirer for libel, recovering a verdict for $3,875 damages, on which verdict judgment was delayed by a motion for a new trial on the part of the defendants. It was held, on overruling the motion for a new trial, that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the amount of the verdict and interest from the day it was rendered. Gibson v. Cincinnati Enquirer, 2 Flip. (U. S.) 88. Swing, J., delivering the opinion of the court in this case, said: "Upon the question of the right of the plaintiff to interest upon the verdict, I can see no difference between a verdict in an action for tort and a verdict in actions sounding in contract—the verdict in either case fixes the amount due at the time of its rendition, and that amount the party is entitled to have paid him as of that date, and if payment is delayed him by the act of the defendant, he ought to have interest. Such has been the practice of this court and such seems to be the current of authority." See also Griffith v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 44 Fed. Rep. 574.

In an action of tort, interest should not be allowed on the verdict from the first day of the term, but from the rendition of the verdict. "It is true," says Swing, J., in Gibson v. Cincinnati Enquirer, 2 Flip. (U. S.) 88, "that for many purposes, the term of the court is regarded as but one day, and in all cases sounding in contract, interest in this court is computed to the first day of the term only, so that it is entirely proper that the verdicts and judgments should draw interest from the first day of the term; but in actions of tort such as the present, where the jury were not directed to compute the amount which they should find in favor of the plaintiff as of the first day of the term, the judgment should have been for the amount of the verdict with interest from the day of its rendition."

3. The California Code of Civil Procedure, § 1035, provides that the clerk must include in the judgment entered up by him, any interest on the verdict, or decision of the court from the time it was rendered or made. Alpers v. Schammel, 75 Cal. 590; Golden Gate Mill, etc., Co. v. Joshua Hendy Mach. Works, 82 Cal. 184.

Idaho Code, § 4914, provides that "the clerk must include in the judgment entered up by him, any interest on the verdict or decision of the court from the time it was rendered or made."

Illinois Stat., ch. 74, par. 3, provides that, when judgment is entered upon any award, report, or verdict, interest shall be computed at the rate aforesaid (six per cent. per annum), from the time when

g. ALLOWANCE OF INTEREST BY VERDICT. — Anciently, in England, the laws strictly prohibited the taking of interest under any circumstances whatsoever, making no distinction between interest and usury, and holding the practice of requiring either to be reprehensive.¹ With the progress of civilization, however, and the growth of commercial affairs, came the more enlightened view that where there was a contract, express or implied, providing for interest, where its allowance could be presumed from the usage of trade, as upon mercantile instruments, or from the established course of dealing between the parties, interest might be recovered as a matter of right, and not subject to the discretion of the court or jury;² and also, where the defendant had been made or rendered to the time of rendering judgment upon the same.

In the Indiana Rev. Stat. (1881), § 5199, it is provided that "interest on judgments for money hereafter rendered shall be from the date of the return of the verdict or finding of the court, until the same shall be satisfied, at the rate per cent. agreed upon by the parties in the original contract, not exceeding six per cent.; and if there be no contract by the parties, at the rate of $6 per year on $100."

In Maine Rev. Stat. (1883), ch. 77, § 54, it is provided that "interest shall be allowed on verdicts, and amounts reported by referees to be due, from the time of finding such verdicts, or making such reports, to the time of judgment." Cary v. Whitney, 50 Me. 337; Hervey v. Bangs, 53 Me. 514.

New York Code Civ. Proc., § 1235, provides that, "Where final judgment is rendered for a sum of money, awarded by a verdict, report, or decision, interest upon the sum awarded, from the time when the verdict was rendered, or the report or decision was made, to the time of entering judgment, must be computed by the clerk, added to the sum awarded, and included in the amount of the judgment." See Munsell v. Flood, 46 N. Y. Super. Ct. 134.

Virginia Code, § 3390, provides that if a verdict be rendered, which does not allow interest, the sum thereby found shall bear interest from its date, and judgment shall be entered accordingly. Fry v. Leslie, 87 Va. 269. In this case it was held that judgment on a verdict for damages must allow interest from the date of the verdict, when interest is not given by the verdict. See also Lewis v. Arnold, 13 Gratt. (Va.) 454. See also codes of other states.

1. Thus, we are told, "it seemeth formerly to have been the general opinion that no action could be maintained on any promise to pay any kind of use for the forbearance of money, because, withall, such contracts are thought to be unlawful and consequently void." Hawkins P. L. C. R., ch. 82, § 6. See also Anonymous Case in Hard. 420. Appleton, C. J., in Copen v. Crowell, 66 Me. 282. See INTEREST, vol. 11, p. 379.

2. In Arnott v. Redfern, 3 Bing. 353, Best, C. J., states that it appears to him that there are two principles on which interest is given in the English courts; first, where the intent of the parties that interest should be paid can be collected from the terms or nature of the contract; secondly, where the debt has been wrongfully detained from the debtor, and under the second principle, it is immaterial whether the original debt bears interest or not. He further observes, "By our law, interest forms no part of the original debt. It is accorded only by the express terms of the contract, or by implying the engagement to pay interest from the nature of the security or the usage of trade to which the contract relates."

Lord Tenterden, in Page v. Newman, 9 B. & C. 378; 17 E. C. L. 399, criticizes this rule which some of the expressions, attributed to the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in Arnott v. Redfern, 3 Bing. 353, would seem to warrant, namely, that interest is due wherever a debt has been wrongfully withheld after the plaintiff has endeavored to obtain payment of it, as this might frequently make it a mooted question at the nisi prius whether proper means had been used to obtain payment of the debt, and such as the party ought to have used, which would be productive of great inconvenience. He continues, "I think that we ought not to depart from the long established rule that interest is not due on money secured by a written instrument, unless it appears on the face of the instrument that interest was intended to be paid, or unless it be implied from the usage of trade as in the case of mercantile instruments."

In Calton v. Bragg, 15 East 223, Lord Ellenborough, speaking at that time of a period of more than fifty years, said: "During this long course of time, no case has occurred where, upon a mere simple contract of lending, without an agreement for the payment of the principal at a certain time, or for interest to run immediately, or under special circumstances from whence a contract for interest was to be inferred, has interest been ever given." And in the same case Grose, J., said: "It is the lender's own fault if he do not contract for interest when he advances his money. . . . Why should interest be paid at all without a contract for it? If there be no proof of a contract, it might be given against the intention of the parties at the time of the loan; if they did not then contract for interest, it shows that they did not mean to reserve it."

In Gordon v. Swan, 12 East 419, it was held that, though a contract for the sale of goods stipulates a certain day on which payment is to be made, interest does not run upon the sum due from that day. It was contended that interest began to run after the expiration of the period of credit, inasmuch as the giving of a particular day for the payment for the goods sold and delivered, manifested an intention that the debt should be considered liquidated after that period, and made it competent at least for the jury to allow interest. The contract, however, was by the court construed to mean only that the vendee, at all events, should not be called upon for payment until the time given, though still a contract for the sale of goods, and it was held also that the giving of interest should be confined to bills of exchange and such like instruments, and on agreements reserving interest.

In an action for goods bargained and sold, the plaintiff, in support of his demand, introduced a note of the defendant's requesting the plaintiff to furnish to a certain party timber to the value of £30 or thereabouts, for which the plaintiff undertook to be answerable. At the bottom of the note was written "Credit till Christmas." The verdict was found for the plaintiff which included interest on the sum demanded from the Christmas referred to in the note. The court held the plaintiff to be entitled to interest from the period mentioned in the note. Mountford v. Willes, 2 Bos. & P. 337. To this case the reporter subjoins the following note: In a contract for the sale of goods, if any particular time be limited for the payment of the price, the vendor is entitled to interest on the price from that time.

In Becher v. Jones, 11 Rev. Rep. 756, the declaration stated that the plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant twenty bales of cotton at a certain price, to be paid for at the expiration of four months from such sale and delivery, by giving a bill of exchange to the plaintiff, payable two months after the giving thereof, but that the defendant had not given the bill nor paid for the goods. The question arose whether interest would be allowed for not giving the bill of exchange in payment of the goods sold from the time when the bill, if given, would have become due. Chief Justice Mansfield held the opinion that interest should be allowed in the same manner as if the action had been brought on a bill accepted in payment of the goods.

In Lee v. Munn, 8 Taunt. 45, it was held that an auctioneer who had a deposit in his hands for four years could not be compelled to pay interest because the plaintiff had made no demand on him for repayment of the deposit, as there was no contract, either express or implied, no usage, nor was the auctioneer guilty of any wrongful, or willful conduct for which interest might have been given by way of damages.

Lord Mansfield, in Eddowes v. Hopkins, 1 Doug. 376, holds, that although by the common law, book debts do not of course carry interest, it may be payable by the usage of the particular branches of trade, or by a special agreement, or, in cases of long delay, under vexatious and oppressive circumstances, if the jury, in their discretion, think proper to allow it.

In an action for money had and received, to recover a sum paid by a third person into the defendant's hands for the plaintiff's use, the plaintiff is not entitled to interest in the absence of any contract, express or implied, to pay interest. De Barnales v. Fuller, 2 Campb. 426.

guilty of some act of injustice, fraud or oppression, the plaintiff might recover interest in the discretion of the jury, in this instance not in the form of interest, but of damages.¹ American authorities have always been more liberal in their allowance of this money hire, maintaining that it is but natural justice that he who has the use of another's money should pay interest therefor²—the former diction

Shepherd v. Mackreth, 2 H. Bl. 284, was an action brought to recover the amount of the plaintiff's bill, as an attorney, for business done on behalf of the defendant, and a verdict was obtained and judgment entered in the court of the king's bench which, on a writ of error being brought apparently for delay, was affirmed without argument. It was held in this case that interest might be allowed on the affirmance of the judgment. This decision, however, was overruled in Walker v. Bayley, 2 Bos. & P. 219, and the court of exchequer chamber, in denying the motion that upon the affirmance of the judgment rendered in an action, the circumstances of which were similar to the case of Shepherd v. Mackreth, interest should be allowed, said, that applications of this sort had been frequently made and refused, and that the court in Shepherd v. Mackreth did not advert to the circumstance that the action was brought upon an attorney's bill, their attention being directed only to the general question whether interest could be allowed by that court or not. Perhaps, however, the court in Shepherd v. Mackreth were induced to allow interest from the fact that the writ of error was prosecuted merely for the sake of delay, which might justify their decision on the principle of allowing interest by way of damages in cases of vexatious delay; which course, it seems, has always been allowable.

1. In Hillhouse v. Davis, 1 M. & S. 169, a verdict for interest was allowed on the principle that the defendant had wrongfully withheld the payment of damages found by the jury to be due upon an injury occasioned by the making of the Bristol docks. Le Blanc, Judge, said, in giving judgment in this case: "The jury having given interest, we cannot set the verdict aside without being satisfied that they have done what they are not warranted to do by law, but there is no positive rule of law against their giving interest on a sum ascertained." In this case, it is maintained that, although interest may be due ex contractu, a party may be entitled to damages to the amount of interest, for any unreasonable delay in the payment of what is due under a contract. Arnott v. Redfern, 3 Bing. 353; Lee v. Munn, 8 Taunt. 45; Eddowes v. Hopkins, 1 Doug. 376.

In Eddowes v. Hopkins, 1 Doug. 376, Lord Mansfield declared that in cases of long delay, under vexatious and oppressive circumstances, the jury, in their discretion, may allow interest.

Osborn v. Hosier, 6 Mod. 167, was an action of debt brought upon a single bill for the payment of 230 pounds on demand. Upon non est factum being pleaded, one of the subscribing witnesses was produced and gave full evidence of the enrolling and delivery of the bond, and, on the other side, was produced a person of the same name and surname, with the other subscribing witness, who acknowledged that the hand was very like his, but that it was not his, that he never knew either of the parties nor the other witness, nor could the other witness say that he was the man. Both their reputations being made good in proof, Holt, C. J., ordered that they should write their names, and thereupon left it to the jury who found for the plaintiff. The Chief Justice at the same time ruled that though the bond did not carry interest, yet directed the jury to give interest in damages.

2. Where an executor, before the final settlement of an estate, lent $100 to a distributee upon the promise of the said distributee to refund it, if it turned out that he was not entitled to it, interest should be allowed the executor on this sum, in the final adjustment of his accounts. It developed that the distributee was not entitled to this sum, and the court held that the executor should be allowed interest on it from the day of the advancements to the day of the settlement. "It is but natural justice," said the court, "that he who has the use of another's money should pay interest for it." Jones v. Williams, 2 Call (Va.) 102.

A home defendant, decreed to pay that "interest follows the principal as the shadow the substance," having attained the dignity of a legal maxim.¹ In the United States, money to the creditor of an absent defendant, will be compelled to pay interest unless he make a legal tender, or bring the money into court. Where the defendant did neither, but kept the money in his own hands, he must pay interest upon it. Ross v. Austin, 4 Hen. & M. (Va.) 502.

A certain sum of money was in the hands of Jacob Crevor, the defendant, high sheriff of Cumberland county, as the proceeds of an execution sale made by him. This amount was claimed by the commonwealth as well as by several private individuals. It was agreed between the counsel for the state and the other claimants, that the money should be placed in bank by the sheriff to await the decision of the rights of the claimants. The sum was accordingly deposited, but several days later it was withdrawn by the sheriff, contrary to the agreement, and remained in his possession and use until the decision of the court declared the state to be the rightful owner of the money. The state, in requiring an account from the sheriff, demanded interest from the time the money was taken out of the bank by him, which claim was resisted on the ground that interest should not be paid, because the commonwealth could have suffered no damage, in view of the fact that an agreement had been made to allow the money to remain in bank; the court, in the decision of this question, observed: "The defendant's argument is founded on a fallacy; . . . the commonwealth has suffered damage by the non-payment of the money to which it was entitled, and which was in the hands of the defendant; and the defendant does not pretend that interest would not have been recoverable, if the agreement was out of the question. But the defendant has broken the agreement; and it would be extraordinary indeed, if thereby this case should be strengthened. It is considered as settled that interest shall be recovered against a man who receives the money of another, and holds it against his consent. Now in this case, the defendant has withheld and no doubt made use of the money belonging to the commonwealth, not only against the consent of the attorney general, but in direct violation of his agreement to leave it in bank. He has destroyed the security which he agreed to give, thereby depriving the commonwealth of all benefit of the agreement, yet insists that he himself is to take advantage of it. This is contrary to all ideas of justice. The commonwealth has the same right to interest as if the agreement had never been made." Com. v. Crevor, 3 Binn. (Pa.) 121.

In Hunter v. Spotswood, 1 Wash. (Va.) 145, one Herndon, who was sheriff, had received money under the judgment of a county court in the case of an attachment, and was made to pay interest because he had not paid it over and taken security as he had been directed by the county court, but had kept it.

On the trial of Rapelie v. Emory, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 349, it was ruled by Shippen, President, that where one man had received money belonging to another, and had retained it without the consent of the owner, it was to be considered in the same light as money lent, and ought to carry interest.

Where a cause had been referred, the report of the referee was set aside, because interest had been allowed on an unsettled account. Williams v. Craig, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 313.

1. In Crawford v. Willing, 4 Dall. (Pa.) 286, the court held that interest was recoverable on the ascertained balance of an account from the time of the demand of payment. "Whatever may have been the doctrine of the court in former times," said the court, "we have traced, with pleasure, the progress of improvement upon the subject of interest, to the honest and rational rule, that, wherever one man retains the money of another, against his declared will, the legal compensation for the use of the money shall be charged and allowed. From the single case of a promissory note, the instances in which interest is allowed, have been so multiplied year after year that few remain to be added to the legal catalogue. In Pennsylvania, the policy is older and perhaps more extensive than it is in England. There, even at this day, an action must be brought upon a judgment in order to recover interest upon it; but here an act of assembly, so early as the year 1715, made interest an inseparable incident of the judgment.

the jury are bound to allow interest where the contract, express or implied, stipulates for it, or where sanctioned by usage, either commercial or growing out of the course of dealing between the parties;¹ and it may be allowed in the United States, as in England, in the name of damages, when the conduct of the defendant deserves rebuke.²

For my own part I am prepared to say that interest ought to follow the debt, as the shadow does the substance. Even in the case of goods sold and delivered, I would think it right to allow interest as soon as the express or implied term of credit had elapsed, and a demand of payment made."

1. Where there is a contract, express or implied, for the payment of legal interest, the obligation of the contract extends as well to the payment of interest as to the payment of the principal sum. Neither the courts nor the juries ever had arbitrary power to dispense with the provisions of such contract either in whole or in part. Roberts v. Cocke, 28 Gratt. (Va.) 207; Chapman v. Shepherd, 24 Gratt. (Va.) 377.

Where the amount of the plaintiff's demand is liquidated in writing and a day appointed for the payment, the jury have no discretion to refuse interest on the debt from that day. Siter v. Robinson, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 274.

Arrears of Rent.—The court, in Bantleon v. Smith, 2 Binn. (Pa.) 146; 4 Am. Dec. 430, expressly evades a decision of the question whether interest is recoverable on arrears of rent or not. "The old proprietaries of Pennsylvania," said the court, "were in the habit of receiving the arrears of their rent without interest. . . . Hence, many persons have supposed that in no instance can interest on rents be recoverable. When this point is brought forward, the court will decide it; at present, they only declare that they consider it as fully open to discussion."

The right to interest on back rent may also be denied on the ground of uncertainty of the amount. Newton v. Wilson, 3 Hen. & M. (Va.) 491.

It is maintained, in Newton v. Wilson, 3 Hen. & M. (Va.) 470, that interest is not recoverable by way of damages in an action of debt for rent in arrear, where there has been no vexatious or oppressive conduct on the part of the debtor.

In Graham v. Woodson, 2 Call (Va.) 249, interest was allowed by the high court of chancery, and the case affirmed by the supreme court of appeals; but there the court evidently proceeded upon the ground of the unconscientious conduct on the part of the defendant, Graham, in endeavoring to defeat the rent altogether.

Distress for Rent.—Where distress is brought for rent in arrear, it must be for the precise sum due. Interest cannot be added to the arrears. Hence, the proprietor of a ground rent in fee, who obtained a judgment for the arrears, upon the sale of the land, is entitled to be paid the whole of the rent in arrear out of the proceeds of such sale in preference to older judgments, but inasmuch as he resorts to the land for payment, no interest upon the arrears is recovered. Bantleon v. Smith, 2 Binn. (Pa.) 145; 4 Am. Dec. 430.

In Lansing v. Rattoone, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 43, the court maintained the same position in the following words: "Interest cannot be demanded on the arrears of rent when the party proceeds by distress. It has now become, as Baron Gilbert says, in the nature of an execution rather than a distress, in the general sense of the word; and it would lead to abuse and oppression, if the party was to determine for himself when he was entitled to interest, and to proceed in this way to recover it." See also Braithwaite v. Cooksey, 1 H. Bl. 465.

2. Maritime Torts.—Where loss is sustained to the cargo of a vessel by collision or other tort, the jury may allow interest by way of damages added to the value of the property itself at the time of the collision. The Mary J. Vaughan v. The Steamboat Telegraph, 2 Ben. (U. S.) 47; Murray v. The Charming Betsy, 2 Cranch (U. S.) 64; Maley v. Shattuck, 3 Cranch (U. S.) 458; The Schooner "Lively", 1 Gall. (U. S.) 315; Del Col. v. Arnold, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 333; The Anna Maria, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 327; The Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 546.

Interest Against Executors.—Interest will be allowed against executors on a debt lost by their negligence. Where executors failed to collect a debt due to their testator by bond under penalty, the debtor being good for the money at the death of the testator and continuing solvent for fourteen years, when the debtor failed, the executors were, under the then existing law in Virginia, chargeable with principal and interest thereon up to the time of the failure of said debtor, but not with any interest accruing since said failure. Chapman v. Shepherd, 24 Gratt. (Va.) 383. In this last case, the appellants did not deny the liability of the executors for the principal of the bond, but they insisted that they were not chargeable with interest, upon the ground that interest being simply in the nature of damages awarded for the detention of the debt, it could not be known whether the executors, had they sued, would have succeeded in the recovery of any portion of it, and the charge upon the fiduciary, for the amount of the debt lost by his default, is in the nature of damages assessed for the failure to do his duty, and upon general principle that one ought not be compelled to pay damages for delay to pay damages. The court held, however, that the executor himself would not be compelled to pay interest upon the amount with which he was chargeable, but that he was chargeable with interest which he failed to collect as well as with the principal.

In actions of trover, replevin, and trespass, interest on the value of property unlawfully taken or converted is allowed, by way of damages, for the purpose of complete indemnity to the party injured, and, on the same principle, interest on the value of property lost or destroyed by the wrongful or negligent act of another may be included in the damages. Parrott v. Knickerbocker, etc., Ice Co., 46 N. Y. 361.

As to the allowance of interest by way of damages in cases of trover, see Macon, etc., R. Co. v. Meador, 67 Ga. 672.

In Beals v. Guernsey, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 446; 5 Am. Dec. 348, which was an action of trespass against a sheriff for illegally taking the plaintiff's personal property, interest was allowed by way of damages. The court said: "The plaintiff ought not to be deprived of his property, for years, without compensation for the loss of the use of it, and the jury had a discretion to allow interest in this case as damages. It has been allowed in actions of trover, and the same rule applies in trespass, when brought for the recovery of property."

In Wood v. Robbins, 11 Mass. 504; 6 Am. Dec. 182, the defendant had fraudulently obtained possession of the plaintiff's money. Putnam, J., after reviewing most of the authorities, said: "There may be cases where interest should not be allowed, as where the defendant was a mere stakeholder, ready to pay the money to the party entitled, but when the defendant has fraudulently obtained possession of the plaintiff's money or wrongfully detained it, he must be charged with interest."

Discretionary with Jury.—In an action for breach of a contract for the delivery of tea of a specified value, the court said that interest was a question generally in the discretion of the jury. Gilpins v. Consequa, Pet. (C. C.) 85; Willings v. Consequa, Pet. (C. C.) 172.

In Duryee v. New York, 96 N. Y. 477, Ruger, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, observed: "It is well settled that in an action of tort like this, to recover even unliquidated damages, the allowance of interest, by way of damages, is within the discretion of the jury." See also Mairs v. Manhattan Real Estate Assoc., 89 N. Y. 498.

In general, in actions ex delicto, it is within the discretion of the jury whether to allow interest by way of damages or not. Walrath v. Redfield, 18 N. Y. 457.

Erroneous Charge as to Discretion.—Where the court charged the jury that they might give interest or not as they chose, the judgment should not be reversed even if the charge was erroneous, unless the jury did give interest. Noe v. Hodges, 5 Humph. (Tenn.) 103.

Money Received by Mistake.—The testator, Flowers, entered into an agreement with one Jacobs for the sale of certain land, and soon after this, Flowers died and Jacobs paid the purchase-money to his executors. The will, however, which appointed these executors was afterward set aside, having been obtained by undue influence, and Jacobs filed a claim to recover the money that he had thus improperly paid. The question submitted to the court was, whether under these circumstances interest should be allowed. It was held that it was not recoverable where money had been received and paid by mistake, and neither fraud nor surprise was imputed to either party. Jacobs v. Adams, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 52.

In actions to recover damages for the non-performance of a contract, the most usual and reasonable standard of compensation which the jury can adopt is interest on the value of the property contracted to be delivered, or the services which should have been performed from the time of the default.¹ The chief difference on the subject of the allowance of interest, between the judicial policies of the states of the Union and England, except where the state legislatures have intervened, seems to be the tendency of American courts to more readily imply a promise to pay interest from the terms of the contract itself, or from usage.² In neither country can

Action on Replevin Bond.—In an action of debt on a replevin bond, the measure of damages must depend on the value of the goods where the amount is more than they are worth, but if the value of the goods be more than the rent in arrear for which the original action was brought, then the rent due is the true measure of damages in such case, and no interest is recoverable in either case, as the condition of the bond is only to return the goods. Hart v. Tobias, 2 Bay (S. Car.) 408.

1. Interest as a Standard of Damages.—In Talbot v. Bedford, Cooke (Tenn.) 447, Overton, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, used the following language: "Whenever agreements will admit of it, we have perceived a laudable disposition in the courts of justice to substitute certainty for uncertainty, in relation to compensation for the non-execution of contracts. Ordinary interest, as such, or in the form of damages, seems to have been wisely adopted as the principle of this substitution. . . .

When a man who has contracted to deliver or convey property, or to perform services, fails to do so, the law will presume that the person with whom the contract was made, would have derived a benefit from the performance of such contract, equivalent to the interest of the money which represents its value."

So, upon the contract to allow an overseer 1,200 pounds of cotton on the first day of January for his year's services, interest should be allowed upon the value of the cotton from the time fixed for its delivery. Ryan v. Baldrick, 3 McCord (S. Car.) 498. See also Davis v. Richardson, 1 Bay (S. Car.) 105; Atkinson v. Scott, 1 Bay (S. Car.) 307; Wigg v. Garden, 1 Bay (S. Car.) 351.

On the trial of an action, brought against the defendant for the breach of a contract to deliver a certain number of hogs, the court told the jury that they might give interest by way of damages, or not, as they might think proper, although the plaintiff would not be entitled to interest as interest. In such a case as this, the supreme court held that there was no objection to the rules estimating the damages and fixing the amount of the verdict by the sum the jury thought the plaintiff was entitled to at the time the contract was broken and interest on that amount added together. Noe v. Hodges, 5 Humph. (Tenn.) 103.

Contracts for the Payment of Money.—It is an established rule, in the absence of any special damage, that in actions for the breach of a contract for the payment of money, the measure of damages shall be the legal interest on the money for the time it is withheld. Beatty, J., in Cox v. Smith, 1 Nev. 171; 90 Am. Dec. 476; McLane v. Abrams, 2 Nev. 199.

2. Thus, in Pease v. Barber, 3 Cal. (N. Y.) 266, it was held that interest may be recovered on an account for money had and received, against the express decision of the English Common Bench in Walker v. Constable, 1 Bos. & P. 307, and Tappenden v. Rاندell, 2 Bos. & P. 467.

In the absence of an express agreement for the payment of interest, on obligations for the payment of a certain sum of money on demand or at a given day, interest on the principal sum from the time it becomes payable is a legal incident of the debt, the right to it being founded on the presumed intention of the parties. Chapman v. Shepherd, 24 Gratt. (Va.) 377. Judge Staples, in delivering the opinion of the court in this case, speaking of the defenses which may be made to the recovery of interest on such obligations as have been just mentioned, said: "It is true that the debtor may sometimes, the jury allow interest on running or open accounts in the absence of an agreement, express or implied, to pay such interest,¹ nor is it under peculiar circumstances, avoid the payment of interest; but these are matters of defense, the burden of which is upon himself in all cases. They are offered to show that the obligation to pay the interest has been discharged, and not that it did not originally exist. If no valid ground of defense is shown, the judgment is as certainly rendered for the interest as for the principal. In contracts of the character just mentioned, it is apparent, therefore, that interest is not given as damages at the discretion of the court or the jury, but as an incident of the debt which the court has no discretion to refuse.

If it appears to have been the uniform practice of a merchant to charge interest after a certain time, and such practice was known to the debtor, an agreement to pay interest in accordance with such practice is implied. Reab v. McAlister, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 109; Esterly v. Cole, 1 Barb. (N. Y.) 235.

Whether this custom of charging interest after a certain interval of credit is known to the debtor, is a question of fact depending either on positive facts, or on circumstances from which knowledge may be inferred, and the existence of such custom and the debtor's knowledge of it, are to be decided by the jury. Esterly v. Cole, 1 Barb. (N. Y.) 235.

In Tennessee, there is a statute to the effect that all debts evidenced by the usual instruments of writing by which the debtor undertakes to pay a money demand, or liquidated and settled by the sign manual of the debtor, shall bear interest. Brady v. Clark, 12 Lea (Tenn.) 323. See also Hepburn v. Dundas, 13 Gratt. (Va.) 219; Virginia Code (1887), § 3390.

A distinction between written and oral contracts has always been made with regard to interest, it seeming to be implied from the breach of a written promise to pay money on a given day, that the party in default will pay interest, but that same implication does not arise from the breach of an oral contract. Ryan v. Baldrick, 3 McCord (S. Car.) 498. See also Gordon v. Swan, 2 Campb. 429n.

In an action of assumpsit for use and occupation of a house, the jury assessed a sum for the annual rent of the house in question, but allowed no interest on the different sums so fixed for the rent, after the expiration of each year. A motion for a new trial was made on the ground that interest was recoverable on each year's rent after it became due. This motion was denied, and on appeal, the judges, after hearing the arguments, refused the motion, observing that this was an unliquidated demand, and no express promise to pay the interest after the end of each year was proved; that it was a matter sounding entirely in damages, which were not ascertained until the finding of the jury, and that too on a quantum meruit; and that no interest is recoverable on open or book accounts. Skirving v. Stobo, 2 Bay (S. Car.) 233.

Leavy exhibited his bill against South for a discovery and rectification of a mistake which had been made in a certain account by crediting the defendant, South, twice with the same sum of forty dollars. The defendant failed to appear though served with process and a copy of the bill, and upon the bill alone taken pro confesso the court entered a decree for the sum of forty dollars with interest until paid. South prosecuted a writ of error, assigning as error that the decree was erroneous as to the interest. The supreme court held the principle to be well settled that interest is not to be allowed on unliquidated accounts for goods sold and delivered, and hence reversed the decree. South v. Leavy, Hard. (Ky.) 527.

Where there has been a running account unliquidated between the parties, no balance struck, and nothing in their course of dealing from which an intent or agreement to allow interest can be inferred, it is not a case in which recoverable on uncertain amounts, or unliquidated demands.¹ In the application of this rule, the New York courts seem to have gone a step further than other jurisdictions, holding that, though the interest can be allowed. Newell v. Griswold, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 45.

In Smith v. Vellie, 60 N. Y. 106, the case showing that the accounts between the parties were open and unliquidated, it was held that interest should not be allowed upon the balance ultimately found due upon such account.

In Liotard v. Graves, 3 Cal. (N. Y.) 234, it was held by all the judges that interest is recoverable upon money paid or advanced from the date of its advancement, but upon an account for goods sold, no interest is recoverable, unless there be evidence of an agreement to pay it, until a liquidation of the account takes place. Newell v. Griswold, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 45, also decides this latter point.

1. "The general rule has been uniformly understood to be, that interest is not recoverable on unliquidated damages or for an uncertain demand." Per Welles, J., in Holmes v. Rankin, 17 Barb. (N. Y.) 456. See Reid v. Rensselaer Glass Factory, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 387; Kane v. Smith, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 156.

An action on the case was brought for the breach of a contract as to the quality of certain tea for the delivery of which the contract provided, whereupon it was held to be not agreeable to legal principles to allow interest on unliquidated and contested claims sounding so much in damages. Gilpins v. Consequa, Pet. (C. C.) 85; Willings v. Consequa, Pet. (C. C.) 172; Yonqua v. Nixon, Pet. (C. C.) 224.

Board and Lodging.—Interest is not recoverable upon an unliquidated demand for board and lodging. Holmes v. Rankin, 17 Barb. (N. Y.) 454.

Damages in Trespass.—The damages assessed in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit do not bear interest until after they have been ascertained by verdict and judgment. Then, the judgment merging the damages will bear interest from the day of its rendition. Where the verdict gave a particular sum as the amount of the damages, and allowed interest from a certain day, it was held that all that was said in reference to interest should have been rejected as surplusage, and judgment rendered for the sum ascertained as damages. Glidden v. Street, 68 Ala. 600.

In Henry v. Risk, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 265, a question which arose for consideration was, whether interest should be allowed on a certain account for goods, wares, and merchandise, sold by the plaintiff's testator to the defendants, on which the defendants had paid the net amount without any notice that interest would be charged, or any agreement upon either party to pay it. The supreme court held that the current practice of the courts of England in such cases disallows the charge of interest, and that the practice in Pennsylvania had been regulated by the same principles.

However, in Crawford v. Willing, 4 Dall. (Pa.) 286, Smith, J., declared that the authority of this case, laying down the rule that interest was not payable for goods sold and delivered, had been overruled.

In an action for fraud and deceit in the sale of a slave, the declaration charged that the defendant sold the slave to the plaintiff for a fair price, knowing the slave to be in bad health at the time and fraudulently concealing the fact from the plaintiff. The verdict found by the jury was: "We, of the jury, find the defendant guilty of the trespass in the declaration mentioned, and we assess the plaintiff's damages by reason thereof, to $400, and we allow on the said damages interest from the 21st of September, 1824, till paid." On this verdict judgment was given pursuant to its terms, and the defendant appealed. In regard to the interest allowed, the supreme court held: "This interest, if the action had been founded on contract, might have been given, but being founded wholly and clearly in tort, is unquestionably erroneous." Brugh v. Shanks, 5 Leigh (Va.) 598. In this case, the interest was rejected as mere surplusage.

More recently, in Virginia, a statute has been enacted, in terms allowing the jury to give interest on damages for tort. Hepburn v. Dundas, 13 Gratt. (Va.) 219.

A recovery of interest must depend very much on the circumstances of the case. Pease v. Barber, 3 Cal. (N. Y.) 266. But the general rule is, that it is not allowable on an unliquidated, open, or mutual account, until such account is stated by the parties, or at least renamount due the plaintiff for work done or goods sold, or the amount to which the plaintiff may be entitled, is entirely uncertain and unliquidated, yet if the sum can be made certain by mere computation, or even by reference to variable market values, interest may as reasonably be recovered on the amount so obtained as if it had been originally fixed;¹ and in the same state, interest is sometimes allowed on the ground that the debtor is in default for not having taken the requisite steps to ascertain the extent of his indebtedness, although the amount neither has been nor can be readily ascertained.² Where the recovery of interest depends dered by one party to the other, which is construed a liquidation if assented to, or if not objected to within a reasonable time. The only exceptions are, first, where an express agreement to pay interest has been made and proved; second, where an intent to pay interest can be inferred from the course of dealing between the parties or the particular custom of the trade or place; or, third, where there has been fraudulent conduct or a vexatious detention of the debt. Borret v. Goodere, 1 Dick. 428; Liotard v. Graves, 3 Cal. (N. Y.) 226; Anonymous, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 315; Newell v. Griswold, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 45; Holliday v. Marshall, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 211; Kane v. Smith, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 156; Walden v. Sherburne, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 409; Consequa v. Fanning, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 601; Selleck v. French, 1 Conn. 32; Williams v. Craig, 1 Dall. (U. S.) 313; McConnico v. Curzen, 2 Call. (Va.) 358; 1 Am. Dec. 540.

1. In Van Rensselaer v. Jewett, 2 N. Y. 135; 51 Am. Dec. 275, a debtor was in default for not delivering property or rendering services in pursuance of his contract, and the question arose as to the allowance of interest from the time of the default. The court held that notwithstanding the payment was not to be made in money, nor was a specified sum to be paid in any other way, and notwithstanding the fact that the damages were unliquidated and there was no agreement for interest, that interest was recoverable. "It was decided in 1806," said the court, "without assigning any reason for the judgment, that interest was not recoverable in a case of this kind (Van Rensselaer v. Platner, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 276). But since that time, the supreme court has deliberately held, on three several occasions, including the present one, that interest is recoverable in such a case." Lush

v. Druse, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 313; Van Rensselaer v. Jones, 2 Barb. (N. Y.) 643.

The principle to be extracted from these decisions may be stated as follows: Whenever a debtor is in default for not paying money, delivering property or rendering services in pursuance of his contract, justice requires that he should indemnify the creditor for the wrong which has been done him, and the most reasonable indemnity, though it may be sometimes more, can never be less, than the specified amount of money or the value of the property or services at the time they should have been paid, or rendered with interest from the time of the default until the obligation is discharged. And if the creditor is obliged to resort to the courts for redress, he ought in all such cases to recover interest in addition to the debt, by way of damages. This is, nevertheless, true, though the amount of the debt can be ascertained only by an inquiry concerning the value of the property or the services. But when the value can be ascertained, and when that has been done, the creditor, as a question of principle, is just as plainly entitled to interest after the default as he would be if a like sum had been payable in money.

In McMahon v. New York, etc., R. Co., 20 N. Y. 463, the court, in referring to Van Rensselaer v. Jewett, 2 N. Y. 135, said that the doctrine there laid down went as far as it was reasonable and proper to go in that direction, and that as long as the courts confine themselves to the principles of that case, they are not without a rule which it is possible to apply, as the rule itself is definite, and the only uncertainty which it introduces is that which necessarily attends the settling of market rates and prices.

2. The case of McMahon v. New not on the terms of the contract, and hence is not recoverable as interest, but rather as damages for the unjust detention of the plaintiff's funds, the defendant may exonerate himself from the imputation of such alleged wrongful detention, by proving that a tender has been made by him of the full amount which was justly due, and declined by the plaintiff.¹ It has also been maintained that the plaintiff, by his own indolence or inactivity, may forfeit his right to this interest by way of damages.²

Rate After Maturity.—Where a promissory note, or other contract for the payment of money, bears interest from a certain date, at a rate not unlawful, but different from the legal rate, it has been made a question, whether after maturity the conventional rate or the legal rate may be recovered. This question has been resolved differently in different jurisdictions, the authorities only agreeing to the extent that, where the intention of the parties can be gathered from the terms of the instrument, such intention, within legal bounds, must be allowed to control,³—the point about which there is conflict arising in the absence of all contract, express or implied, for the payment of interest after maturity. In this contingency, interest is only recoverable in the York, etc., R. Co., 20 N. Y. 463, illustrates the reasonableness of such a rule. Here, the action was brought to recover for work performed and materials furnished by the plaintiff, under a contract providing that the work should be executed under the direction and constant supervision of the engineer of the company, by whose measurements and calculations the quantity and amount of the work performed should be determined. In this case, the court held that whether the engineer by whom the work was to be measured was to be regarded in law in respect to that duty as the agent of both parties, or of the defendants only, he was in the general employment of the defendants and ready to obey their behests; if they had done their duty by causing him to make an accurate estimate of the work, the amount of the claim would have been so ascertained as to have carried interest. Perhaps they ought not to be considered as in default until they were requested by the contractor to have the estimate made, because it was as much the contractor's duty to request to have it done as it was theirs to direct the engineer to do it. Interest, therefore, if allowed upon this principle, should be computed only from the time of the refusal by the defendants, when called upon, either to cause a final estimate to be made, or to correct one which had been already made.

1. Delaware Ins. Co. v. Delaunie, 3 Binn. (Pa.) 295; but, as this case also holds, where the plaintiff insists on too much, and the defendant offers too little, there is then the necessity for a suit, and there being no reason to suppose that the defendant has not made use of the money, he should be chargeable with interest.

2. In Skipwith v. Clinch, 2 Call (Va.) 257, the court stated that the plaintiff was not entitled to interest on the rents, although the defendant had been in default for nearly 20 years, because, if it was certain, then the plaintiff might have distrained, and therefore should not have lain by and suffered the rent to accumulate, and if it was uncertain, assuredly interest is not demandable. See also Cooke v. Wise, 3 Hen. & M. (Va.) 470.

nature of damages,¹ some judicatures maintaining that the standard to be adopted is the one established by law, and others, the one indicated by the preëxisting contract of the parties for interest until maturity. If the agreed rate, though not unlawful, is higher than the legal rate, and the intent of the parties as to the rate to be borne after maturity cannot be gathered from the contract, the weight of authority inclines to the substitution of the legal rate after maturity² (or rather interest, as damages, according to this standard), though a not inconsiderable number of cases hold

The rule applied by the Supreme Court of the United States, in such cases, has been to give the conventional rate up to the maturity of the contract, and thereafter, the rate prescribed by law, where the parties themselves have fixed no rate. Holden v. Freedman's Sav., etc., Co., 100 U. S. 72; Brewster v. Wakefield, 22 How. (U. S.) 118; Burnhisel v. Firman, 22 Wall. (U. S.) 170.

"But," says Mr. Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion of the court, in Holden v. Freedman's Sav., etc., Co., 100 U. S. 72, "where a different rule has been established it governs, of course, in that locality. The question is always one of local law;" accordingly, the same court, in Ohio v. Frank, 103 U. S. 697, confirmed the ruling of the supreme court of Illinois, holding that bonds bearing interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, from date, with no stipulation for interest after maturity, continued to bear the same rate as long as they remained unpaid. See also Cromwell v. Sac County, 96 U. S. 51, in which the Iowa practice was followed.

In Holden v. Freedman's Sav., etc., Co., 100 U. S. 72, it was also declared. "If payment be not made when the money becomes due, there is a breach of the contract and the creditor is entitled to damages. Where none have been agreed upon, the law fixes the amount according to the standard applied in all such cases. It is the legal rate of interest where the parties have agreed upon none. If the parties meant that the contract rate should continue, it would have been easy enough to say so; in the absence of a stipulation, such an intendment cannot be inferred."

Brewster v. Wakefield, 22 How. (U.

S.) 118, was an action on certain promissory notes, bearing interest, at a stipulated rate until maturity, much in excess of the rate prescribed by law in the absence of contract, though not illegal. These notes were not paid when due and suit was brought. The court held that as the contracts were entirely silent as to interest, if the notes should not be punctually paid, the creditor was entitled to interest after that time only by operation of law and not by any provision in the contract; hence that the court below committed an error in allowing, after the notes fell due, a higher rate of interest than that established by law in the absence of contract.

In Pearce v. Hennessy, 10 R. I. 223, the court held that if the parties to a note or other contract for the payment of money intend that it shall carry interest at the stipulated rate until paid, they can easily entitle themselves to have their intention carried into effect by a stipulation that the note or contract shall carry interest at the reserved rate until paid, and in the absence of such stipulation, the agreed rate of interest is to be recovered up to the maturity of the contract, and after that the rate prescribed by law.

The note sued on in Newton v. Kenerly, 31 Ark. 620; 25 Am. Rep. 592, bearing interest at the rate of sixteen per cent. per annum from date, omitted the words "until paid." The court held that there was a contract for the rate of interest expressed in the note until its maturity only, and after that it bore no more than the legal rate of interest.

In Vaughan v. Kennan, 38 Ark. 114, Justice Eakin said: "This court has repeatedly decided that, in the case of notes bearing contractual interest, when there is no agreement as to interest after maturity, they can only bear interest at the ordinary legal rate after due. It is a matter of intention to be gathered from the direct expressions, or the plain import of the instrument."

In First Ecclesiastical Soc. v. Loomis, 42 Conn. 570, the rule was adopted of assessing damages for the retention of money by the defendant beyond the contract time, at the statute rate of interest existing during the time he has elected thus to retain the money. In reaching this conclusion, the court considered the case of Fisher v. Bidwell, 27 Conn. 363, in which the question presented was whether, in an action for the amount of a sum of money loaned for a particular time on a contract for usurious interest, the plaintiff was entitled as damages to interest computed according to the legal rate on such sum, from the time when the credit for the loan expired, to the rendition of the judgment. The court said that in such a case, if the money was not paid when it became due by the terms of the contract, damages would be recoverable by the lender, for the injury to him consequent on its detention after the time when it was agreed to be paid, and such damages would be estimated according to the established legal rate of interest; that rate, though arbitrary, furnishing a general, convenient, and uniform rule for determining the amount of such damages. True, in Beckwith v. Hartford, etc., R. Co., 29 Conn. 268; 76 Am. Dec. 599, damages for the detention of borrowed money beyond the contract period, were assessed at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, when the legal rate was only six per cent., but here the legislature had legalized, in advance, seven per cent. as the rate of interest upon that particular loan at the request of the borrowers; and in Adams v. Way, 33 Conn. 419, the damages were assessed at twelve per cent. but upon the ground that this was the statute rate of interest in Wisconsin, where the loan was made. In Hubbard v. Callahan, 42 Conn. 524; 19 Am. Rep. 564, the plaintiff was allowed to recover fifteen per cent. per annum, but in this case it was recoverable as interest, and strictly in accordance with the terms of the contract, which provided for that rate after maturity.

Duran v. Ayer, 67 Me. 145, was an action instituted on a promissory note bearing twelve per cent. interest, with no agreement for interest after maturity. It was decided that under such circumstances, after the maturity of the note, the plaintiff is entitled to interest only by operation of law, and for this reason he must content himself with the legally established rate.

In Paine v. Caswell, 68 Me. 80; 28 Am. Rep. 21, the form of the note sued on was "for value received, we promise to pay John S. Paine, or order, $500 and interest at ten per cent." Justice Peters, for the court, said: "The question is, for how long a period can the plaintiff require that rate of interest to be paid? Where a note is payable at a certain time with interest exceeding six that the contract rate only should be regarded.¹ Where the conventional rate is lower than the legal rate, the same rule applies, and in the absence of circumstances tending to show that the parties per cent., no more than six per cent. is recoverable after maturity, there being no stipulation for interest after that time. In such case, interest after the note is due is allowed only by way of damages." Eaton v. Boissonnault, 67 Me. 540; 24 Am. Rep. 52.

The court laid down the rule, in Langston v. South Carolina R. Co., 2 S. Car. 248, that if the debt bears a rate of interest on its face higher or lower than that prescribed by law as the legal rate, where the parties do not contract that it shall be the rate after the debt becomes due, the interest fixed by law attaches on it for the detention of the principal sum. This rule is approved in Mobley v. Davega, 16 S. Car. 73; 42 Am. Rep. 632.

In South Carolina, under the act of 1866, to entitle one to interest in excess of the legal rate, after the obligation became due, it was necessary that an agreement for such rate should appear in the original contract in writing. Maner v. Wilson, 16 S. Car. 470.

The rate of interest which should prevail after the maturity of a contract, is purely a matter of agreement—a question of intention as disclosed by the contract itself—and it is only in the absence of a contract that the legal rate prevails. Mobley v. Davega, 16 S. Car. 73; 42 Am. Rep. 632; Miller v. Hall, 18 S. Car. 141.

A note for advances payable at a future date, secured by an agricultural lien which provides for interest on the advances at the rate of two and one-half per cent. a month, from the date of each advance, after maturity bears legal interest only. Thatcher v. Massey, 20 S. Car. 542.

Note Payable on Demand.—Notwithstanding the fact that, where a note is payable on time with interest exceeding the legal rate, no more than the legal rate is recoverable after maturity, in the absence of an agreement for interest after that time, where a note is payable on demand, interest at the conventional rate is recoverable, for it could not be the intention of the parties that interest at the rate named was to be payable until the note was due and not afterwards, as there was no interval of time after the note was delivered before it became due; it was due instantly. Paine

v. Caswell, 68 Me. 80; 28 Am. Rep. 21. To the same effect, see Seymour v. Continental L. Ins. Co., 44 Conn. 300; 26 Am. Rep. 469.

Note Payable One Day After Date.—In Casteel v. Walker, 40 Ark. 117; 48 Am. Rep. 5, such a note was held to be, so far as the presumed intent of the parties was concerned, practically the same as a note payable on demand, and hence bore the conventional rate after maturity.

Although the cases are numerous which hold loosely that, in the absence of contract for interest after maturity, damages should be allowed according to the standard established by the contract of the parties up to maturity, a close examination of the circumstances surrounding the various transactions, will very generally reveal something from which an understanding or probable intent may be implied that the contract rate of interest shall prevail as long as the principal is retained. In such cases, the recovery is, more exactly, in pursuance of the implied contract, the courts in their opinions frequently remarking "Surely the parties could not have intended," etc., and allowing recovery consistent with the reasonable and probable intent of the parties, according to the rate expressly agreed upon up to maturity, and yet, as damages. Indeed, in some jurisdictions, the practice seems to be founded on a case in which interest was inaccurately allowed as damages, when it should have been recovered as interest. When the above authorities are reviewed in this light, it will be seen that comparatively few adjudications sustain the proposition, pure and simple, that in the absence of all agreement, express or implied, for interest after maturity, that damages shall be allowed according to the terms of the expired contract. Of course, however, this does not apply to jurisdictions regulated by express legislative enactments on the subject.

In Union Sav. Inst. v. Boston, 129 Mass. 82; 37 Am. Rep. 305, Gray, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "When a written agreement is made, as authorized by the statute, to pay a greater rate of interest yearly than six per cent., the intention of the contract and effect of the statute appear to us to be that the creditor shall receive the stipulated rate of interest so long as the debtor has the use of the principal; and that, in an action upon the contract, the creditor shall recover interest at that rate, not merely until the time when the principal is agreed to be paid to him, but until it is actually paid, or his claim for principal and interest judicially established."

In an action for the balance of an account, one of the items of which consisted of a bill of exchange for two hundred pounds bearing ten per cent. interest, which had been dishonored, the case was referred to a master who gave, in the shape of damages, interest at the rate which the bond had borne up to maturity. For the defendant it was insisted that the master had erroneously allowed ten per cent., five per cent. being all the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and it was moved that the case be referred back to the master for reconsideration on this point. However, Chief Justice Cockburn said: "I see no ground for referring this case back to the master as prayed. He has, as he well might, given in the shape of damages the rate of interest the parties themselves had contracted for; I think he has done quite right." Crowder, J., in the same case, said: "I am of the same opinion. The master would, I think, have acted very unreasonably if he had not assessed the damages by the rate which the parties had stipulated as the value of the money. Keene v. Keene, 3 C. B. N. S. 144.

In Cook v. Fowler, L. R., 7 H. L. 27, the Lord Chancellor said that according to the well-known principle which has been referred to in many cases: "Any claim in the nature of a claim for interest, after the day up to which interest was stipulated for, would be a claim really, not for a stipulated sum and interest, but for damages, and then it would be for the tribunal before which the claim was asserted to consider the position of the claimant, and the sum which properly, and under all the circumstances, should be awarded for damages. No doubt, prima facie, the rate of interest stipulated for up to the time certain might be taken, and generally would be taken, as the measure of interest; but that would not be conclusive. It would be for the tribunal to look at all the circumstances of the case, and to decide what was the proper sum to be awarded by way of damages."

In Morgan v. Jones, 8 Exch. 620, the owner of a vessel mortgaged it as security for a debt, with the proviso for a redemption on payment of the principal and interest at the rate of ten per cent. in six months, but without any provision as to the payment of interest after that time. The principal not being paid then, it was held that the mortgagee was entitled to interest at the same rate until payment.

The case of Spencer v. Maxfield, 16

Wis. 178, held that where the party has given an obligation for the payment of a sum of money by a certain day, with interest at a higher rate than that prescribed by law, in the absence of an agreement on the subject, such high rate of interest will continue, not only until the money is due, but so long as it is held or detained by the debtor, though such obligation is entirely silent as to the rate of interest after its maturity.

The court, in McLane v. Abrams, 2 Nev. 199, regards the statutory rate of interest, as damages prescribed by law for the withholding of money, but holds that, for the withholding of money which bears a higher rate of interest by contract, a corresponding damage is allowed. This higher rate continues until payment, although the contract itself does not provide for such higher rate after the maturity of the debt. And in Kellogg v. Lavender, 15 Neb. 256; 48 Am. Rep. 339, it is decided that where the rate of interest is fixed in the note, it governs not only until maturity, but until payment, unless otherwise expressed.

In Union Sav. Inst. v. Boston, 129 Mass. 82; 37 Am. Rep. 305, it was held that interest after the maturity of a note, and after the breach of a contract to pay, is recoverable not strictly as part of the debt, but rather as damages, ordinarily to be measured according to the intention manifested by the contract and by the standard thereby established. The court cited Price v. Great Western R. Co., 16 M. & W. 244; and the language of Willes, J., in Keene v. Keene, 3 C. B. N. S. 144.

In the case of Kilgore v. Powers, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 22, the contract rate after maturity, and without express stipulation for a rate of interest after maturity, was allowed to be recovered, as the court expressed it, "conformably to the terms of the contract;" but whether this refers to an implied contract after maturity, or the expired preëxisting contract is not stated. This case was subsequently overruled by Burns v. Anderson, 68 Ind. 202, but the rule as set up in this latter case has been in turn repudiated, and the doctrine declared in Kilgore v. Powers, recognized and re-established. Thus in Shaw v. Rigby, 84 Ind. 375; 43 Am. Rep. 96, the court referred with approval to the above case, and held that where an interest-bearing promissory note contains no provision for any rate of interest after its maturity, in a suit upon such note, interest after maturity will be recoverable as damages, and the proper measure of such damages will be the rate of interest borne by the note before its maturity. The force of this decision as an authority on the rate of interest to be recovered, in the absence of contract, is somewhat lessened on account of the fact that the note on which suit was brought was in form, "One day after date we promise to pay, etc., with ten per cent. interest, value received." Hence, it might be contended that, while there was no express agreement that this rate should be borne after maturity, it was unlikely that it was the intention, or expectation of the parties to the note, that it should be paid at maturity, or that it should bear the agreed rate of interest for one single day, and for all time thereafter the legal rate, which was scarcely more than half the rate contracted to be paid.

However, in Kimmell v. Burns, 84 Ind. 370, the note sued on was subject to no such construction, and yet the same conclusion was reached.

And in Hume v. Mazelin, 84 Ind. 574, it was held that a note specifying a certain rate of interest before maturity, continued to draw interest at the same rate until paid or merged in a judgment.

In Meaders v. Gray, 60 Miss. 400; 45 Am. Rep. 414, Campbell, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court used the following language: "We are satisfied that to hold that the stipulated rate of interest shall not govern after the maturity of the contract, would be to disregard the plain intent and common understanding of men in their contracts, to pervert the unmistakable meaning of their language, and unjustly to pay defaulting debtors a premium not contemplated by them, for their default. It is probable that no man ever promised a stipulated rate of interest who did not well understand that it was to be borne as long as the debt remained unpaid. When the contracting parties stipulate for a rate of interest different from that prescribed by law, their agreement, if not prohibited by the statute, fixes the incident of the debt which attends it as long as it exists, and to say the rate fixed by statute, to govern in the absence of a conventional rate shall at any time supersede the rate agreed on, is to do violence to the right of parties to make their agree-to the contract intended to abide by the contract rate until the debt was actually paid,¹ the better doctrine is believed to be that ment a substitute for the statutory rate." See also Tishimingo Sav. Institution v. Buchanan, 60 Miss. 496.

In Phinney v. Baldwin, 16 Ill. 108; 61 Am. Dec. 62, an action of assumpsit was brought on the following note: "Thirty days after date, I promise to pay to the order of Harvey Phinney $200, for value received, with interest from date, at five per cent. per month." This note was dated in California, and on the trial the plaintiff introduced the note described in the declaration, and proved that the rate contracted for was not illegal in California. The court of appeals, considering the case upon a writ of error, said: "There can be no reasonable doubt as to the true construction of the instrument. It is a promise to pay $200 in thirty days, and interest thereon at the rate of five per cent. per month. The note continues to bear that rate of interest so long as the principal remains unpaid. The maker undertakes to pay interest at that rate while he withholds payment of the principal; that is the compensation which the payee is to receive for forbearance of the money. We entertain no doubt that this was the real understanding of the parties. It was not their intention that this rate of interest should cease on the maturity of the note, and that it should thereafter only bear interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum. Such a construction could not be put upon the instrument without doing violence to the intention of the parties. It would, in effect, be making a new contract for them. They evidently contemplated but one rate of interest, and that rate was to continue until payment should be made. The plaintiff was entitled to recover interest on the principal at the rate of sixty per cent. per annum from the date of the note until the rendition of judgment."

In Spencer v. Maxfield, 16 Wis. 178, and Pruyn v. Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 367, it was held that where a party gives his obligation for the payment of a sum of money by a certain day, with interest at a higher rate than that allowed by law, in the absence of any agreement on the subject, it will be presumed that the parties intended that such higher rate should be paid as long as the money is withheld from one to whom it is due and payable, but where the contract rate was for interest until the time when the principal sum should become due and payable, no such presumption can arise, unless the parties expressly stipulate that the principal sum shall draw interest at the conventional rate only until the time when it becomes payable, thus negating the idea that it shall bear interest at the contract rate after the period of credit. See also Spaulding v. Lord, 19 Wis. 533.

Iowa.—Under the law of Iowa, though the legal rate of interest is six per cent., municipal bonds in that state bearing ten per cent. interest before maturity, bear the same rate afterward, and the judgment rendered on such bonds bears interest on the amount due on the bonds at the same rate which the bonds themselves bear. Cromwell v. Sac County, 96 U. S. 51; Hand v. Armstrong, 18 Iowa 324; Thompson v. Pickel, 20 Iowa 490.

Minnesota.—Under the Minnesota Stat. (1860), contracts for the payment of money, containing a stipulation for the payment of interest clearly expressed therein, shall bear the same rate of interest after maturity as before, provided the rate agreed to be paid does not exceed twelve per cent. Lash v. Lambert, 15 Minn. 416; 2 Am. Rep. 142.

Nevada.—Under legislative enactments in Nevada, the courts have held that the same rate of interest, agreed upon by the parties to be paid before the debt becomes due, shall be allowed after its maturity instead of the legal rate. McLane v. Abrams, 2 Nev. 199.

Ohio.—In Ohio, under the act of May 4th, 1869, parties may stipulate in a note for any rate of interest not exceeding eight per cent. per annum, and such note after maturity will continue to bear the stipulated rate until payment without an express agreement to that effect. Marietta Iron Works v. Lottimer, 25 Ohio St. 621. See also Hydraulic Co. v. Chatfield, 38 Ohio St. 575.

The court, in Monnett v. Sturges, 25 Ohio St. 384, held that a contract to pay a specified rate of interest, is a contract to pay interest at that rate until the principal debt is paid, and not merely for the time the note is to run.

1. Thus, in Bell v. New York, 10

the debtor, if he retains the principal after maturity, may be required to pay the rate of interest established by law.¹

Paige (N. Y.) 69, it was held that where a mortgagee has contracted to receive a particular rate of interest, less than the legal rate, during the time of credit agreed upon by the party, if he allows the mortgagee to remain in possession after the mortgage money becomes due and payable, it is reasonable to presume that the understanding of the parties is, that interest shall continue at the same rate until the creditor thinks proper to demand payment.

In Van Beuren v. Van Gaasbeck, 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 496, the defendant owed the plaintiff's testator a bond bearing six per cent. interest which had remained unpaid for more than thirty years. This, it would seem, might reasonably be construed into acquiescence on the part of the creditor, or his executor, to allow the retention of the money on the terms of the contract. Another point may also be considered; the bond was dated Feb. 6th, 1786 and conditioned to pay $712.50 Feb. 6th, 1787, with interest at and after the rate of six per cent. per annum. It is not altogether clear what the words "at and after," which appear in the bond, mean, but from the opinion of the court, it may be inferred that the judicial construction was that six per cent., the rate mentioned, was to prevail as well after as until maturity, for Woodworth, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, observed: "The bond is conditioned for the payment of interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum. The contract of the parties is not confined to the time limited for the payment of the principal, but is general and continues until the contract ceases to operate." The language of the judge, however, is almost as uncertain in meaning as the language of the contract which he seeks to construe.

1. In Ludwick v. Huntzinger, 5 W. & S. (Pa.) 51, the stipulated interest on a bond was less than the legal rate, and interest was allowed subsequent to the maturity at the legal rate. The supreme court of Pennsylvania, in its opinion, said that until the bond became payable the agreement of the parties regulated the allowance of interest and its rate; but after that the law interposes not only to allow, but to regulate, the rate of interest that could be recovered against the defendant for, and on account of, his illegal detention of the debt from the plaintiff.

In U. S. Bank v. Chapin, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 471, it was held that a bank, which is by law limited to six per cent. interest upon all discounts, is entitled to recover at the rate of seven per cent. from the time the debt becomes due; that the clause in the charter limiting the rate of interest to six per cent. referred only to discounts in the ordinary course of business, and the contract with the bank having been broken, the defendant was liable to pay the rate of interest fixed by the lex loci from the time the debt became due.

For a case similar to United States Bank v. Chapin, see Kitchen v. Mobile Bank, 14 Ala. 233.

The case of Henderson v. Laurens, 2 Desaus. (S. Car.) 170, was an action brought against an executor to recover a legacy which the testator directed to bear five per cent. interest and be paid at a certain time. The time for its payment having passed, the court decreed that it should be paid with interest at five per cent. up to the time when it was due, and seven per cent., which was the legal rate, thereafter.

Absence of All Contract.—It will be observed that the following cases, maintaining that where the contract rate is lower than the legal rate, the former shall prevail after maturity, do not consider the question in the absence of all contract on the subject but regard the agreement as still subsisting. Naturally, as long as the contract itself endures, interest according to its terms may be recovered; but where a party has obtained money for a limited time at a reduced rate of interest, to clothe him with the power to violate his obligation, and to retain indefinitely a benefit to which he is entitled by his contract only until a specified day, would be a subversion of all principles of right and justice. A defaulter would thus be enabled to derive an advantage from his own wrong, and a premium paid delinquent debtors for every violation of their contracts. In this connection see the dictum of Cole, J., in Spencer v. Maxfield, 16 Wis. 181.

The conclusion of the court in Lawrence v. Leake, etc., Orphan House, 2

h. RECEPTION OF VERDICT.—As is indicated by the definition of a verdict, when the decision of the jury on the issues submitted to them is reached, it is to be reported to the court.

(1) By Whom Received.—The reception of the verdict is the function of the judge who presided at the trial of the cause, and it has been held that it may not be delegated by him to another; that neither the clerk of the court, nor an attorney, though with the consent of the parties concerned, can lawfully preside at the reception of the result of the jury's deliberations.¹ These asser-

Den. (N. Y.) 577, seems to involve, though perhaps indirectly, this principle. In this case it appeared that a certain sum of money had been lent at a rate less than the legal rate of interest, with no definite agreement as to when the money should be repaid. After the death of the lender and demand of the debt by his representatives, the borrower denied the debt and attempted to conceal evidence of the indebtedness. It was held that this fraudulent conduct on the part of the borrower was a breach of the contract allowing him the benefit of the reduced rate of interest, and that from the time of the denial and attempted concealment, legal interest became due.

The first case to be noticed, in its contradiction of the doctrine laid down in the text, is Andrews v. Keeler, 19 Hun (N. Y.) 87. This was an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff entered upon the report of a referee. An item of the plaintiff's account was a promissory note made by the defendant, dated April 17th, 1867, payable ten days after date with interest at six per cent., and the referee, after deducting some admitted credits, allowed the plaintiff interest on the balance at the rate of seven per cent. from the date of the maturity of the note. The court held that this was error, and that the true rule is, that interest should be computed according to the rate prescribed by the contract until it ceases to operate by being merged in a judgment.

Precisely the same rule was proclaimed in the case of Miller v. Burroughs, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 436. This was a suit on a bond for which a mortgage was taken as security, the interest was expressed to be at the rate of six per cent. per annum, and the day of payment having passed, the bond and mortgage became forfeited and the question was, whether the plaintiffs were not entitled to the legal rate, seven per cent., from the time of the forfeiture. The court held that interest must be decreed according to the contract of the parties until the contract ceased to operate by being merged in the decree.

The case of New York L. Ins., etc., Co. v. Manning, 3 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 58, has been sometimes cited to sustain the proposition that the contract rate, where it is less than the legal rate, prevails after maturity. This case certainly does not directly determine the point, and as far as analogy is concerned, it would seem rather to support the doctrine in favor of the substitution of the legal rate. The sole question in this case was: Can a mortgagor, whose mortgage secured six per cent. interest and who, after the money became due, regularly paid interest at the rate of seven per cent., afterwards claim to have the excess which he has paid beyond six per cent., applied to extinguish the principal; and it was answered in the negative.

See also Sullivan v. Fosdick, 10 Hun (N. Y.) 181, where the court cited the above cases to sustain the proposition that "when a contract calls for interest at less than the legal rate, the same rate of interest continues after the debt becomes due, and until judgment."

People*, 13 Hun (N. Y.) 266; Hiller v. English, 4 Strobh. (S. Car.) 486; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. (Va.) 447. And see Jones v. State, 97 Ala. 77.

Receiving the verdict is one, if not the most important of the proceedings during the trial. It must be received by the court before which the trial was had, and if not, the verdict is a nullity and not authority for sentence. Hinman v. People, 13 Hun (N. Y.) 266.

tions, however, have not remained uncontradicted, it having been declared that proceedings appertaining to the reception of the verdict, being mere matters of practice, are for the courts to regulate in the exercise of a reasonable discretion.¹

Presence of All of Several Judges.—It seems that where the court is composed of several judges, the absence of one will not impair the validity of a verdict received under such circumstances.² Some adjudications qualify this doctrine by maintaining that, unless it is a mere temporary absence, animo revertendi, the court is dismembered, the trial abandoned, and a verdict rendered during such disorganized condition is void.³

In Willett v. Porter, 42 Ind. 250, the judge, with the consent of the parties, authorized the clerk to preside at the return of the jury to receive the verdict. It was held that a verdict so received was wholly invalid. See also Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. (Va.) 447; Waller v. State, 40 Ala. 332.

Save in certain statutory cases, the judge has no right to authorize an attorney, in his absence, to hold court or to perform any of his official duties. In Britton v. Fox, 39 Ind. 369, a verdict returned under such circumstances was held invalid, and the fact that the defendant's counsel was present made no difference.

Consent of Parties—Effect of.—Though the consent of the parties can cure many errors, illegalities, and omissions, it cannot authorize or legalize a change in the modes of proceeding which the law has prescribed for the government and direction of its legal tribunals. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. (Va.) 447. In this case the court of appeals characterized the practice of the circuit court in authorizing the clerk, with consent of the parties, to receive the verdict, in the absence of the judge, as pernicious, and not sanctioned by any authority, legislative or judicial.

1. Palmer v. Harper, Wright (Ohio) 383.

In Alabama, the supreme court in Sorrelle v. Craig, 9 Ala. 534, following, as they say, what they "conceive to be the best established practice," allowed the clerk to receive the verdict, and on Sunday.

In Brown v. State, 63 Ala. 97, a verdict, by consent of the parties, was returned to the clerk during a brief recess of the court. The attention of the supreme court was not called to this irregularity, and it seems to have been unnoticed by it. The judgment was attacked by the appellant, among other assignments of error, upon the ground that the defendant had an absolute right to have the jury polled on the reception of the verdict, and that an agreement by counsel to the effect, that the verdict might be returned during a recess of the court, into the hands of the clerk, could not be construed as a waiver of this right. The judgment was not disturbed.

North Carolina.—The supreme court of North Carolina, in Wright v. Hemphill, 81 N. Car. 33, sanctions the practice of having the clerk receive the verdict. See also Willoughby v. Threadgill, 72 N. Car. 438; Houston v. Potts, 64 N. Car. 33; State v. Austin, 108 N. Car. 780.

2. Wathan v. Penebaker, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 99.

The court of appeals, in Blend v. People, 41 N. Y. 604, decided that the conviction of the plaintiff in error should be reversed because one of the justices in session left the bench during the trial, and the county judge appointed another justice of the peace to fill his place, and the trial proceeded before the court thus organized. The learned judge, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "When Elwood abandoned the trial the court was disorganized, so far as this trial was concerned. This is not the case where a member of the court leaves the bench for a few moments intending to return, and does return, but a total abandonment of the trial, in consequence of which one-third of the court is changed."

3. In the case of People v. Dohring, 59 N. Y. 374; 17 Am. Rep. 349, it was held that a court of sessions was not disorganized because one of the justices of sessions left the bench during the trial, went to the witness stand and was examined as a witness in the cause.

(2) When Received.—The general rule is that the verdict should be returned before the expiration of the term at which the cause is tried.¹ But in this, as in all questions of practice, there is a great diversity of procedure.² It is also maintained that a verdict cannot be received during an adjournment of the court, for while the court is not in session it is incompetent to transact judicial business.³ But this also is controverted.⁴

Folger, J., assigns as a reason why the irregularity of the justice, in leaving the bench and being examined as a witness, did not disorganize the court, "That the justice did not leave the court room while the trial was progressing; he did not abandon the trial; he left the bench for a space intending soon to return to it and did return." The ruling of the last case cited followed that in Tuttle v. People, 36 N. Y. 431; and in People v. Reagle, 60 Barb. (N. Y.) 527.

1. Nabors v. State, 6 Ala. 200; Ex p. Juneman, 28 Tex. App. 486; Harper v. State, 43 Tex. 431.

Terms of court are those portions of the year set apart by law for the transaction of judicial business, and within which it should be performed. Horton v. Miller, 38 Pa. St. 270.

Prolongation of Term.—In the case of Gregg v. Cooke, Peck (Tenn.) 82, the circuit judge had prolonged the term of his court beyond the time appointed by law for its continuance. The proceedings were held to be coram non judice and void.

The court, in Archer v. Ross, 3 Ill. 303, was holding a term in one county, and during the continuance of such regular term, appointed a special term for the same county, to commence on the day appointed by law for the commencement of a term in another county. A judgment rendered in such special term was held to be void and unauthorized. See also Davis v. Fish, 1 Greene (Iowa) 406; 68 Am. Dec. 387; Grable v. State, 2 Greene (Iowa) 559.

2. A contrary practice seems to prevail in Wisconsin, as evidenced by the decision of the court in State v. Leahy, 1 Wis. 258.

In Kentucky, it has been decided that a verdict rendered after twelve o'clock on Saturday night at the close of a special term, called a week in advance of the regular term, may be received where there is no conflict with the regular terms required to be held by a judge in any other county. This practice is allowed instead of requiring a delay, since the same judge presides, the same jurisdiction continues, and the venue is identical the following Monday morning, when judgment may be pronounced on such verdict. Bales v. Com. (Ky. 1889), 11 S. W. Rep. 470.

3. In re Green, 16 Ill. 234; Deland v. Richardson, 4 Den. (N. Y.) 95; Weeks v. Lyon, 18 Barb. (N. Y.) 530; Shamokin Coal, etc., Co. v. Mitman, 3 Pa. St. 379; Person v. Neigh, 52 Pa. St. 199.

During Adjournment—Void.—The case of Shamokin Coal, etc., Co. v. Mitman, 3 Pa. St. 379, was given to the jury in the morning and the jury retired to deliberate upon their verdict. The court then adjourned until half past two in the afternoon of the same day; during the interval, and between the adjournment and the time for the re-assembling of the court, the judge took his seat upon the bench and received the verdict of the jury which was then entered on the minutes of the court by the prothonotary, in the absence of both the defendant and his counsel. After the entering of the verdict the judge left the bench, and the court met at the time to which it was adjourned in the morning. On appeal, it was held to be a fatal irregularity, and the judgment was reversed.

In Nebraska, under similar circumstances, a verdict was declared invalid. Longfellow v. State, 10 Neb. 105.

4. During Adjournment—Valid.—The case of Barrett v. State, 1 Wis. 175, in considering the question how far an adjournment of the court from day to day during the term suspends its functions during the adjournment, arrived at a different conclusion. In this instance the trial commenced on the 29th day of March and continued until about three o'clock the next afternoon, when the jury retired to consider their verdict. At half past six the same evening the court adjourned until half past eight the following morning, and during that interval, about eleven o'clock at night, March 30th, the judge was informed

(a) Reception on Sunday.—The great weight of authority, and especially the more recent decisions, seem to be in favor of allowing the return and reception of a verdict on Sunday,¹ though that the jury had agreed upon their verdict. He then proceeded to the court room, took his seat upon the bench, and in the presence of the prisoner and bystanders, called the jury to receive their verdict, and then discharged them, and they were never called again to affirm or declare their verdict. This verdict was upheld.

The court, in McIntyre v. People, 38 Ill. 514, following In re Green, 16 Ill. 234, held that a verdict received during adjournment is not invalid. In this case, however, upon which the court, in McIntyre v. People, 38 Ill. 514, justifies its conclusion, the adjournment had merely been announced when the judge was informed that the jury had agreed; and it was held that he properly received their verdict. In re Green involves the proposition stated in the note below, namely, that an adjournment is an act, not a declaration; and hence, in this case there had been no actual adjournment in legal contemplation.

Statutes Regulating.—In some of the states, whose practice is regulated by Codes of Procedure, provisions are to be found to the effect that while the jury are absent the court may adjourn from time to time as to other business, but it shall be deemed open for every purpose connected with the cause submitted to the jury until a verdict is rendered or the jury discharged. Such a regulation has been construed to authorize the reception of a verdict after the court had adjourned for the day. Temple v. Com., 14 Bush (Ky.) 769; 29 Am. Rep. 442; Territory v. Milligan (Okla. 1894), 37 Pac. Rep. 1059.

Act of Adjournment.—An adjournment is an act, not a declaration, and until there has been actual separation and departure the act is incomplete, though proclaimed by the crier of the court. Person v. Neigh, 52 Pa. St. 199; Koontz v. Hammond, 62 Pa. St. 177; In re Green, 16 Ill. 234.

The bill of exceptions, in the case of Blake v. Bayley, 16 Gray (Mass) 531, stated the following proceedings: "At the usual hour of adjournment in the afternoon the jury were out; and the judge left the bench without having given any verbal order for the adjournment and before the proclamation therefor was completed, and without having given any order as to the jury who were out, and passed into the adjacent lobby, leaving the intervening doors open. In a moment or two the judge came back into the court room, while the clerk and the other officers of the court remained in their usual places, and, in the presence of the defendant's counsel, recalled and vacated any adjournment that had been made. The jury then came in and the judge directed the verdict to be taken, the defendant's counsel being present and interposing no objection, and the jury rendered and affirmed their verdict." The defendant afterwards moved that the verdict be set aside and a new trial granted, because the verdict was received by the judge and recorded by the clerk after the court had adjourned and while it was not in session. But the judge overruled the motion, "On the ground that courts have a right to recall and vacate proclamations and adjournments as prematurely and inconsiderately made, for the necessary or reasonable transaction of business, so long as no one is thereby prejudiced; and that, under the above circumstances it was impossible that the defendant was prejudiced; and that there was not in fact a substantial adjournment; and that if there was, the presence of the defendant's counsel was tantamount to an assent and a waiver of error." The supreme court, in overruling the exceptions and affirming the judgment, said: "The defendant's counsel being present in the court room when the verdict was returned, and making no objection thereto, waived the irregularity (if any), and the objection is not open to the defendant."

"While we admit," said the court in Cory v. Silcox, 5 Ind. 370, "that many cases are to be found in the books deciding that no judicial act can be done on Sunday, and that verdicts returned on that day are void, we are not satisfied that we would be subserving morality, religion, justice, or the spirit of the common law, by following their example as to verdicts. The reason of the rule, making Sunday dies non juridicus, was founded in those principles of religion which require a strict observance of that day, and surely that which tends to its non-observance cannot be regarded as being within the reason of the rule. We apprehend that jurors worn out by the laborious investigation of a lengthy case, and unnecessarily pent up together from twelve to twenty-four hours, would be little inclined, while in that condition, to observe the Sabbath day as they should."

In Stone v. Bird, 16 Kan. 488, it was decided that where the trial is completed by the introduction of testimony, the arguments of counsel, and the charge of the court, and the case has passed to the jury for consideration before midnight on Saturday, the fact that they do not arrive at, and return a verdict until some time in the early hours on Sunday morning does not vitiate the entire proceedings and compel a retrial.

Solar Time.—The only standard of time in the computation of a day, or the hours of a day, recognized by the law of Georgia, is the meridian of the sun; hence, a verdict rendered Saturday night at two minutes to twelve by railroad time, and twenty minutes after twelve by sun time, is in reality a Sunday verdict, though the court was held by railroad time. It would be absurd to think that the standard of time fixed by persons in a certain line of business could be substituted, at will, by persons in a certain locality, for the standard recognized by the statutes of the state as well as a general law and usage of the country. Henderson v. Reynolds, 84 Ga. 159.

"By all authorities," said the court, in Davis v. Fish, 1 Greene (Iowa) 406; 48 Am. Dec. 387, "Sunday is represented to be a dies non juridicus. It was made so in the year 517 by a canon of the church, and adopted as the law of the land by the Saxon kings of England; and having been confirmed by William the Conqueror and Henry II., was fully established as part of the common law. Decisions in the English books are uniform in pronouncing all the judicial proceedings performed on Sunday as unlawful and void. Swann v. Broome, 3 Burr. 1595. And they appear to be sustained by almost equal unanimity by the American courts. . . . Such acts (alluding to the reception of verdicts) are clearly judicial and should come under the prevailing salutary rule that all judicial acts done on Sunday are void, unless expressly authorized by statute."

The court, in Shaw v. M'Combs, 2 Bay (S. Car.) 232, decided that a verdict rendered on Sunday is void, declaring that it is a well known rule of common law that the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, is not a day in law dies dominicus non est dies juridicus; consequently, all temporal business transacted on that day is null and void, as it is set apart by our holy religion for the worship of the Almighty, and the necessary preparations for that purpose.

In Butler v. Kelsey, 15 Johns. (N.

(3) Where Received.—The general rule is that the jury must deliver their verdict in open court.¹ In order to comply more readily with this requirement, however, the judge is allowed to select or change the house or room in which the court is held according to the dictates of necessity or convenience.²

Y.) 177, the jury were impaneled on Saturday, and heard the allegations and evidence before twelve o'clock that night. Still it was decided that they could not assess the damages, or deliver their verdict after that hour on Sunday.

Award.—In Story v. Elliott, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 27; 18 Am. Rep. 423, it was declared that an award made on Sunday and all judicial acts are void. See also Field v. Park, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 140.

In Johnson v. Depuy, 2 N. J. L. 165, it appeared to the supreme court from the return of the justice, that the jury wrote down their verdict and delivered the writing to the justice instead of openly pronouncing their verdict. The appellate tribunal declined to recognize such a practice, declaring that there was no lawful verdict but that which was pronounced by "open voice in open court." See also Anonymous, 63 Me. 590.

The Massachusetts practice, in trials on indictments for felonies, requires the pronouncement of the verdict in open court by the foreman. Com. v. Tobin, 125 Mass. 203; 28 Am. Dec. 220.

During Adjournment.—The reception of a verdict in the court room, in the presence of the officers of the court, the jury, the parties and the bystanders, at eleven o'clock at night, and during a temporary adjournment, was held a sufficient delivery in open court to sustain the validity of the verdict attacked on that ground. Barrett v. State, 1 Wis. 175. In this case it was held that for all general purposes the court is considered in session from the commencement until the close of the term, and that its authority continues over the parties, jurors, officers, etc., as well during a recess, or adjournment for the night, as during its active labors during the day.

Out of Court.—In Tuhe v. Eber, 19 Ind. 126, the verdict was received by the judge out of court, and the jury discharged without the consent of the parties, and without opportunity to call the jury. The supreme court reversed the judgment on that ground. Rosser v. McColly, 9 Ind. 587, is to the same effect.

2. Room of Juror.—In King v. Faber, 51 Pa. St. 387, the court adjourned to the room of a sick juror, and a verdict was there rendered. The supreme court resolved that there was no error in the mode of receiving the verdict, as it was "the best the judge could do under the circumstances."

The circumstances surrounding the reception of the verdict, in Litchfield Bank v. Church, 29 Conn. 137, were very similar. In this case the court was adjourned to the hotel on account of the illness of one of the jurors, and the jury were impaneled in the room where he was lying, the verdict being taken there. The propriety of this practice being discussed on appeal, the court said: "We know of no law or practice of our courts which is inconsistent with this proceeding. An unavoidable emergency made it necessary. The court was still holden in Litchfield, the place appointed by law, while no precise place in the town is designated by statute. The house or room may be selected or changed, as necessity or convenience may require."

In Alabama, however, it has been held, under Alabama Code, § 749, requiring the circuit court to be held each year in the county courthouse, that the verdict must be delivered there, and if received by the judge at his hotel, on account of sickness, it is

(4) Presence of Parties—(a) Civil Causes.—The parties in a civil cause have a right to be present at the reception of the verdict,¹ but if they do not avail themselves of this privilege, the verdict received in their absence is not thereby rendered ineffectual.² In some instances, it has been held that it is the duty of the judge to have the parties called if they are out of court when the jury appear with their findings;³ in others, that this is a matter with which the court need not concern itself.⁴

(b) Criminal Cases.—The practice of requiring the presence of the void. Jackson v. State (Ala. 1894), 15 So. Rep. 351.

Judge at His Chambers.—In Palmer v. Harper, Wright (Ohio) 383, the court held that the delivery of a verdict to the judge at his chambers was valid on the ground that the mode of receiving verdicts is a mere matter of practice for the courts to regulate for themselves.

Under the same circumstances, a verdict has been held emphatically invalid. Thus where a verdict was rendered to the judge at his chambers and the jury discharged until ten o'clock the next morning, at which time the court directed the clerk to enter the verdict, the supreme court declared that such a verdict could not be sustained. State v. Bray, 67 N. Car. 283.

It is not necessary, in a civil case, that the parties should be present at the rendition of the verdict. It is not even the duty of the court to have them called. Merwin v. Wheeler, 41 Conn. 14.

By the common law, the plaintiff was required to be present in court, in person or by attorney, when the verdict of the jury was received, in order to answer to the amercement to which he was liable pro falso clamore suo. 3 Black.Com. 376. But this fine or amercement is not at the present day imposed for any cause, and the costs to which he is liable, if he fail in a suit, can be adjudged against him, although he be not present in court at the time the verdict is rendered. It would seem, therefore, that the reason assigned by Blackstone for requiring the plaintiff to attend to receive the verdict no longer exists, and, although he may attend for the purpose of polling the jury, his presence is not necessary. Stiles v. Ford, 2 Colo. 128.

It is said, in Graham v. Tate, 77 N. Car. 120, that no verdict should be rendered unless the plaintiff be present in person or by attorney; such a practice would be irregular and against the course of the court.

3. Where the plaintiff was not called, on the return of the jury to the bar, before taking the verdict, it was set aside for irregularity, the court holding that the plaintiff should have been called, and his appearance or default entered by the clerk. Gale v. Hoysradt, 1 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 72.

4. Perry v. Mulligan, 58 Ga. 479; Merwin v. Wheeler, 41 Conn. 14; Strowger v. Sample, 44 Kan. 298.

It is not necessary, in a civil case, that the judge should send for the defendant or his counsel before receiving the verdict, nor should the court delay or embarrass the business of the court by waiting until a party in a civil case comes into court, before receiving a verdict. If they want to be present they must attend the sessions of the court. Strowger v. Sample, 44 Kan. 298.

In a civil cause it is not error to receive the verdict in the absence of the defendant and his counsel. It is their business to be in court when the judge is in court, and if he had them both called, and stopped awhile to see if they would answer, it was only a matter of courtesy and indulgence. Perry v. Mulligan, 58 Ga. 479.

In Georgia, in a civil case, where a motion was made to set aside a verdict on the ground that it was rendered in the absence of the defendant and his counsel, it was held that the defendant must allege some meritorious defense, for it would be folly, said the court, in Jones v. Bullard, 52 Ga. 145, for the court to set aside the judgment, if there is any legal reason why it should not be immediately again rendered.

accused at the reception of the verdict in criminal cases is varied in its extent and application. It seems to be pretty generally admitted that, in trials on indictments for capital offenses, the presence of the defendant is necessary when the jury returns into court with the verdict.¹

From this point, however, the diversity is more marked; some jurisdictions holding that in all prosecutions for crimes of a nature less grave than capital felonies, the presence of the accused is immaterial;² while others maintain, in equally positive terms, that in trials for the commission of all felonies the presence of the defendant cannot be dispensed with.³ In Alabama, it is declared

The prisoner, in capital felonies has a right to be, and must be, personally present at all times in the course of his trial, and, as to felonies less than capital, the prisoner has precisely the same right to be present, but it is not essential that he must be, at all events. *State v. that the presence of the accused is requisite in all criminal prosecutions whatsoever, whether for felonies or misdemeanors, and that a verdict rendered in his absence is wholly void and ineffectual.¹ After all, it seems to be more a matter of practice than of principle, which each jurisdiction regulates to its own satisfaction.

Evidence of Presence.—The record should show affirmatively that the prisoner was present when the verdict was received.² It

In felony cases the verdict must be delivered in open court, and in the presence of the defendant. "This rule," said the court, in Price v. State, 36 Miss. 531; 72 Am. Dec. 195, "is founded on two reasons: first, the right of the defendant to be present and to see that the verdict is sanctioned by all the jurors; and secondly, in order that the defendant, if convicted, may be in the power of the court, and subject to its judgment."

The absence of the prisoner during the whole of the trial, and particularly his absence at the rendition of the verdict, is more than an irregularity; it is fatal to the legality of the trial; it is of universal requirement that a person who is tried for felony must be present when the verdict is received. State v. Ford, 30 La. Ann. 311.

And this error is not cured by reassembling the jury in the prisoner's presence after they have been discharged, and having them assent to and return the verdict. Finch v. State, 53 Miss. 363; Hines v. State, 8 Humph. (Tenn.) 602; Sargent v. State, 11 Ohio 472; Mills v. Com., 7 Leigh (Va.) 751.

Where a verdict was brought in by the jury in the absence of the prisoners, who were confined in jail, the court, not knowing that they were not present, directed the clerk to receive and read the verdict; and the clerk did read it aloud in the presence of the court and a large number of the bystanders. The court then observed to the jury that they were discharged, and the jury started out of the court room, but had not got out of the bar. It was then discovered that the prisoners were not in court, and the judge immediately stated to the jury that they were not discharged, and ordered the clerk to hand the papers in the cause back to them, and directed the sheriff to bring the prisoners into court. It was held that in contemplation of law there had been no discharge, and hence that the verdict was not invalid. Brister v. State, 26 Ala. 107.

In the State of Texas, under its criminal code, it is expressly provided that a verdict in a misdemeanor case may be received and read in the absence of the accused. Gage v. State, 9 Tex. App. 259.

Where three persons have been jointly indicted for the same crime, the condemnation and sentence of two of them will not be disturbed because the verdict against two was rendered in the absence of the third. State v. Bradley, 30 La. Ann. 326.

The Arkansas statutes provide that no indictments for felony shall be tried unless the defendant be personally present during the trial, nor shall a person indicted for an offense less than felony, be tried, unless he be present at the trial, either personally or by his counsel. Osborn v. State, 24 Ark. 629.

In Misdemeanor Cases.—It does not seem to be necessary to the validity of a verdict, in trials on indictments for misdemeanors, that the defendant should be personally present at its reception. Sweeden v. State, 19 Ark. 205; Warren v. State, 19 Ark. 214; 68 Am. Dec. 214; Osborn v. State, 24 Ark. 629; People v. Ebner, 23 Cal. 159; State v. Hughes, 4 Iowa 554; *Stubbs v. is not necessary that the fact should be stated in totidem verbis, but the presence of the defendant may be established by necessary or reasonable construction of the terms of the record.¹

(5) Waiver of Right to Be Present.—The greater number of decisions hold that the right to be present at the reception of the verdict may be waived by a party to the suit,² though not (Pa.) 237.

The decision of the court, in Hill v. State, 17 Wis. 675; 86 Am. Dec. 736, contradicts the principle that the record must affirmatively show the presence of the prisoner when the verdict is returned. The position of the court is grounded on the doctrine that the burden of proof is on the party complaining of the verdict to show error, and it is even contended that where the record discloses the fact of the prisoner's absence from court, it must be presumed to have been a voluntary absence, unless it be proved otherwise. The court concedes the right of the defendant in a criminal case, to be present, but maintains the right to be alienable, and that a verdict rendered during a voluntary absence is valid. See also Welch v. Stiles, 47 Iowa 171; Torque v. Carrillo, 1 Arizona 336.

The record in the case of Gould v. Magee, 3 N. J. L. 475, did not show that the defendant had been called at the time of taking the verdict. The appellate court declined to interfere with the judgment merely on account of this omission.

1. Sweeden v. State, 19 Ark. 205; People v. Jung Qung Sing, 70 Cal. 469; State v. Schoenwald, 31 Mo. 147; State v. Craton, 6 Ired. (N. Car.) 164; Leschi v. Territory, 1 Wash. Ter. 14; Trumble v. Territory, 3 Wyoming 280.

While it is better to state in direct terms that the prisoner was present when the jury pronounced their verdict, it is sufficient if it appear by necessary or reasonable implication. State v. Craton, 6 Ired. (N. Car.) 164.

An entry of record in the following form: "Now, again come as well the parties aforesaid, as also the jurors" sufficiently shows the presence of the defendant. State v. Schoenwald, 31 Mo. 147.

Some courts seem to reject the idea that the presence of the prisoner can be shown by reasonable construction of the record, maintaining that it must be a necessary implication.

In Shapoonmash v. U. S., 1 Wash. Ter. 188, the record showed that the prisoner was in court at the commencement of the trial, and although it showed that the court adjourned from one day to the next, nothing was said about the prisoner until the jury rendered their verdict, when it was recited that the "court remanded the prisoner to the custody of the marshal," from which entry the appellate court declined to presume that the defendant was present when the verdict was rendered.

An entry of record that "the court sentence George Dunn, the defendant, to be taken to the jail in Allegheny County from whence you come, and from thence to the place of execution," etc., was held insufficient to establish the presence of the prisoner at the passing of the sentence. Dunn v. Com., 6 Pa. St. 384.

It was said, in People v. Kohler, 5 Cal. 72, that in favor of life, the strictest rule which has any sound reason to sustain it, will be observed.

2. Stiles v. Ford, 2 Colo. 128; Robson v. State, 83 Ga. 166; Price v. State, 36 Miss. 531; 72 Am. Dec. 195; State v. Paylor, 89 N. Car. 539; State v. Kelley, 97 N. Car. 404; People v. State, 2 Ohio St. 319; Hill v. State, 17 Wis. 675; 86 Am. Dec. 736.

In Hill v. State, 17 Wis. 675; 86 Am. Dec. 736, the court contended that the accused might readily waive his right to be present during the pendency of the trial. "He may waive any trial at all," said the court. "He may plead guilty and thus subject himself to worse results which might follow a trial. And, if he could do this, it would be difficult by counsel in the absence of his client, where the trial is on an indictment for a felony.¹ There may be a constructive as well as an actual waiver, a voluntary absence of the party operating as such.² On the other hand, however, it has been held, in prosecutions for felony, not only that this is a privilege of which the accused cannot be deprived, but that it is an inalienable and inherent right of which he must avail himself.³

to reconcile, with the rule which allowed it, any reasoning that would prevent him from waiving any mere privilege on the trial that was designed only to aid him in insuring himself from those results."

Express Waiver.—The court, in People v. Albany Mayor's Court, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 36, held that the plaintiff must expressly waive his right to be present before the verdict can be legally received in his absence.

State*, 20 Ohio 33.

Voluntary Absence.—In General.—The accused may waive his right to be present, and if he voluntarily absents himself, when he ought to be in court, he cannot complain of the consequences of his own voluntary act. This voluntary absence of the prisoner is a waiver of his right to be present. Price v. State, 36 Miss. 531; 72 Am. Dec. 195.

In Hill v. State, 17 Wis. 675; 86 Am. Dec. 736, it was said that if the absence of the defendant be voluntary, the verdict is valid.

Leaving Court Room.—A verdict may be legally rendered, received, and recorded where the accused voluntarily leaves the court room and fails to appear after the sheriff's proclamation to come and hear the verdict about to be rendered. He cannot be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong, and thus defeat the ends of justice. State v. Perkins, 40 La. Ann. 210.

Absence On Bail.—It is a right of a prisoner to be present at the time the verdict is rendered, and if deprived of this right by imprisonment, or in any other improper manner, the verdict shall not be followed by the judgment. Where the accused is absent on bail, he cannot voluntarily absent himself at the time the verdict is rendered, and take advantage of that absence to avoid judgment upon the verdict. Rose v. State, 20 Ohio 33; Wilson v. State, 2 Ohio St. 319; Robson v. State, 83 Ga. 166. And see Gales v. State, 64 Miss. 105.

Fugitive From Justice.—If a prisoner on an indictment for felony less than capital, flee the court during the pendency of the prosecution, he will be deemed to have waived the right to be present, and the court may proceed with his trial in his absence. State v. Kelley, 97 N. Car. 404.

3. The privilege of being personally present at trials for crimes which amount to felonies, is one that the prisoner cannot waive, and of which he must not be deprived. Jackson v. Com., 19 Gratt. (Va.) 656; Maurer v. People, 43 N. Y. 1; Prine v. Com., 18 Pa. St. 103.

In Andrews v. State, 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 550, Andrews escaped from custody after the jury had retired to consider their verdict, and was not present when they returned into court and rendered it. It was held that if the prisoner was absent, either in prison or by escape, there was a want of jurisdiction over his person to proceed with the trial, or to receive the verdict.

The law will not regard the reason of the defendant's absence. The rule is the same whether he is absent voluntarily, or against his will, and the verdict in either case is equally invalid. Sneed v. State, 5 Ark. 431; 41 Am. Dec. 102.

The accused, in a criminal prosecution for counterfeiting, was absent on bail when the jury returned with their verdict. Being called, he failed to appear, and then the question arose whether the court would receive the verdict in his absence. It was held that the defendant must appear or there

In civil actions, as the presence of the parties at the rendition of the verdict is not material, the liberty to waive such right has never been doubted.¹

(6) Presence of Counsel.—It is not essential to the validity of a verdict that the counsel of the parties should be present in court at its return.² Even where the defendant's counsel withdrew from the court room under an arrangement with the judge to send a bailiff for him upon the appearance of the jury with their verdict, the omission to do this was held immaterial.³

i. POLLING THE JURY.—This is a practice allowed in most jurisdictions, inaugurated for the purpose of requiring the jurors individually and personally to confirm the verdicts announced in court by their foreman or representative.⁴

In criminal cases it has generally been held that the judge is bound to allow the polling of the jury if properly requested.⁵ In would be "no propriety in receiving the verdict." State v. Hurlbut, 1 Root (Conn.) 90. And see Clark v. State, 4 Humph. (Tenn.) 254.

2. Torque v. Carrillo, 1 Arizona 336; Osborn v. State, 24 Ark. 629; Perry v. Mulligan, 58 Ga. 479; O'Bannon v. State, 76 Ga. 29; Strowger v. Sample, 44 Kan. 298; Huffman v. State, 28 Tex. App. 174; Martin v. State, 79 Wis. 165.

3. Seaton v. Smith, 45 Kan. 43.

4. The object of polling the jury is to ascertain if the verdict, which has just been presented and announced, is their verdict, or in other words, if they still agree to it; not to ask them what their verdict means, nor to question them as to their intention in finding. This ought to be performed by the clerk, who, as he calls over the list of jurors, asks them, one by one, or by the poll, the simple question "Is this your verdict?" This question requires but one answer, and still embraces all the legitimate objects of polling a jury. A party has no right to dictate the manner in which a jury shall be polled, nor to insist on any other question being put to them than the simple one to ascertain whether they agree to the verdict as presented. Labar v. Koplin, 4 N. Y. 547.

Answer of Foreman.—When the jury were asked on which count their verdict was founded, the inference was that all concurred in the answer of the foreman, if no one dissented therefrom. Cross v. Grant, 62 N. H. 675; 13 Am. St. Rep. 607. See also, in this connection, Cross v. North Carolina, 132 U. S. 131.

5. See CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, vol. 4, p. 881.

In Alabama, the right to poll the jury in all criminal cases, as well in misdemeanors as in felonies, is secured to either party by express enactment of the legislature. Brown v. State, 63 Ala. 97. A similar provision is made by the California statutes to the effect that in criminal actions a jury, upon the return of the verdict, may be polled by either party before the verdict is recorded. It is silent as to civil cases. Blum v. Pate, 20 Cal. 69.

Arkansas.—Upon a verdict being rendered, the jury may be polled at the instance of either party, or the court may of its own accord, direct the polling of the jury, if it doubts that the verdict announced by the foreman has been agreed to by all the jurors. This consists of the clerk or judge asking each juror if it is his verdict, and if one answers in the negative the verdict cannot be received. Harris v. State, 31 Ark. 196.

Georgia.—In Tilton v. State, 52 Ga. 478, it was declared that in criminal cases, the right to poll the jury is a legal right of the defendant, and does not depend on the discretion of the court. See also State v. Hughes, 2 Ala. 102; People v. Perkins, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 91; Leighton v. People, 10 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 261; Smith v. State, 51 Wis. 615; 37 Am. Rep. 845.

Indiana.—In Joy v. State, 14 Ind. 139, it was maintained that the defendant has a right to poll the jury at the time of the return of the verdict.

In Maryland, it seems to be the practice, in criminal cases, for the clerk, after the verdict has been returned many instances the same doctrine has been recognized in civil causes,¹ but it is more frequently declared to rest within the discretion of the trial judge in the latter class of actions.²

and recorded, to call the jury to "harken to their verdict as the court hath recorded it." A judgment entered upon the verdict of a jury, discharged and separated without being so called on by the clerk, will be reversed. Givens v. State, 76 Md. 485.

In Massachusetts, it has never been the right of a party in any case, civil or criminal, to have the jury polled. The affirmance of the verdict by the whole jury in the usual manner, upon it being read to them in form by the clerk, with the opportunity of open dissent thereby afforded each juror, has been deemed sufficient security that the verdict thus affirmed expresses the unanimous decision of the jury. Costley v. Com., 118 Mass. 1; Com. v. Roby, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 496; Ropps v. Barker, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 238. And see Lawrence v. Stearns, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 500.

North Carolina.—Upon rendition of a verdict in a criminal action, either the defendant or the solicitor for the state has a legal right to demand that the jury be polled, and it is error of the court to refuse. State v. Young, 77 N. Car. 498.

South Carolina.—In this state, it seems to rest within the discretion of the trial court whether or not the jury shall be polled, for in State v. Wyse, 32 S. Car. 45, the court says: "This may be permitted, and will not generally be denied, in a criminal case; but it is a matter which in this state is addressed to the sound discretion of the court." See also State v. Allen, 1 McCord (S. Car.) 525; 10 Am. Dec. 687; State v. Harden, 1 Bailey (S. Car.) 3.

Absolute Right—Civil Cases.—Upon the return of a verdict, either party has a right to demand that the jury be polled; a refusal to allow this is error. Hubble v. Patterson, 1 Mo. 392; Johnson v. Howe, 7 Ill. 342.

Bell, J., in Nichols v. Suncook Mfg. Co., 24 N. H. 437, citing 3 Bl. Com. 377, says: "At common law, when a verdict is returned, any juror may, in open court, declare his dissent before the verdict is recorded, and either of the parties may require the poll of the jury."

Unless a jury is waived, the polling of the jury is an absolute legal right. Thornburgh v. Cole, 27 Kan. 490.

The expression in the case of Blackley v. Sheldon, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 32, "If the court please," would seem to imply that the polling of the jury was in the discretion of the court, but in the case of Fox v. Smith, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 23, and Jackson v. Hawks, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 619, it was decided to be the absolute right of the party to have the jury polled, on their bringing in their verdict, whether it be sealed or oral, unless he has expressly waived that right. Labar v. Koplin, 4 N. Y. 547.

The Indiana Code provides that when the jury return into court and deliver their verdict, either party may poll them. Mitchell v. Parks, 26 Ind. 354; Bowen v. Bowen, 74 Ind. 470.

Oklahoma Laws, Art. 12, § 12, provides that, "When the verdict is given, and is such as the court may receive, the court must immediately record it in full upon the minutes, and must read it to the jury, and inquire of them whether it is their verdict." For a construction of this statute, see Territory v. Milligan (Okla. 1894), 37 Pac. Rep. 1059.

Hutchings*, 86 Ga. 562; Blackley v. Sheldon, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 32; Landis v. Dayton, Wright (Ohio) 659; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. (Va.) 447. And see Byrne v. Grossman, 65 Pa. St. 310; Scott v. Scott, 110 Pa. St. 387.

It is a duty of the court to see to it

The request that the jury be polled must be made before the verdict is recorded and the jury dispersed.¹ In interrogating the jury on this point, no generally established form of question prevails, it being usually the practice to ask the juror simply whether that each juror agrees to the verdict, and it is within his discretion to adopt such means as the law and usage of the court allow, to ascertain that fact. Among other means is the examination of the jury, when they return their verdict individually, or, as it is called, by the poll. This may be done whenever the court has any ground or reason to believe that the verdict is not unanimous. It may be done at the instance of a juror, or at the instance of a party. It is our judgment that, in civil cases, without saying what would be the rule in criminal cases, it is discretionary with the presiding judge whether the jury shall be polled or not. Smith v. Mitchell, 6 Ga. 458.

There is no right in a party to a civil case to poll a jury. It is within the discretion of the judge, and the privilege is sometimes accorded when the verdict is delivered under circumstances of suspicion. Landis v. Dayton, Wright (Ohio) 659.

In a civil action, neither party has a right to demand the polling of the jury. Before the verdict is recorded it is within the discretion of the court to allow this proceeding. It is never allowed afterwards. Blum v. Pate, 20 Cal. 69.

When the jury return their verdict in the court, and their names are called over by the clerk, the court is at liberty to refuse the request of the defendant's counsel to have them polled, unless some legal reason is assigned for making the request. Murphy v. Griggs, 41 Ga. 465.

The polling of the jury in a civil case is a matter within the discretion of the trial judge, and he can grant a motion to poll them, either upon the whole verdict, or for any answer to a specific question. Bell v. Hutchings, 86 Ga. 562.

In Byrne v. Grossman, 65 Pa. St. 310, the court expressly evaded a decision from the question as to whether the court has a right to refuse the request to have the jury polled, although it inclines to the opinion that in civil cases the matter is within the discretion of the court; and in Scott v. Scott, 110 Pa. St. 387, the court declined to decide the "mooted question" as to whether either party in a civil case may demand that the jury be polled.

Douglass, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, in Whitner v. Hamlin, 12 Fla. 18, said: "The question presented by the record is not as to the right of the party to poll the jury in all cases, but whether, after the jury has delivered a sealed verdict by the consent of parties, either party may demand as a right that the jury shall be polled. We are of the opinion that no such right exists, and that such applications must be addressed to the sound discretion of the judge, whose duty it is to see that no wrong or injustice is done to parties, and whose direction in such cases is not a matter for review by this court."

The jury may be polled by the court and ought to be if requested by either party. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. (Va.) 447.

1. Blum v. Pate, 20 Cal. 69; Malone v. State, 49 Ga. 211; Tilton v. State, 52 Ga. 478; Macon City Bank v. Kent, 57 Ga. 283; Steele v. Etheridge, 15 Minn. 413; Weeks v. Hart, 24 Hun (N. Y.) 181; Fox v. Smith, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 23; Sargent v. State, 11 Ohio 472; State v. Austin, 6 Wis. 205; High v. Johnson, 28 Wis. 72. And see Scott v. Scott, 110 Pa. St. 387.

The jury having agreed upon a verdict, and then dispersed by previous consent of counsel, and with leave of court, it is not proper to poll them when the verdict is afterward returned and read. Macon City Bank v. Kent, 57 Ga. 283.

The proper time to ask for leave to poll the jury is after the verdict is read, and before the jury has dispersed. Malone v. State, 49 Ga. 211; Tilton v. State, 52 Ga. 478.

It is too late to ask that the jury be polled after the verdict has been received and recorded. High v. Johnson, 28 Wis. 72.

A juror may dissent from a verdict to which he has before agreed, until it is recorded, Weeks v. Hart, 24 Hun (N. Y.) 181; and he may do this whether the jury is polled or not, and if he does so dissent there can be no the verdict rendered is his.¹ Cautions, exhortations, or reminders of official oath and duty are not usual, and should not be allowed.²

The dissent of a juror must be decided and unequivocal, or the verdict as rendered will be received and recorded.³ But where a valid verdict. Scott v. Scott, 110 Pa. St. 387.

Where, upon the polling of the jury, one of them replied that he had agreed to the verdict rendered as a matter of accommodation, though it was against his conscience, the unsuccessful party should object to the reception of the verdict at the time, before the verdict has been received and recorded; and an omission to do this will be deemed a waiver of all right to object to this irregularity. Farrell v. Hennessey, 21 Wis. 632; State v. Austin, 6 Wis. 205.

1. Harris v. State, 31 Ark. 106; Black v. Thornton, 31 Ga. 641; Bowen v. Bowen, 74 Ind. 470; Labar v. Koplin, 4 N. Y. 547; Leighton v. People, 10 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 261.

Form of Question.—When the jurors were asked "Do you find for the plaintiffs or defendant?" exception was taken to the form of the question, it being contended that the better practice would be, following the reading of the verdict, "What say you, Mr. Juror, is that, or is it not, your verdict?" it was held that the question as put was the substantial equivalent of this form, and that the verdict would not be disturbed on this ground. Black v. Thornton, 31 Ga. 641.

In polling the jury the inquiry should be restricted to the question "Is this your verdict?" Bowen v. Bowen, 74 Ind. 470.

A party will not be allowed to question a juror, upon the poll of the jury, as to the misconduct of the jury during trial. Bassham v. State, 38 Tex. 622. And see Anderson v. Green, 46 Ga. 361.

Reply of Juror.—The exact words used by the juror, in replying to the question to ascertain his concurrence in the verdict, are immaterial. It is sufficient if they indicate clearly the assent of the individual mind to the verdict. Com. v. Buccieri, 153 Pa. St. 535.

2. The jury returned with their verdict declaring the prisoner guilty of the crime of murder as charged in the indictment, when the defendant's counsel requested that jury be polled. This request was granted, but when he asked the court to inform the jury that the answer given to the question should be the "conscientious individual opinion of each man," the court declined to comply, and it was held that all that could be required, under the existing practice, was that each juror should be separately asked whether the verdict rendered by the foreman was his verdict. Leighton v. People, 10 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 261. See also Labar v. Koplin, 4 N. Y. 547.

3. Webster v. McKinster, 1 Pin. (Wis.) 644; Farrell v. Hennessey, 21 Wis. 632; State v. Austin, 6 Wis. 205; Gose v. State, 6 Tex. App. 121.

Where, upon the polling of the jury, eleven assented to the verdict, and one, in reply to the question of the clerk "Is this your verdict?" said, "It is as far as it goes," the defendant objected to the reception of the verdict. The trial court overruled the objection, and upon appeal it was held that there was nothing in the answer of the juror that ought to invalidate the verdict. Ran-kin v. Harper, 23 Mo. 579.

Where the jury were polled at the request of the plaintiff, and eleven of them, when their names were respectively called, in answer to the interrogatory, whether the verdict returned was theirs, promptly answered in the affirmative, but the remaining juror answered that the verdict "was not his, but that he had consented to it," and then when the question was repeated answered "Yes," it was held that this was a sufficient assent to the verdict. Mitchell v. Parks, 26 Ind. 354.

Upon the return of the verdict, the jury, being polled, replied variously. Some answered simply that they found for the defendant; some four or five added either that they were not satisfied, or not fully satisfied, but all finally added that they found for the defendant. It was held that the court pursued the proper course in receiving and recording the verdict. Black v. Thornton, 31 Ga. 641.

Where a juror answered in response to the inquiry, "Is this your verdict?"

juror answered that he could not say whether he had found for the plaintiff or the defendant, the court properly rejected the verdict.¹ If the verdict is disaffirmed by one or more members of the jury, the entire number should be sent back for further deliberation,² when they may, if all subsequently agree, render a verdict similar in all respects to the former finding.³

If the verdict is received and recorded without objection by the unsuccessful party, he will be deemed to have waived all right to require the polling of the jury,⁴ though in a jurisdiction that "it was, but that he consented to it under protest," it was held that the court committed no error in receiving and recording the verdict. Wiley v. Bull, 41 Kan. 206.

Where the record stated that a juror, upon being polled after affirming the verdict, had twice attempted to address the court, but had not been allowed to speak, yet, if he expresses dissatisfaction with it when he comes into court, or when a poll is taken, states that he cannot conscientiously assent to it, the court should respect his scruples, and refuse to receive a verdict not freely and unanimously concurred in; and, though a juror replied in the affirmative in answer to the question as to whether the verdict announced by the foreman was still his, if it was under circumstances which showed clearly that he entertained doubts of the defendant's guilt, and was opposed to finding him guilty, the verdict should not be received. State v. Austin, 6 Wis. 205.

Although a juror may have agreed upon, and signed, a verdict as a matter of accommodation, or from other motive, yet, if he expresses dissatisfaction with it when he comes into court, or when a poll is taken, states that he cannot conscientiously assent to it, the court should respect his scruples, and refuse to receive a verdict not freely and unanimously concurred in; and, though a juror replied in the affirmative in answer to the question as to whether the verdict announced by the foreman was still his, if it was under circumstances which showed clearly that he entertained doubts of the defendant's guilt, and was opposed to finding him guilty, the verdict should not be received. State v. Austin, 6 Wis. 205.

Where a juror stated, in answer to the question as to whether he concurred in the verdict returned, that he had agreed to it merely for the sake of an agreement, and not because he thought it was correct, it was held not to be a proper verdict, and that it should not have been received. Rothbauer v. State, 22 Wis. 468. And see Weeks v. Hart, 24 Hun (N. Y.) 181.

Where, in polling the jury, one member, in response to a question "Is this your verdict?" replied, "Under the evidence, it is not my verdict," the counsel was not allowed to interrogate the juror as to the reason for his answer. Such a reply is final and conclusive. Poulson v. Collier, 18 Mo. App. 583.

Where the jury had been polled at the request of the counsel of the unsuccessful party, and in his presence, and the verdict entered without objection, this is positive proof that all the jury assented to the verdict; and, as such, cannot be overcome except by evidence of actual fraud practiced on the court and the counsel of the unsuccessful party by the opposing party, or some one in his behalf, or by the clerk in procuring the verdict, to be delivered and entered when it had not been agreed to by the jury. Green v. Bliss, 12 How. Fr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 428.

2. Brown v. State, 63 Ala. 97; Black v. Thornton, 31 Ga. 641; Morgan v. Bell, 41 Kan. 345; Bunn v. Hoyt, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 255; Douglass v. Tousey, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 352; 20 Am. Dec. 616; Hancock v. Winans, 20 Tex. 320.

Where a jury sealed up the verdict and separated, they might be sent back to reconsider, if one of them disagrees to the verdict when polled; and the same verdict subsequently brought in is good. Bunn v. Hoyt, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 255; Douglass v. Tousey, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 352; 20 Am. Dec. 616.

Where, upon the return of a sealed verdict, the jury are polled and found to disagree, it is not error, in the absence of objection of either party, to send them out for further deliberation. Morgan v. Bell, 41 Kan. 345.

When some of the jurors answer in the negative, they may be sent out to reconsider their verdict. Brown v. State, 63 Ala. 97.

3. Bunn v. Hoyt, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 255; Douglass v. Tousey, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 352; 20 Am. Dec. 616.

4. Waiver of Right.—It seems that if regarding this practice as not only a privilege, but a right, the verdict received in the absence of a party's counsel, without fault on his part, whereby this right was lost, was held to be invalid.¹

j. CONSTRUCTION OF VERDICT.—Verdicts are to have a reasonable intendment and to receive a reasonable construction, and are not to be avoided unless from necessity, originating in doubt of their import, from immateriality of the issue found, or their manifest tendency to work injustice.² From the standpoint of the no request be made to poll the jury, the right will be deemed to have been waived. Raymond v. Bell, 18 Conn. 81.

Where the jury return their verdict to the clerk, during a brief recess of court, by agreement of counsel, it was held that this must be construed as a waiver of a right to poll the jury. Brown v. State, 63 Ala. 97.

A stipulation that the jury might, when they had agreed on their verdict, if the court should not be then in session, sign and seal the same and deliver it to the officer in charge, and disperse, was construed to be a waiver of the right to poll the jury, if the parties should not be in court. Koon v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co., 104 U. S. 106.

In Texas, an agreement that the jury should seal up their verdict and separate, operates as a waiver of all right to have the jury polled, except for the purpose of ascertaining whether the verdict as returned was unanimously agreed to when it was sealed up. Hancock v. Winans, 20 Tex. 320.

In a proper case for a sealed verdict, the right of parties to poll the jury is not affected by an agreement that the jury may seal their verdict. Steele v. Etheridge, 15 Minn. 413. And see Rigg v. Bias, 44 Kan. 148.

Directing Verdict.—Where a court directs a verdict, as there is no fact to be found by the jury, neither party is entitled to have it polled. Donoghue v. Indiana, etc., R. Co., 87 Mich. 13; Bond v. State, 68 Miss. 648.

Parkhurst*, 17 Vt. 105.

Regard Paid to Intent.—In the consideration of a verdict, the first object is to ascertain what the jury intended to find; and this is to be done by construing the verdict liberally, with the sole view of ascertaining the meaning of the jury, and not under the technical rules of construction which are applicable to pleadings. Miller v. Shackelford, 4 Dana (Ky.) 271; Mays v. Lewis, 4 Tex. 38.

Clerical Error.—Where the intention of the jury is clear, it becomes the duty of the court to disregard a mere clerical error. Jeansch v. Lewis, 1 S. Dak. 609.

The language of the jury should not be confined to the technical import of the words used, but should be understood in the sense in which the jury probably intended them. Mays v. Lewis, 4 Tex. 38.

Upon an indictment for larceny of various articles, aggregating in value $30, the jury returned a verdict in the following language: "We, the jury, find the prisoner guilty to the amount of thirteen dollars." This verdict was held to be a perfect finding of the crime charged, and that the qualifying words did not vary its meaning or effect, the whole being equivalent to finding the defendant guilty and assessing the value of the things stolen at $13. Timmons v. State, 56 Miss. 786. And upon trial of an indictment for the same offense, under a statute defining the crime, it has been decided that a general verdict of "guilty" implies a finding that the value of the property stolen is at least as much as is required to constitute the statutory offense. Schoonover v. State, 17 Ohio St. 294.

Upon a grand juror's complaint before a justice of the peace, charging the defendant with placing nuisances on a certain highway, the complaint containing two counts, one with regard to a building, and the other with regard to stone and timber placed on the highway, the justice made a general finding of guilty, and imposed a fine of seven dollars. By law, the lowest penalty that could be imposed for such an offense was five dollars. The defendant appealed to the superior court, and there moved that the case be erased from the docket, on the ground that the complaint charged two offenses, and that the fine showed that the justice found the defendant guilty of but one, and that he must have been acquitted of the other; and as it did not appear on which count he was found guilty and on which acquitted, he could not be compelled to answer to either. It was held, however, that it could not be inferred, from this state of the record, that the justice had acquitted on one count, but that a more reasonable inference was that but one offense was proved under both counts, and that the justice found the defendant guilty on both. State v. Merwin, 34 Conn. 113.

Obvious Construction.—It is not necessary that the construction adopted is the most obvious one, if it be fair and reasonable, and essential to support the judgment, particularly if the fact is one of minor importance. Kansas City, etc., R. Co. v. Phillibert, 25 Kan. 582.

Ut Res Magis Valeat, Quam Pereat.—Where the language of a verdict is ambiguous, it is the duty of the court to give it such construction as will make it effective. Carr v. Stevenson, 5 Humph. (Tenn.) 559. And see State v. Bowen, 16 Kan. 475.

Nothing can be presumed which the record is required to show; hence, where the entry in a misdemeanor case recited a verdict found by a jury of good and lawful men, to wit, A, B, it was held that no presumption could be indulged in aid of the entry or verdict, as the law required that the record should show, when one accused of crime was tried by a jury, that the jury was a lawful one, and such an entry as the one in question, imported a jury composed of but one man. Marks v. State, 10 Tex. App. 334.

Matter in Issue.—A verdict which does not clearly find the matter in issue, cannot be helped by intendment. Jewett v. Davis, 6 N. H. 518.

Where an indictment charged the defendant with feloniously aiding and assisting in the escape of a prisoner confined in jail for a felony, and the jury found a verdict: "We, the jury, on our oaths, do find the defendant guilty of negligently permitting the escape of the convict named in the indictment, but not guilty of feloniously aiding or assisting him to escape," it was held that the verdict of the jury acquitted the accused of the offense of which he was charged in the indictment, and found him guilty of an offense for which he was not indicted, and hence, no judgment could be legally rendered against him. Westbrook v. State, 52 Miss. 777.

On the trial of an indictment containing two counts, the first charging the murder committed by the defendant purposely, with premeditated malice, and the second charging the killing to have been done purposely and with premeditated malice in the perpetration of burglary, an acquittal as to the first count and a conviction of the second, did not acquit the defendant on the whole indictment. Bissot v. State, 53 Ind. 408.

Several Issues.—An action of assumpsit was brought for goods sold and delivered, and the defendant interposed the pleas of non assumpsit and Statute of Limitations. The verdict of the jury was: "The jury find the issue for the plaintiff and assess his damages at," etc. The judgment was attacked on appeal, on the ground that there were two issues of fact, and the finding of the jury was on one only, not designating which. The supreme court held that the fair and rational construction was, that the jury negatived the defenses interposed by the defendants, and found the matters in issue between the parties to be in favor of the plaintiff. Tippen v. Petty, 7 Port. (Ala.) 441. And see Porter v. Rummery, 10 Mass. 66; Jenks v. Halet, 1 Cai. (N. Y.) 60.

A verdict in terms, "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff," must be understood as a finding by the jury upon the issues joined between the parties, and even though there were several distinct issues made by the pleadings, such a verdict would be regarded as a sub-jury's intention, their verdict should be regarded, and when this can be ascertained, if consistent with legal principles, such effect should be allowed to their findings as will most nearly conform to their intent.¹ If this intention would be discovered, the verdict must not be read as an abstraction, as it is but a step in the cause, to be construed and applied reasonably in the light of all stantial finding upon all the issues. Fries v. Mack, 33 Ohio St. 52; Calvin v. State, 12 Ohio St. 60.

Burden of Proof.—As every proper intendment is to be made to sustain a verdict, it is the duty of the excepting party to show that error intervened at the trial. Elkins v. Parkhurst, 17 Vt. 105. See also State v. Dixon, 3 Iowa 416; Elswick v. Newsom, 9 Dana (Ky.) 260.

The presumption is, that the verdict of a jury is as broad as the issues upon which they are required to find, Reed v. Gentry, 7 Oregon 497; that it is consistent with the instructions given by the court, Vincent v. State, 10 Tex. App. 330; and that it conforms to the evidence, Burnett v. Maxey, 9 Port. (Ala.) 410.

The same reasonable intendment, in favor of the validity of a verdict, exists in respect to other judicial proceedings. Rose v. State, 82 Ind. 344; Bennett v. State, 30 Tex. 521.

Findings by Judge.—Where the facts have been submitted to the court without the intervention of the jury, it must be inferred, in the absence of any showing upon the record to the contrary, that the evidence introduced was sufficient to warrant the finding. Eason v. Fisher, 1 Ark. 90.

In an action of assumpsit the jury found a verdict, "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff and fix judgment at $500." It was apparent that this verdict was not formal, and in the form of action which they were trying, they should have assessed the damages. On appeal, the supreme court held that the jury no doubt intended to do this, and that the verdict must be given such construction. Halifax Fire Ins. Co. v. Vanduzor, 49 Ill. 489.

In Smith v. Mohn, 87 Cal. 489, it was objected that the court found only the amount due to the plaintiff upon the contract sued on and not that the sum named was due from the defendant; but as the plaintiff and defendant were the only parties who signed the contract, it must follow as a necessary inference, in view of their findings, that if anything was due the plaintiff it was due from the defendant. It was held, therefore, that this finding was sufficient.

A verdict, "We, the jurors, find for the plaintiff $1,000," is informal, but sufficient, as it designates with reasonable clearness the amount named as the amount of the recovery assessed by them in the plaintiff's favor. Ryors v. Prior, 31 Mo. App. 555.

In Rembaugh v. Phipps, 75 Mo. 422, a verdict, "We, the jury, find a judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of $90," is informal, but it appears clearly enough that it is intended to be a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $90 damages.

Where it is obvious that the jury did not intend to find a general verdict, it is error to treat their finding as such. Dray v. Crich, 3 Oregon 300.

The verdict of a sheriff's jury, under complaint of A B and others, for damages to land by reason of the laying out of a highway, which stated as follows: "We find that the said complainants have sustained damages by means of said laying out of said street or way over or adjoining their land, and the continuance thereof, and we find and allow damages to each of them respectively as follows, to wit, to A B, nothing," should not be set aside as repugnant or against law, but should be accepted as a verdict that he has sustained no damages for which he is entitled to compensation. Chace v. Fall River, 2 Allen (Mass.) 533.

Where distinct parcels of property are levied on under one levy, and all claimed by the same claimant, the whole being tried under one issue, if a verdict is rendered finding certain particular parcels of the property subject to the levy, the legal intentment of such a verdict would be that the balance was not subject. Moses v. Mfg. Co., 68 Ga. 241.

A general verdict for the plaintiff, in an action instituted for the dissolution of a partnership, the appointment of a receiver, and the distribution of the profits, does not authorize a judgment for all the relief asked by the petition, where the only question submitted to the jury was as to the existence of the partnership. Clark v. Gallaher, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 541.

Several Defendants.—In Porter v. Cotney, 3 Ala. 314, two persons were joined as defendants, who pleaded the general issue, and thereupon a verdict was returned as follows: "We, the jury, find the issue in favor of the defendant." It was held that the reasonable intentment was, that "defendant" was unintentionally used for "defendants," and that the verdict as rendered was decisive of the case. See also Steed v. Barnhill, 71 Ala. 157.

Where two defendants were tried on an indictment for a felonious assault with malicious intent, a verdict that each defendant was guilty of an assault without the intent as alleged in the indictment, operated as a conviction of a simple assault. Com. v. McGrath, 115 Mass. 150.

Several Plaintiffs.—In a suit instituted by several plaintiffs, the jury, in the caption of their verdict, mentioned the plaintiffs by name, but in the body used the word "plaintiff." This was held to be immaterial. Hartford County v. Wise, 71 Md. 43.

Reconventional Demands.—The plaintiff sued to recover from the defendant the sum of $320 for building a cotton gin house on the plantation of the defendant. The defense was that the gin house was so defectively constructed that it collapsed a short time after its erection, and that the material used in its construction, which had been furnished by the defendant, was thereby destroyed and rendered valueless. The defendant therefore reconvened and claimed damages to the amount of $500 for the loss of the material. There was a trial by jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant for $175 damages, and from a judgment thereupon rendered, the plaintiff appealed on the ground that the jury responded only to the reconventional demand, and not to the plaintiff's claim. It was held, however, that when the reconventional demand grew out of the plaintiff's cause of action, that a verdict for one party was necessarily a verdict against the other, and hence the judgment was affirmed. Kelly v. Caldwell, 4 La. 40; Delee v. Hatcher, 19 La. Ann. 98.

In Theriot v. Henderson, 6 La. Ann. 222, it was held that in a suit where the defendant sets up a reconventional demand, the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff covers the reconventional demand, and that if the defendant desired a special finding of the jury upon his reconventional demand, he should have asked for it before the verdict was recorded.

Counterclaim.—A finding by the jury for the full amount of the defendant's counterclaim is, by necessary implication, a finding adversely to that extent, on the cause of action stated in the plaintiff's petition. Taylor v. Short, 38 Mo. App. 21; Schaabs v. Woodburne Sarven Wheel Co., 56 Mo. 176; Hoyle v. Farquharson, 80 Mo. 378.

But where it is impossible to tell from a verdict whether the jury passed on the plaintiff's claim, or only on one set up by defendant, a judgment rendered thereon cannot stand. Walston v. Walston (Tex. 1894), 24 S. W. Rep. 951.

the proceedings.¹ When a verdict is found for the plaintiff or defendant, the presumption always arises that the jury have found all the facts necessary to support it;² and where several issues are submitted and a general verdict rendered, the legal inference is, that all the issues have been found in favor of the prevailing party;³ a presumption, however, which may be rebutted by

A verdict which is not explicit in its terms, but the intention of which is apparent from the pleas and evidence, may be construed with reference thereto by the court. Harvey v. Head, 68 Ga. 247.

Where the information, charge, and evidence all related to an offense of aggravated assault, a verdict of guilty is not defective because it does not state the character of the offense. Cooper v. State (Tex. 1893), 20 S. W. Rep. 979. And see Burgess v. State (Tex. 1893), 24 S. W. Rep. 286.

In Bond v. People, 39 Ill. 26, it was declared that a general verdict of guilty, in a criminal case, must be understood to refer to the offense charged in the indictment, and hence it is unnecessary to specify the offense, either by description, reference to the indictment, or otherwise.

The verdict, said the court, in Atlantic, etc., R. Co. v. Purifoy, 95 N. Car. 302, must be taken and interpreted in connection with the issue, and when, by necessary implication, it disposes of the matters in controversy, it will not be set aside, though not so full as might be desirable.

Where a general verdict has been found, it may be presumed that a material question of fact, not specially found but about which there was evidence, was determined in favor of the prevailing party. Allard v. Hamilton, 58 N. H. 416.

Where the general issue and special pleas are pleaded, and a verdict is found for the plaintiff on the general issue, which clearly could not have been so found if any of the special pleas had been supported, the verdict is in effect a verdict for the plaintiff on all pleas. Carroll v. Graham, 8 R. I. 242; Burdick v. Burdick, 15 R. I. 165.

Verdict by Consent.—Upon a verdict by consent, it is to be assumed that everything that could legally have been found for the party in whose favor the verdict was taken, has been so found. Hill v. Pine River Bank, 45 N. H. 300.

General Verdict of Guilty—Several Counts.—Where, on an indictment containing several counts, a general verdict of guilty was rendered, it was held to be equivalent to a verdict of guilty, as the defendant stood charged in the indictment on each and every count thereof. Lovell v. State, 45 Ind. 550.

A general verdict that the defendant is "guilty in manner and form as he stands charged in the indictment," where the indictment contains two counts charging distinct misdemeanors, will authorize a sentence on each count. Eldredge v. State, 37 Ohio St. 191.

Where there are several counts in the information, and a general verdict is rendered, the jury will be presumed to have found the prisoner guilty upon all the counts, and the court will impose a sentence in accordance with the facts proved upon the trial. State v. Tuller, 34 Conn. 280. See also State v. Bean, 21 Mo. 269.

This is not the case, however, where, upon the trial of an indictment containing several counts, the jury is directed to confine its investigation to one count only. Here a general verdict of guilty will be construed as an acquittal on all the counts withdrawn from their consideration. State v. Thompson, 95 N. Car. 596.

Several Counts—Same Offense—Different Forms.—Where a verdict found the showing that on one or more of the issues no evidence was offered.¹ It has been held that if an indictment contains two separate counts for offenses which may be properly joined therein, the one of a higher grade and the other of a lower grade, if of the same nature, connected with and growing out of the same transaction, though the punishment for each grade may be different, and the jury find a general verdict of guilty, the legal intendment of such a verdict is to find the defendant guilty of the highest grade charged.²

In criminal prosecutions, where intent constitutes an element of the offense charged, if the jury, though finding the defendant guilty, negative the question of intent, the verdict cannot operate as a conviction.³ A verdict of guilty upon one of several counts prisoners "guilty as charged in the indictment," the indictment containing three counts, it was declared that this was in effect a finding of guilty on both counts, which charged the same offense in different forms, and that there was no error, therefore, in entering a judgment on this verdict. Moody v. State, 1 W. Va. 337.

Several Counts—Conviction on One.—Where, upon an indictment containing three counts, no presumption arises that the three counts charge the same offense, the defendant may be convicted on one, and acquitted on the others, without rendering the verdict liable to objection on the ground of repugnancy. Com. v. Lowrey, 159 Mass. 62.

Issue as to Gold Coin.—In an action to recover money, the complaint claimed, and the answer denied, that it was payable in gold coin. The verdict found for the plaintiffs generally. It was held that such a verdict included a finding on all the allegations of the complaint material to the plaintiffs' recovery, but that it did not determine the issue whether the money sued for was, or was not, payable in gold coin. Merritt v. Wilcox, 52 Cal. 238.

1. Rhoads v. Metropolis, 36 Ill. App. 123.

Where the plaintiff declares in two counts, and the attention of the jury is directed by the judge to one only, a general verdict found by them, is presumed to be on that count. Jones v. Cooke, 3 Dev. (N. Car.) 112.

2. In Dean v. State, 43 Ga. 218, which was the trial of an indictment containing several counts, upon which a general verdict of guilty was rendered, it was maintained that there was a presumption of law that the jury intended to find the prisoner guilty of the highest offense charged in the indictment. Estes v. State, 55 Ga. 131; Adams v. State, 52 Ga. 565; Yarborough v. State, 86 Ga. 396; State v. Crenshaw, 45 La. Ann. 496; Conkey v. People, 1 Abb. (N. Y.) App. Dec. 418; Harmon v. Com., 12 S. & R. (Pa.) 191; Whart. Cr. L., p. 1037, § 3048. And see State v. Carter (S. Car. 1893), 18 S. E. Rep. 517.

In O'Connor v. State, 9 Fla. 215, the verdict, on an indictment for murder containing only one count, was simply "guilty." It was held that although the jury under this count might have found the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, yet having found him guilty generally, it must be taken as referring to the offense in the indictment.

3. Thus, where the defendant was tried upon an indictment for false pretenses, and the jury found a verdict in the following language: "Guilty of obtaining food and money under false pretenses, but whether there was any intent to defraud, the jury consider there is not sufficient evidence, and therefore strongly recommend the prisoner to mercy." As the latter part of this finding negatived the intent to defraud, without which the former portion could not have been found, it was held that the conviction must be quashed. Reg. v. Gray, 17 Cox Crim. Cas. 299.

State v. Wolfrum (Wis. 1894), 60 N. W. Rep. 799, was an action to recover the forfeiture, prescribed by Laws of 1889, ch. 381, § 1, to be incurred by a dishonest property owner who should "intentionally make a false statement" of his possessions in order to avoid payment of taxes. A verdict was rendered finding the defendant "guilty, not of an indictment, without any finding as to the other counts, is equivalent to a verdict of acquittal on the counts ignored;¹ and where a new trial is had, and the jury are silent as to the counts upon which the finding was made at the former trial, this is an acquittal upon all counts, and operates to discharge the accused.² It is not usually necessary for a verdict in a civil case to name the party against whom it is found, as a verdict in favor of one party is construed to be a verdict against the other.³

k. SURPLUSAGE.—When a jury find not only the issues submitted to them, but embrace in their verdict the determination of matters not involved in the controversy, this redundant matter is denominated surplusage.⁴ Under these circumstances, the maxim criminally, but negligently." This was held to be in effect a verdict of acquittal for the defendant.

Where an indictment contains three counts, two of them charging a conspiracy to obtain goods by false pretenses, and the other for obtaining goods by false pretenses, a verdict finding the defendant guilty of the conspiracy to obtain goods by false pretenses, saying nothing as to the third count, is equivalent to a finding of not guilty as to that count, Thomas v. People, 113 Ill. 531; and when an indictment, in distinct counts, charges rape, and an attempt to commit a rape upon the same person, referring to the same act, a verdict of guilty as to either count amounts to an acquittal of the crime charged in the other. State v. Cofer, 68 Mo. 120.

Upon the trial of an indictment for murder in the first degree, a verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree, without expressly acquitting the defendant of murder in the first degree, is good, and such verdict is equivalent to an acquittal of the higher degree of the crime charged. Morehead v. State, 34 Ohio St. 212.

Likewise, a verdict which declares the defendant guilty of common assault, under an indictment for felonious assault, without a specific statement that he is not guilty of felonious assault, is in effect an acquittal of the higher offense charged. State v. Grimes, 29 Mo. App. 470.

In trespass against several defendants, a general verdict for the plaintiff, without specifying against which of the defendants, will be understood as applying to them all. Caine v. Watson, 1 Morr. (Iowa) 52.

Criminal Cases—Mistake of Defendant.—In the case of People v. Ah Ye, 31 Cal. 451, the defendant was indicted by the name of John Doe, a Chinaman, and when arraigned gave his name as Ah Ye and pleaded not guilty, and upon the trial, the jury rendered a verdict in the following form: "The jury, in the case of the people of the State of California v. Ty Chin, a Chinaman, do find the said Ty Chin, a Chinaman, guilty." Upon appeal, the supreme court held that the only solution of the matter was to hold it to be a finding of the jury that Ah Ye was not guilty of the crime for which he was indicted and tried, and that upon the verdict judgment should have been entered in his favor. See also Territory v. Do, 1 Arizona 507.

Where, upon the trial of an indictment charging Joseph McBride with a certain offense, and the verdict of the jury pronounced James McBride guilty, it was held that such a verdict would not support a judgment against the real defendant. State v. McBride, 19 Mo. 239.

1. The maxim utile per inutile non vitiatur applies as strongly to verdicts as to any other part of judicial proceedings. Thus, a finding of facts by the jury, not necessarily involved, will not vitiate the verdict when insufficient to decide the issue. Tuley v. Mauzey, 4 B. Mon. (Ky.) 5.

Lord Coke laid down the rule that if a jury give a verdict on the whole issue and more, that which is more is surplusage and should not arrest judgment, for utile per inutile non vitiatur. Coke's Litt. 227.

If the jury, in rendering a verdict, decide the whole issue and then add other immaterial things, the verdict is not thereby vitiated. The immaterial things so added may be regarded as surplusage and rejected. State v. Bradley, 6 La. Ann. 556. To the same effect, see Gover v. Turner, 28 Md. 600; Wallis v. Bazet, 34 La. Ann. 131.

In Windham v. Williams, 27 Miss. 313, it is declared that "if more is found by the jury than is necessary, it may be disregarded as surplusage, but it does not vitiate that which is necessary and well found."

Money Obtained by Fraud.—In an action to recover money alleged to have been obtained by fraud, the jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff and assess his damages at $275. The jury, in their verdict, decline to impute improper motives to the defendants in the matter in controversy." It was held that this last sentence did not vitiate the verdict, it being merely surplusage. Dunlop v. Hayden, 29 Ind. 303.

So far as the verdict goes beyond the allegations of the pleadings, it is inoperative and void. U. S. v. One Case Stereoscopic Slides, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 467.

Sanders v. New York El. R. Co. (C. Pl.), 10 N. Y. Supp. 112, was an action instituted to recover for alleged injury to adjacent property resulting from the operation of the elevated railway. The finding of fact, in addition to its reference to smoke, steam, gas, and cinders of which there was ample proof, stated that grease, oil, and water, of which there was no evidence, were allowed to drop from passing trains and fall in front of the plaintiff's premises. It was held, upon an inspection of the whole case, that this apparent error could not have had any influence on the result, and it was also said to be obvious that the judgment was intended to rest upon the findings on the issues actually discussed at the trial. The conclusion was that, under the circumstances, the obnoxious clause might be disregarded as surplusage.

But see the case of Pappenheim v. Metropolitan El. R. Co. (Super. Ct.), 7 N. Y. Supp. 679; this case, however, is not regarded as controlling. There the inadvertent finding was wholly irreconcilable with, and antagonistic to, the judgment, and was, moreover, made as a separate and distinct finding. That decision was put upon the ground that, where two findings of fact are inconsistent, the appellant is entitled, in the support of his exceptions, to have that taken as true which is the more favorable to himself.

In a scire facias, upon a municipal lien for grading and paving a street, the jury, under the instructions of the court, found a verdict for the city for the amount of its claim and also, under instructions, found certain facts, not amounting to a special verdict, by which it appeared that the defendant had a set off, as against the contractor, in excess of the amount of the claim of the city, and on this verdict judgment was rendered generally. It was held that the city could not complain, as the judgment was for its claim in full, and the remainder of the verdict was surplusage. Pittsburg v. McKnight, 91 Pa. St. 202. Compare Pittsburg v. Harrison, 91 Pa. St. 206.

In State v. McCombs, 13 Iowa 426, it is held that the words, "as charged in the indictment" after the words "we, the jury, find the defendant guilty," are mere surplusage, and do not affect the rights of the defendant. Evans v. State, 58 Ark. 47.

In a suit against a surety, where the question was whether or not he had been discharged from liability, a verdict for the plaintiff sufficiently determined the issue. "It is impossible to mistake the meaning of the jury," said the court, "and whatever else is in the verdict is mere surplusage and amounts to nothing." Worthan v. Brewster, 30 Ga. 112.

The appearance of a name appended to a verdict, which is not found in the list of jurors sent up in the record as those who tried the case, does not invalidate the verdict. It is mere surplusage. Burton v. Bondies, 2 Tex. 204.

Issues Not Presented.—In Ashton v. Touhey, 131 Mass. 26, the jury found upon an issue not presented to them by the pleadings. It was held that that part of their verdict might be rejected as surplusage, "for," said the court, "it is not only competent for the court, but it is its duty to put into correct form the finding of the jury."

In the case of North & South St. R. Co. v. Creighton, 86 Ga. 499, the verdict of the jury was in these words: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff $800, less the amount of freight, with interest." It was held that the words "less the amount of freight" might be disregarded as surplusage, as there was no "freight" involved in the issue on trial.

Where in an action on a promissory note, the issues for the jury were as to presentation, demand, refusal to pay, and notice, and the jury returned a verdict finding for the plaintiff; assessing his damages at a certain sum, it was held that so much of the verdict as related to the assessment of damages, was surplusage which should have been rejected and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the note, which was a different and larger amount than that assessed by the jury as damages. Pierce v. Schaden, 62 Cal. 283.

"In Gold Coin."—Where there was no issue as to whether the plaintiff's demand was payable in gold coin, a verdict finding for the plaintiff in gold coin is improper, but the words "gold coin" may be treated as surplusage and disregarded in the entry of the verdict and the judgment. Marquard v. Wheeler, 52 Cal. 445.

To the same effect, see Watson v. San Francisco, etc., R. Co., 50 Cal. 523, and Chamberlin v. Vance, 51 Cal. 85.

But where a note is by its terms payable "in gold coin," a verdict finding for the plaintiff the amount of the note in gold coin is proper. Irvin v. Garner, 50 Tex. 48.

Extraneous Fact—Void Pro Tanto.—A verdict which goes beyond the issues raised by the pleadings and passes upon an extraneous fact not embraced therein, is pro tanto void, and the surplus matter may be disregarded in entering the judgment. Marquard v. Wheeler, 52 Cal. 445.

Stating Legal Consequence of Judgment.—Where a purchaser of goods left them with the vendor, and afterwards recovered a verdict for their value, the force of the verdict is not destroyed by an additional direction that they be delivered to the defendant. This merely states the legal consequence of the judgment, and may be rejected as surplusage. Rawson v. McElvaine, 49 Mich. 194.

Conditional Set-off.—Where the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $51.60, subject to an offset of $26.80 if the said offset had not already been paid, and if it had been paid then for $51.60 without offset, it is proper to render a explain their reasons for so finding,¹ or a mere expression of opinion at the time of the delivery of the verdict,² is surplusage, which does not in the least impair the effect of the really substantial portion remaining after the rejection of that which is irrelevant. It has also been maintained that where the jury have erroneously allowed interest on an amount of damages assessed, a resort to the same practice will enable the court to sustain the verdict, and pronounce judgment for the amount indicated, ignoring the finding for interest.³ Again, if the jury transcend the limits of their jurisdiction by a direction as to the payment of costs, the part relating to costs is surplusage, void, and of no effect.⁴ The rule in respect to the rejection of surplusage does not judgment for $51.60 and reject the balance as surplusage. Hawkins v. House, 65 N. Car. 614.

The title of a case prefixed by the jury to their verdict may, it seems, be regarded as surplusage if it is erroneous. In People v. Ah Kim, 34 Cal. 189, the defendant was arraigned under the name of Ah Keet. Upon being arraigned he stated his name to be Ah Kim; which name was substituted and the further proceedings were had in the substituted name. The jury, however, in rendering their verdict, prefixed the original title to the case, "People v. Ah Keet" and said: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment." It was held that the mistake of the jury, in prefixing the original title of the case to their verdict, was of no consequence, as the judgment was properly entitled and pronounced against the defendant in his proper name. The case of Ah Kim was the one tried and submitted to them and there was no necessity for prefixing a title to the verdict, and the error was obviated by regarding such title as surplusage.

Inaccuracy from Surplusage.—If the finding of a jury, as affirmed and recorded, does not state with technical accuracy their finding upon the real issues tried, and the court can see how it should be corrected, it will reject what is surplusage and make it conform to the real issues tried. Ashton v. Touhey, 131 Mass. 26.

Fixing Punishment.—Where, upon the trial of an indictment for larceny, the jury declared the defendant guilty, and proceeded to fix his punishment, it was held that that part of the verdict which alluded to the punishment might be considered as surplusage and rejected, and the sentence construed as the act of the court. Cropper v. U. S., 1 Morr. (Iowa) 259. See also, as to the rejection of surplusage, Longacre v. State, 2 How. (Miss.) 637; Massey v. Duren, 7 S. Car. 310; Wells v. Garland, 2 Va. Cas. 471.

1. The supreme court of Maryland, in upholding a verdict where the jury had departed from the proper form by assigning reasons for their finding, said: "It is true the verdict is not in the usual form, the jury having assigned a reason upon which they based it, but as we have said, we do not regard this departure from the usual form as material. Where the intention of the jury is manifest, the court will disregard matters of form." Gover v. Turner, 28 Md. 600; Browne v. Browne, 22 Md. 115. See also Gregory v. Frothingham, 1 Nev. 253.

2. An expression of opinion by the jury at the time of the delivery of their verdict, forming no part of their verdict, will not vitiate it. Such remarks are mere surplusage and cannot affect the plain finding of the verdict on the issue joined. The maxim utile per inutile non vitiatur is applicable. Wallis v. Bazet, 34 La. Ann. 131.

"For the Defendants, They to Pay Costs."—In the case of State v. Knight, 46 Mo. 83, the jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the defendants, they to pay the costs of the suit." Regarding this verdict, the appellate court said: "The jury found for the defendants; the verdict was good apply where the redundant findings are substantially variant from those which are responsive to the issues,¹ or where the surplus clearly shows that the jury reasoned incorrectly, or that they came to their conclusion from false premises.²

(1) Recommendation to Mercy.—It not infrequently happens that a jury, in rendering a verdict of guilty upon the trial of an indictment for a capital offense, moved by compassion, or impressed with the belief that circumstances exist palliating the atrocity of the crime committed, add to their verdict a recommendation of the prisoner to the mercy of the court. In the absence of a statute prescribing the effect of a verdict of "guilty with mitigating circumstances,"³ it has generally been held that such invocation of judicial clemency is merely an addition to, and not and complete; the matter of costs was not in issue, and was not submitted to them. That part of their verdict, therefore, was merely void, and should have been disregarded as surplusage."

"Each Party to Pay His Own Costs."—In an action for a trespass upon real estate, and for taking and removing a fence therefrom, to which was pleaded a general denial and that the locus in quo was owned in fee by the defendant, the jury found a verdict for the defendant that he was not guilty of the trespass complained of, and added that they "established the line as made by A B & C, and that each party pay his own costs of suit." This verdict was properly treated as a mere general verdict for the defendant, the remainder being disregarded. Parkinson v. McQuaid, 54 Wis. 473.

"Dividing Costs."—In Hancock v. Buckley, 18 Mo. App. 459, the verdict of the jury was for the plaintiff, but dividing the costs between the parties. It was held that this latter part of the verdict, being wholly outside of the issues submitted to the jury, should be treated by the court as surplusage.

Where the jury do not find for either party, their verdict consisting solely of a direction as to costs, it was held to be void. Ford v. Taggart, 4 Tex. 492; Hall v. York, 16 Tex. 18.

Awarding Costs—Correction.—Where the jury go out of their province and award costs, it seems that they may be allowed to correct their verdict in that regard. Foot v. Woodworth (Vt. 1894), 28 Atl. Rep. 1034.

1. Washington, J., in Patterson v. U. S., 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 221.

Moses, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court in Massey v. Duren, 7 S.

Car. 310, said: "In the case at the bar, the verdict, without the words which 'cumber' it, was certain as to the intention of the jury, and valid as their expression on the very issues on which they were to pass. To set it aside, because of additional words, which do not really qualify the judgment of the jury on the material issues involved, and thus permit a second trial, would be without any sufficient cause."

In Charleston v. Weikman, 2 Spears (S. Car.) 371, Wardlaw, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It is only where a verdict, before certain and valid, . . . has been cumbered by the addition of useless matter, not qualifying the previous meaning, that the addition can be rejected as surplusage." See also Pappenheim v. Metropolitan El. R. Co. (Super. Ct.), 7 N. Y. Supp. 679.

2. Gregory v. Frothingham, 1 Nev. 253.

3. In Florida, there is a statute by virtue of which a majority of the jury, when rendering a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree, may agree upon a recommendation of the prisoner to the mercy of the court, which will change the penalty, which without such recommendation is death, to imprisonment for life. Hicks v. State, 25 Fla. 535.

In Georgia, the rule seems to be, that on the trial of an indictment for crimes punishable with death, if the jury expressly recommend, upon the rendition of a verdict of guilty, that the penalty shall be commuted to imprisonment for life, it is the duty of the court to pronounce judgment in conformity with this recommendation. Stallings v. State, 47 Ga. 572; Johnson v. State, 48 Ga. 116; West v. State, 49

a qualification of, the verdict, which the court is at perfect liberty to reject or disregard as surplusage.¹

1. AMENDMENT OF VERDICT—(1) By the Jury.—Where defects of substance or of form appear in the verdict upon its rendition, the jury may be allowed to alter or correct it at their own request, or the court may require the proper amendments to be made.² To this effect the court may point out the errors which the verdict contains and make such explanations as it may deem

State*, 62 Miss. 450; State v. Vasquez, 16 Nev. 42; State v. Bennett (S. Car. 1894), 18 S. E. Rep. 886. And see Lewis v. State, 3 Head (Tenn.) 127.

Technically and strictly, the jury have nothing to do with the question of punishment, but only with the question of guilt, and they go outside the strict boundaries of their duty when they attempt to influence the term of the punishment. Where the verdict as returned was one finding the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, and with a recommendation that his punishment should be the least amount allowed by law, the court declined to receive the verdict in that form and handed them one without these words, which was duly signed and recorded. It was held that no error had been committed affecting the substantial rights of the defendant. State v. Potter, 15 Kan. 303.

To the same effect, it is declared, in State v. Vasquez, 16 Nev. 42, to be the sole duty of the jury to declare by their verdict whether the defendant is guilty or not guilty, and that the trial court should disregard the request of the jury for an instruction as to their rights and duties in recommending the defendant to the mercy of the court.

In Penn v. State, 62 Miss. 450, the jury trying an indictment for murder, returned a verdict in these words: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment, and plead the mercy of the court." The jury was polled, each juror was asked: "Is this your verdict?" and he responded: "It is." The verdict was held to be good and the words, "plead the mercy of the court," mere surplusage.

And in State v. Bradley, 6 La. Ann. 556, the jury found the prisoner guilty, but recommended him to the clemency of the court, on the ground that he was not prepared for trial, adding, however, that they did not mean to censure the court. It was held that it was the duty of the trial judge to disregard all this as surplusage, as it was not responsive to the issue, and altogether beyond the jurisdiction of the jury. See also State v. O'Brien, 22 La. Ann. 27, where, to a verdict of guilty of murder, the jury added a recommendation of the prisoner to the mercy of the court, it was held that this addition was not a qualification of the verdict, but might be rejected as surplusage.

In People v. Lee, 17 Cal. 76, the defendant was found guilty of murder in the first degree, but recommended to the mercy of the court. The verdict was recorded without the recommendation, as that was no part of the verdict, being addressed solely to the court. Roby v. State, 61 Ga. 45.

The rule formerly prevailed in Tennessee, by which the opinion of the jury finding mitigating circumstances was made obligatory upon the court. In Lewis v. State, 3 Head (Tenn.) 127, a provision of a more recent enactment is cited, leaving the question of mitigating circumstances in the sound discretion of the court, upon an unbiased and discriminating survey of the whole case, to give effect to the recommendation or to refuse to do so as the ends of public justice may seem to dictate. "Defendant" to "Plaintiff."—Where the verdict was in favor of the defendant for a certain sum, which was the sum sued for by the plaintiff, and this evident mistake was immediately discovered and the attention of the jury called to it, it was proper for them to retire and amend the verdict by making it in favor of the plaintiff. Blalock v. Waldrup, 84 Ga. 145.

But where the verdict is rendered for one party in obedience to the instructions of the judge, it cannot be amended on motion so as to transform it into a verdict for the other party. Brush v. Kohn, 9 Bosw. (N. Y.) 589.

"Nominal" to "Substantial" Damages.—In an action against a mill owner, to recover damages caused by his maintaining his dam at too great a height, whereby the water was set back, the jury rendered a verdict with nominal damages for the plaintiff, and directed that the defendant should reduce his dam to a certain level. The latter portion of the verdict, in reference to the reduction of the dam, was ordered to be erased by the judge, but several jurors dissented from the verdict thus amended, whereupon the jury were directed to retire for further deliberation. Consequently, the jury rendered a verdict with substantial damages for the plaintiff. It was held that the defendant had no ground for exception. Brown v. Dean, 123 Mass. 255.

Formal Defects.—Truebody v. Jacobson, 2 Cal. 269; People v. Jenkins, 56 Cal. 7; Cook v. State, 26 Ga. 593; Cook v. Scott, 6 Ill. 333; M'Gregg v. State, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 101; State v. Waterman, 1 Nev. 543.

Thus, in Cook v. Scott, 6 Ill. 333, it was observed that the court may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, permit the verdict of the jury to be put into proper form before they are discharged.

On Motion of Prosecuting Attorney.—Where the verdict against the defendant in an indictment was informal, the jury were allowed to amend it upon motion of the prosecuting attorney, with the consent of, and in the presence of, the court, so as to give it the form of a general verdict of guilty. M'Gregg v. State, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 101.

At Request of Jury.—Hamilton v. Barton, 20 Iowa 505; Broussard v. Nolan, 4 La. Ann. 55; Blackley v. Sheldon, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 32; Sledd v. Com., 19

Gratt. (Va.) 822. See also Tarlton v. Briscoe, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 67.

In the case of Sledd v. Com., 19 Gratt. (Va.) 813, upon the rendition of the verdict, the defendant, for certain reasons then expressed, moved the court to set aside the verdict. One of the jurors, after hearing the discussion upon the motion to set aside, said that he desired to amend the verdict. Thereupon the court inquired of the jury whether they desired to amend their verdict and each of the jurors answered that he did. The jury were then allowed to amend their verdict, which proceeding was subsequently approved by the supreme court.

In Blackley v. Sheldon, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 32, the court said: "The law is well settled, that before a verdict is recorded the jury may vary from the first offer of their verdict, and the verdict which is recorded shall stand; and there are many cases in the books, of a jury changing their verdict immediately after they have pronounced it in open court."

By Direction of Court.—Truebody v. Jacobson, 2 Cal. 269; Cook v. State, 26 Ga. 593; State v. Waterman, 1 Nev. 543; Heller v. State, 23 Ohio St. 582; Herbst Importing Co. v. Burnham, 81 Wis. 408.

It is the duty of the court to look after the form and substance of the verdict so as to prevent a doubtful or insufficient finding from passing through the records of the court; for that purpose the court can, at any time while the jury are before it and under its control, see that it is amended in form so as to meet the requirements of the law. People v. Jenkins, 56 Cal. 4.

Specification as to Count.—When a verdict defective in form is brought in by a jury, it is not error for the court to direct the jury to retire again to say under which count they find the prisoner guilty. People v. Graves, 5 Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 134.

Specification as to Degree of Crime.—On the trial of several defendants jointly indicted for murder, the jury came in with the verdict "Guilty in the manner and form as they stand indicted." The court sent them back with instructions to find the degree. They returned a verdict in proper form and assented to it when polled. This was held not to be error. Nicely's Appeal (Pa. 1889), 18 Atl. Rep. 737.

Correction of Form.—When a jury brought into court a verdict in eject-ment in the plaintiff's favor generally, and for damages, and before the verdict was entered in the record, the court charged them to bring in a verdict in the form required by law, and directed that a proper form be prepared, which being done, the jury retired and brought in their verdict in legal form, signed by their foreman, upon which judgment is entered, there is no fault in the proceedings. The jury may vary or amend a verdict before their discharge and before it is recorded, and the form of verdict prepared under direction of the court agreed to by the jury is sufficient. Coffee v. Groover, 20 Fla. 64.

Where the defendant was indicted for the larceny of a leather trunk, the jury returned a verdict of "guilty of the larceny of a fifty dollar note," as evidence to the effect that the trunk contained a fifty dollar note when stolen had been introduced. The court informed the jury that the prisoner was not indicted for stealing the bill but the trunk, whereupon the jury retired and brought in a verdict of guilty of the larceny of the trunk as charged in bill of indictment. It was held that, as the verdict as first rendered was not received or recorded, and the jury had not been discharged, it was admissible for them to correct the inadvertence so as to make the verdict responsive to the indictment. State v. Bishop, 73 N. Car. 44.

Re-reading Instructions to Jury.—After the cause had been argued and submitted, and the jury had retired to consider their verdict, they returned into court, and, by their foreman, handed to the court an informal verdict, which was entered upon the minutes of the court. The court, however, seeing that the jury had mistaken an instruction which had been given to them, as to the form of their verdict, again read to them the instruction and directed them to retire and reconsider their verdict. They did so, and soon after returned into court with a verdict, legal in form, which was read and recorded, and the jury, upon being polled, assented to it, and were discharged. People v. Jenkins, 56 Cal. 4.

Explanation of Legal Terms.—If a jury have, through a misconception of the meaning of legal terms, returned a verdict the reverse of which they intended, and such verdict has been affirmed, the papers may be again delivered to the jury by the presiding judge before they have dispersed or left their seats, and the judge may explain to them the meaning of those terms and the verdict may be corrected accordingly. Ward v. Bailey, 23 Me. 316.

2. In Burk v. Com., 5 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 675, it was held that before a verdict is received by the court and recorded, the judge has a right to call in a witness who has been examined and cause his reexamination upon the point on which the jury are not satisfied, or on which they are about to predicate an erroneous verdict.

(a) Period Within Which the Jury May Amend.—It seems to be generally regarded as the correct rule that no amendments or alterations can be made by the jury after the verdict has been recorded and the jury have been discharged.¹

Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 134; Blackley v. Sheldon, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 32; Heller v. State, 23 Ohio St. 582; Beates v. Retallick, 23 Pa. St. 288; Sanders v. Bagwell, 37 S. Car. 145; Alston v. State, 41 Tex. 39; Trent v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. App. 251.

In a criminal case, however, it has been held that the court has no right to send the jury back to their consultation room, if the verdict in effect acquits the prisoner. Where, upon the trial of an indictment for felony and horse stealing, the jury returned, for their verdict, that the prisoner was not guilty of the felony and horse stealing, "but guilty of a trespass," the court directed them to reconsider their verdict, and say "guilty or not guilty, and no more." The jury retired and returned a verdict of "guilty." On appeal, the supreme court ordered the verdict first rendered to be recovered and the defendant discharged. State v. Arrington, 3 Murph. (N. Car.) 571.

Calculation of Interest.—It is no error, after a jury have come into court and delivered their verdict, the form of which showed they intended to add interest thereto, for the court to send them back to their room to calculate the interest. Mark v. Hudson River Bridge Co., 56 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 109.

In Strobridge Lithographing Co. v. Randall, 78 Mich. 195, the foreman of the jury announced to the court that the jury found for the plaintiff in a given sum. At the request of the plaintiff's counsel the court inquired if the verdict included interest, and one of the jurors answered that it did, and stated the amount of the principal. The court felt satisfied, notwithstanding the statement of the juror, that the verdict was not intended to include interest, and sent the jury out again to consider the matter. This was held not to be an improper mode of procedure.

Completion of Verdict.—In an action against B, C, and D, the jury having returned a verdict "we find for the plaintiff the sum of $3,110.74 against B," the circuit judge recommitted the case to the jury, charging them to find the complete verdict. It was held that there was no error in the action of the circuit judge. State v. Baldwin, 14 S. Car. 135.

Where trespass to try title was brought for three acres of land, and the jury found for the plaintiff as to one acre, for the defendant as to a second, but as to the third, said they were not agreed, and on being sent back to consider as to the third acre, returned a verdict for the plaintiff for all three without noticing the first verdict, judgment was given for the plaintiff. Dyer, 204b, 205a; Bacon's Abr., "Verdict" (H.).

In 2 Hale 299, it is stated that "if the jurors by mistake or partiality, give their verdict in court, yet they may rectify it before it is recorded, or by advice of the court go together again and consider better of it, and alter what they have delivered. But if the verdict is recorded they cannot retract nor alter it."

Co. Litt. 227 b says: "After the verdict is recorded the jury cannot vary from it, but before it be recorded they may vary from the first offer of their verdict, and that verdict which is recorded shall stand."

Where the jury, after returning a verdict of guilty, have been dismissed, there is no authority for reimpanelling them and allowing them, on further instructions, to render a new verdict, though the only change is in recommending the defendants to mercy, and the judgment pronounced on such verdict will be set aside. State v. Dawkins, 32 S. Car. 17.

The rule, however, as stated in the text, seems to have been slightly trenched upon in the case of Prussel v. Knowles, 4 How. (Miss.) 90, which was an action of trespass against several defendants, in which the jury rendered a verdict finding all of the defendants guilty, all but one of the jurors immediately leaving the court room. The juror who yet remained having his attention called to the matter, stated that it had not been the design of the jury to find all the defendants guilty, as by the terms of the verdict had been done. The other members of the panel were brought before the court, and they readily gave the same explanation. The court then allowed the jury to amend their verdict in conformity with their intent. This amendment seems to have been allowed on the ground that there is a rule of law permitting jurors to explain their verdict in order to show what they really intended to find.

Discharge of Jury.—It is not in all cases the mere entry of the verdict on the record which finally terminates the connection of the jury with the cause and supersedes their power to amend; or, as it is expressed by Folger, J., in Warner v. New York Cent. R. Co., 52 N. Y. 437; 11 Am. Rep. 724, "the fact that the verdict has been announced, and has been as announced entered in the minutes of the clerk, is not that recording which makes the announcement and the clerical act the fixed and unalterable verdict of the jury. The true rule is laid down in the opinion in Walters v. Junkins, 16 S. & R. (Pa.) 414;

16 Am. Dec. 585, that after the verdict has been received and entered upon the minutes, and the jury has been dismissed, they have not the power to reassemble and alter their verdict." And see Sergeant v. State, 11 Ohio 472; State v. Dawkins, 32 S. Car. 17.

In Ward v. Bailey, 23 Me. 316, the jury had rendered a verdict, and it had been received and entered on the docket, but the jury had not separated or left their seats. On questioning the foreman, it appeared that the jury had misconceived the meaning of the terms used in their verdict; whereupon, they were permitted to correct the mistake, and the minutes of the clerk were altered accordingly. On review, this was held to be no error.

In Walters v. Junkins, 16 S. & R. (Pa.) 414; 16 Am. Dec. 585, referred to above, the jury returned the verdict: "We find for the plaintiff six cents damages." The court then asked them if they found the defendant to pay all costs or only the legal costs. The foreman replied "six cents damages and six cents costs;" and this verdict was recorded. The next cause on the docket was immediately taken up, though the jury, or most of it, which had rendered the verdict just set forth, still remained in the box. On an interview between the foreman and the plaintiff's attorney, it was intimated that the jury had intended their verdict to be entered with full costs against the defendant. This being made known to the court, the jury were instructed to retire and certify what was their verdict, and how they had agreed it should be. They did so, and in a few minutes returned, and said their finding had been six cents damages and full costs; whereupon the counsel for the defendant objected to the entry being altered, but the court allowed the minutes to be corrected according to the subsequent finding of the jury. The jury had not been formally told they were discharged, although the court had gone a few minutes in another cause. The judgment pronounced on this verdict was reversed. Rogers, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The law allows the jury all reasonable opportunity before their verdict is put on record, and they are discharged, to discover and declare the truth according to the judgment. The court may also, of their own accord, send the jury back to reconsider their verdict if it appears to be a mistaken

(2) By the Court.—The court not only has the power, but it is its duty, to amend or modify a verdict, so as to put it in proper legal form, or to make it express the actual intent of the jury,¹

one, and before it is received and recorded." After citing some adjudications on the subject, the learned judge concluded: "Although these cases do not expressly determine the point, the inference is irresistible that where the verdict is received and recorded and the jury dismissed, as in this case, they have not the power to alter their verdict."

In Patrick Red Sandstone Co. v. Skoman, 1 Colo. App. 323, the jury, having found the verdict for a larger amount than that claimed by the plaintiff, were allowed, after having been discharged, to amend their finding by reducing it to the amount claimed by the plaintiff. This being assigned an error on appeal, the supreme court held that inasmuch as the plaintiff could have reduced the amount of recovery to the amount claimed by remittitur, the error of allowing the jury to amend after their discharge, if error it was, could not have prejudiced the defendant, and hence, the appellate court declined to consider the objection.

Dispersion of Jury by Consent of Parties.—The dispersion of the jury by consent of the parties to the cause, does not deprive the jury of their right of amendment. In Maclin v. Bloom, 54 Miss. 368, it was assigned for error that no legal verdict was rendered by reason of the fact that the jury having been given leave, by consent of parties, to return their verdict to the clerk during the recess of the court, brought in to the clerk a verdict for the plaintiff without specifying any amount, and were thereupon suffered by the clerk to separate. Next morning, the defect having been discovered, they were re-assembled and sent back to their consultation room from which they soon returned with a proper verdict. This was held to be no error. See also Jones v. Smith, 64 Ga. 711.

New Hampshire.—The doctrine as laid down in Dearborn v. Newhall, 63 N. H. 301, is in direct conflict with the statement in the text as to the time within which the jury may be allowed to amend. Doe, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court in this case, said: "In some jurisdictions a recorded verdict cannot be amended by the jury after their separation; but in this state a different practice prevails. The error in this case could be corrected, whether the verdict had, or had not been recorded, and whether the jury had, or had not separated."

"When the intention of the jury is manifest," said Lord Mansfield, in provided this does not necessitate a substantial alteration of the facts found.¹

Hawks v. Crofton, 2 Burr. 698, "the court will set right matters of form."

Amount.—Where the jury returns a verdict assessing the damages at a certain amount "with interest," the addition of words by the court, naming the amount, including interest, cannot be complained of. Clapp v. Martin, 33 Ill. App. 438.

Assumpsit.—Where, in assumpsit, the verdict of the jury was returned as follows: "We, the jurors, find for the plaintiff $450," which was, by the court's direction and by the notes and in the presence of the jury, put in form so as to read: "We, the jurors, find for the plaintiff and assess the damages at $450," it was held that there was no error in putting the verdict in form. Osgood v. McConnell, 32 Ill. 74. And see Lincoln v. Iron Co., 103 U. S. 412.

Misnomer.—In an action against L. L. R., on a note signed by him as president of L. L. R. I. and S. Co., a description of the defendant in the verdict as L. L. R. I. and S. Co., is a formal error which the court may amend. Fay v. Richmond, 18 Mo. App. 355.

In Readfield v. Shaver, 50 Me. 36; 79 Am. Dec. 592, the clerk, in preparing a blank verdict for the jury, made a mistake in the name of one of the parties, which error escaped the notice of the jury. Upon the return of the verdict it was amended by the court, so as to conform to the writ and other papers in the case, the jury affirming the verdict as amended. This was held to be the proper course, under the circumstances, sustained by reason and authority.

Intention—How Ascertained.—A verdict defective in form may be reformed by the court when the intention of the jury can be ascertained from data given in the verdict, or referred to in the pleadings; but the court cannot supply an omission to name the amount of the finding by reference to evidence outside the record. Fromme v. Jones, 13 Iowa 474; Edwards v. McCaddom, 20 Iowa 520. And see Peabody v. Hewett, 52 Me. 34; 83 Am. Dec. 486; Burhans v. Tibbits, 7 How Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 21.

People*, 24 N. Y. 100; Humphreys v. Woodstown, 48 N. J. L. 588; Wallace v. Hilliard, 7 Wis. 627; Allen v. State, 85 Wis. 359.

In Gordon v. Higley, Morr. (Iowa) 20, it was said that the court might direct a change in the language of a jury, so as to make their verdict correspond to the usual forms, provided such change did not alter the evident meaning of the verdict. "And," observed the court, "this may be done without the consent of the jury, or even should they positively object, and is, therefore, perfectly proper after their separation."

Replevin.—Thus, it has been held in Wisconsin that a verdict in replevin upon the general issue and plea of property, which simply finds a defendant not guilty, and fails to find the value of the property or title, is substantially defective and, therefore, is not amendable. Wallace v. Hilliard, 7 Wis. 627.

In Poulson v. Collier, 18 Mo. App. 583, which was an action on a promissory note, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, "for the amount of the note sued on" without in terms specifying any sum. This was regarded as a substantial defect, which was beyond the power of the court to repair; and their amendment of the verdict by inserting the amount was denounced as an invasion of the province of the jury. Though it is pretty generally conceded that the authority of the court to amend is confined to matters of form, the decisions on the subject are not uniform, on account of the diversity of opinion as to what constitutes matter of form and what of substance. In the case of Poulson v. Collier, though the action was upon a promissory note, the verdict was held to be fatally defective because of the omission to name the amount; and to this effect, see also Gaither v. Wilmer, 71 Md. 361. On the other hand, it has been held that where the plaintiff is entitled to recover a sum certain, known and conceded, if entitled to recover anything, the court may amend a verdict in his favor by inserting such amount, where the jury have failed to do so. Hodgkins v. Mead, 119 N. Y. 166; Schweitzer v. Connor, 57 Wis. 177. See also Clark v. Lude, 63 Hun (N. Y.) 366.

In an action on a note, where the only issue was upon its execution, a verdict that the jury "find for the plaintiff the amount of the note and interest," is sufficient to justify the court in ordering the clerk to assess the amount in rendering judgment therefore, as the form of the verdict sufficiently expresses the intention of the jury. McGregor v. Armill, 2 Iowa 30.

In an action of debt against a clergyman, for the recovery of the statutory penalty prescribed for marrying a minor, the jury returned a verdict against the defendant, declaring him "guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted." The jury were returned to their room for further deliberation, and returned with a proper verdict, which was upheld by the supreme court. Beates v. Retallick, 23 Pa. St. 288.

Amending the Record—Matters of Substance.—A distinction has been made between the amendment of the verdict itself and the record of the verdict. This distinction is recognized by Mr. Bishop, in the first volume of his Criminal Procedure, section 1013, where it is observed that though the functions of the judge and jury are distinct, and the former can have no power to alter the substance of anything which the latter, acting within their proper sphere, have found, yet the record of the verdict is distinguishable from the thing recorded, and may be amended under the same rules and with the same effect as any other part of the record. In this regard, see Parks v. Turner, 12 How. (U. S.) 39; Crary v. Carradine, 4 Ark. 216; Peabody v. Hewett, 52 Me. 34; 83 Am. Dec. 486; Clark v. Lamb, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 415; 19 Am. Dec. 332; Crich v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co., 45 Minn. 444; Frederick v. Circuit Judge, 52 Mich. 529; Acton v. Dooley, 16 Mo. App. 448; Burhans v. Tibbits, 7 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 21; Hodg- kins v. Mead, 119 N. Y. 166; Rew v. Barker, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 408; 24 Am. Dec. 515; Clark v. Lude, 63 Hun (N. Y.) 363; Fischer v. Reilly (Com. Pl.), 3 N. Y. Supp. 757; Lippe v. Metropolitan El. R. Co. (Super Ct.), 10 N. Y. Supp. 519; Osborne v. Morris, 21 Oregon 367; Keen v. Hopkins, 48 Pa. St. 445.

Misentry of Verdict.—Where it is evident that a verdict has been entered on the record different from that rendered by the jury, it may be corrected by the court. Atty Gen'l v. White, Bunb. 283; Cogan v. Ebdon, 1 Burr. 383; Com. v. Lang, 10 Gray (Mass.) 11; Jackson v. Dickenson, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 309; 8 Am. Dec. 236; Dalrymple v. Williams, 63 N. Y. 361; 20 Am. Rep. 544; Den v. Norman, 2 Dev. (N. Car.) 496; Grim v. Reinbold, 2 Pa. Dist. Ct. Rep. 612. Compare Parker v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 93 Mich. 607.

Entering Verdict on one of Several Counts.—The rule seems to be well established that a general verdict of a jury may be restricted so as to apply to one count, where, by the minutes of the judge, it appears that the evidence in the case applies to that count only. Ferguson v. Mahon, 11 Ad. & El. 179; Williams v. Strahan, 1 B. & P. 309; Eddowes v. Hopkins, 1 Doug. 376; Matheson v. Grant, 2 How. (U. S.) 281; Barnard v. Whiting, 7 Mass. 358; Baker v. Sanderson, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 348; Den v. Norman, 2 Dev. (N. Car.) 496; Cooper v. Bissell, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 319; Brush v. Kohn, 9 Bosw. (N. Y.) 593; Sayre v. Jewett, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 135; Norris v. Durham, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 151; Paul v. Harden, 9 S. & R. (Pa.) 23.

1. When a verdict is returned defective in form, the court may correct it, with or without the consent of the jury. Ewing v. Sandford, 21 Ala. 157; St. Clair v. Caldwell, 72 Ala. 527; Hobart v. Haggett, 12 Me. 67; 28 Am. Dec. 159.

In Hay v. Ousterout, 3 Ohio 384, the court amended the verdict in conformity with the intention of the jury, as manifested by its terms, without any consultation with the jury themselves. This was held not to be improper.

At Request of Jury.—Where the jury come into open court and request the judge to correct a clerical mistake in it has even been held that, though the jury object, the judicial power of amendment is not affected.¹

(b) From What Amended.—In amending the verdict, the court may be assisted by the record of the proceedings,² by explanations or affidavits of the jurors,³ by the judge's notes,⁴ and any other clear and satisfactory evidence.⁵

(c) Period Within Which the Court May Amend.—Without distinguishing between the amendment of the verdict itself, and the amendment of the verdict after it has been merged in the record,⁶ it may be stated generally that no fixed time is prescribed within which amendments must be made by the court, a reasonable promptitude being all that is required.⁷ The prevailing rule the form of a verdict submitted to them, and thereafter agree upon and return such corrected verdict as their finding, no error can be predicated thereon. Marine Sav. Bank v. Young, 5 Wash. 394.

7. Harrison v. Rex, 1 B. & Ald. 161;

Clark v. Lamb, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 415; 19 Am. Dec. 332.

In giving the opinion of the court in Matheson v. Grant, 2 How. (U. S.) 281, Story, J., said: "There is no time absolutely fixed within which the amendment should be moved. All that the court requires is that it should be done within a reasonable time and when no such change of circumstances shall have occurred as to render it inconvenient or inexpedient. Nothing is more common than motions to amend the record after a writ of error has been brought; nay after a writ of error has been argued in the court above, and sometimes even after judgment in a court of error, pending its session."

Amendment after Recordation.—Crary v. Carradine, 4 Ark. 216; Gordon v. Higley, Morr. (Iowa) 19; Ashton v. Touhey, 131 Mass. 26; Osborne v. Morris, 21 Oregon 367; Ivens's Appeal, 33 Pa. St. 237; Foster v. Caldwell, 18 Vt. 176. Compare Dana v. Farrington, 4 Minn. 433.

Amendment at Subsequent Term.—Where a verdict was amended before final judgment, although at a subsequent term of the court, it was held not to be error. Cane v. Watson, Morr. (Iowa) 70; Barnard v. Whiting, 7 Mass. 358.

After Judgment.—A verdict may be amended after judgment has been rendered. Lippe v. Metropolitan El. R. Co. (Super. Ct.), 10 N. Y. Supp. 519; Barclay v. Kerr, 110 Pa. St. 130.

After Error Brought.—A verdict may be amended after error brought and joinder in error. Short v. Coffin, 5 Burr. 2730; Doe v. Perkins, 3 T. R. 749; Acton v. Dooley, 16 Mo. App. 449; Clark v. Lamb, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 415; 19 Am. Dec. 332; Rew v. Barker, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 408; 24 Am. Dec. 515.

seems to be that the power of amendment may be exercised at any time, in the discretion of the court, so long as the substantial rights of the parties are not affected.¹

m. RECORDATION OF VERDICT.—Upon the rendition of a verdict by a jury, it is entered upon the minutes of the court, or, in less technical phraseology, "recorded."² This proceeding finally terminates the connection of the jury with the cause.³ Until the verdict is recorded, it lies in the power of the jury to alter, amend, or correct their finding,⁴ but, by entry upon the minutes, the verdict becomes a fixed legal fact, and may not afterwards be altered by them in form or substance.⁵ It is the duty of the clerk, who is the legally constituted scribe of the court, to enter the verdict upon the minutes when rendered, but in the absence of the clerk, the judge may act in this capacity.⁶

Misnomer.—In Maus v. Maus, 5 Watts (Pa.) 319, it was said: "It is never too late to amend the record merely for the purpose of correcting a misnomer by the clerk."

1. Church v. Holcomb, 45 Mich. 40; Frederick v. Circuit Judge, 52 Mich. 529; Brooks v. Stephens, 100 N. Car. 297; Cohn v. Scheuer, 115 Pa. St. 178; Iven's Appeal, 33 Pa. St. 237.

2. Folger, J., in Warner v. New York Cent. R. Co., 52 N. Y. 437; 11 Am. Rep. 724.

In English practice the verdict was entered in the Postea, which was a record of the proceedings in a cause, subsequent to the joining of the issue and awarding of trial. Anderson's Law Dict. 793.

If a verdict is required by statute to be in writing, when affirmed by the jury it becomes a part of the record without being entered on the order book, and if lost may be supplied like any other paper in a cause, by a proved copy. Sanders v. Sanders, 24 Ind. 133.

In a suit before a justice of the peace, the effect of a judgment will be given to the verdict of a jury, as soon as it is entered on the justice's docket. Rutherford v. Winn, 3 Mo. 14; Davis v. Wood, 7 Mo. 162; Cason v. Tate, 8 Mo. 46; Morse v. Brownfield, 27 Mo. 224. And see Franse v. Owens, 25 Mo. 334.

Filing Instead of Recording.—In State v. Depositor, 21 Nev. 107, it is held that the application of the statute, to the effect that no departure from, or error in, the proceedings, in a criminal case, shall render the same invalid unless prejudicial to the defendant (see Gen. Stat. Nevada, § 4469) renders the act of the clerk, when a verdict of guilty of rape was rendered, in filing it, instead of recording it as ordered, immaterial, where he read it to the jury and it was affirmed by them.

Recording on Sunday.—A verdict may be recorded on Sunday. Hodge v. State, 29 Fla. 500; True v. Plumley, 36 Me. 466; Hoghtaling v. Osborn, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 118; Hiller v. English, 4 Strobb. (S. Car.) 486.

3. 2 Hale 299; Co. Litt. 227 b; Scott v. Scott, 110 Pa. St. 387. "With the assent of the jury to the verdict as recorded, their functions with respect to the case cease, and the trial is closed." Field, C. J., in Blum v. Pate, 20 Cal. 69; People v. Lee Yune Chong, 94 Cal. 379. See also supra, this title, Amendment of Verdict—By the Jury.

4. See supra, this title, Amendment of Verdict—By the Jury. See also CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, vol. 4, p. 881.

5. See supra, this title, Amendment of Verdict—By the Jury.

Where the entry of the verdict was for the plaintiff for $150, it was suggested that the usual dollar mark found in the recorded verdict was not contained in the written verdict brought into court by the jury; it was said that the recorded form must govern, as it was to that, that the jury presumably assented. Leftwich v. Day, 32 Minn. 512. But see State v. Reonnals, 14 La. Ann. 276. In this case it is held that, where the jury have written their verdict upon the indictment, but it is recorded differently, the verdict, as written by them, shows what was their meaning and intention, and must be regarded as the real and true verdict.

6. The clerk being the official scribe

n. SETTING ASIDE VERDICT.—(See NEW TRIAL, vol. 16, p. 500.)

2. Partial Verdict.—A partial verdict is one by which the jury in a criminal case acquit the defendant as to part of the accusation, and find him guilty of the residue.¹ The conviction may be on one of several counts, each charging a distinct offense, with a discharge upon the others, either in express terms,² or by silence, which is regarded as a constructive acquittal;³ or where a count is capable of division, the jury may find the defendant of the court, it is his duty to keep regular and fair minutes of all proceedings therein, which minutes the judge authenticates by his signature. Nevertheless, the judge may keep the record himself by entering, or causing to be entered, the proceedings of the court, in a case, also authenticating them by his signature. McClerkin v. State, 20 Fla. 879.

California Penal Code, § 1164, directs that verdicts shall be entered in full upon the minutes before being read to the jury. However, in People v. Gilbert, 57 Cal. 96, the jury brought in a verdict of "guilty," whereupon the piece of paper which the foreman handed to the clerk was read to the jury, and the jurors all agreed that it was their verdict. The verdict was not entered upon the minutes until after the discharge of the jury, but it was held that the omission to record the verdict before reading it to the jury, did not affect the validity of the judgment of conviction, and that a new trial asked on that ground was properly denied. And see Territory v. Harper, 1 Arizona 399.

A verdict should not be recorded before it has been declared by the foreman, or, if sealed, read by the clerk, so that the parties may be distinctly informed of its purport. Blum v. Pate, 20 Cal. 69; Beal v. Cunningham, 42 Me. 363; Cole v. Laws, 104 N. Car. 651.

A verdict should be recorded as rendered by the jury, Moody v. McDonald, 4 Cal. 297; and, as it was held in O'Connor v. State, 9 Fla. 215, it should be recorded before the jury is discharged.

1. 2 Bouvier's Law Dict. 780.

In 1 Chitty's Crim. Law 637, it appears, "Thus, the jury may convict the defendant upon one count of the indictment, and acquit him on the charge contained in another, or upon one part of a count capable of division, and not guilty of the other part, as on a count for composing and publishing a libel, the defendant may be found guilty of publishing only. And, in general, where from the evidence it appears that the defendant has not been guilty to the extent of the charge specified, he may be found guilty as far as the evidence warrants, and be acquitted as to the residue. . . . Where the accusation includes an offense of an inferior degree, the jury may discharge the defendant of the higher crime, and convict him for the less atrocious."

Species of General Verdict.—A partial verdict is in reality only a species of general verdict, being a general verdict of guilty as to a portion of the charge, and a general verdict of not guilty as to the residue. 2 Bouvier's Law Dict. 780.

Partial Finding of Entire Count.—But where the indictment charged "a riot and assault," and the jury found "guilty of a riot," this was held a partial finding of the entire count, and therefore void. State v. Creighton, 1 Nott. & M. (S. Car.) 256.

guilty as to part, and release him of the rest;¹ and it has also been held that, where it appears from the evidence that the guilt of the prisoner does not extend to the full charge specified in the indictment, a conviction as far as the evidence warrants is sufficient.² Where the crime charged includes one of a lesser degree, the prisoner may be found guilty of the inferior and acquitted of the greater.³

3. Special Verdict.—a. DEFINITION.—A special verdict, says Blackstone, is where the jury state the naked facts, as they find them to be proved, and pray the advice of the court thereon; concluding conditionally, that if upon the whole matter the court should be of opinion that the plaintiff had cause of action, they then find for the plaintiff; if otherwise, then for the defendant.⁴

In Rex v. Hunt, 2 Campb. 583, the defendant was found guilty of publishing a libel, upon a count in an information which charged him with having "composed, printed, and published, a libel."

Where an offense has degrees, the defendant may be found guilty of any degree not higher than that charged, or of any offense included in that charged. Carpenter v. State, 58 Ark. 233; Crim. Code, § 254 et seq.

Greater Includes the Less.—Where a felony was charged as one of the elements of a burglary, an acquittal of the burglary was adjudged to be an acquittal of the felony, Rex v. Corner, 1 Stark. 43; and where both burglary and larceny from the house are charged in the indictment, a general verdict of guilty convicts the accused of burglary, and whether the larceny be proved or not is immaterial. Yarborough v. State, 86 Ga. 396.

4. 3 Black. Com. 377.

Another Sort.—There has existed another species of special verdict, as where the jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff subject, nevertheless, to the opinion of the court on a special case stated by the counsel on both sides with regard to a matter of law. 3 Black. Com. 378; 2 Tidd's Pr. 899.

In Wallington v. Dunlap, 14 Pa. St. 33, it is declared that this sort of special verdict does not seem to have found a place in our practice. See also, infra, this title, Verdict Subject to Opinion.

Statutory Enactments.—The practice on the subject of special verdict being, in the United States, generally regulated by statute, most of the states have adopted a statutory definition, for which reference must be made to the various codes. The statutory definitions will be found to vary in no material particular from the common-law conception. Care, however, must be taken regarding the distinction between special verdicts and special findings, the latter being frequently found inaccurately masquerading in the nomenclature of the former. In the New York Code of Civil Procedure, section 1187, a special verdict is defined to be "one by which the jury find the facts only, leaving the court to determine which party is entitled to judgment thereon."

The court, in Eisemann v. Swan, 6 Bosw. (N. Y.) 668, and also in Williams v. Willis, 7 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 90, expressly calls attention to the fact that the requisites of a special verdict, under this provision of the code, are the same as they were before its enactment.

b. ORIGIN AND OBJECT.—These verdicts are said to be grounded upon an early English statute, which enacts that “the justices of assize shall not compel the jurors to say precisely whether it be a disseisin or not, so as they state the truth of the fact, and pray the aid of the justices; but if they will say, of their own accord, that it is a disseisin, their verdict shall be admitted at their own peril.”¹

The jury were thus enabled to avoid the liability of attain, to which they were exposed, if the general verdict should prove erroneous; and although writs of attain have long since been abolished in England,² yet the advantages secured by a special verdict in an involved and complicated case, were, and are still, recognized and appreciated.³

c. RIGHT TO RETURN.—At common law it seems to have been wholly within the discretion of the jury whether they should return a general or special verdict,⁴ the court neither having

In Seward v. Jackson, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 409, Jones, C. J., in discussing the subject of special verdict said: “It is of the essence of a special verdict that it should be a finding by the jury of the facts on which the court is to pronounce the law. . . . The jury is to find the facts in issue between the parties. . . . To the court it belongs to apply the law to the facts; but the court has no jurisdiction to decide upon evidence or to enter into any question of fact that may arise in a cause. This is a cardinal rule in the law of special verdicts, which has always been observed and enforced by courts of law, and ought, in my opinion, never to be relaxed.” See also Rex v. Aire, 2 T. R. 660; Bird v. Appleton, 1 East 111; Hubbard v. Johnstone, 3 Taunt. 177; La Frombois v. Jackson, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 600; 18 Am. Dec. 463; Williams v. Willis, 7 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 90.

Texas.—In Sayles' Texas Civ. Stat., vol. 1, art. 1330, a special verdict is defined to be, “one wherein the jury find the facts only, on issues made up and submitted to them under the direction of the court.” The next paragraph, art. 1331, declares the “requisites of,” holding that the special verdict must find the facts as established by the evidence, and not the evidence by which they are established, and the findings must be such as that nothing remains for the court but to draw from such facts the conclusions of law. See Robinson v. Moore, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 93; Umschied v. Scholz, 84 Tex. 265.

1. Westminster II., 13 Edw. I., ch. 20, § 2.

It was resolved, however, by all the justices in Common Bench in Dowman's Case, 9 Coke 12, that the statute was but an affirmance of the common law.

2. Statute of 6 Geo. IV., ch. 50, § 60.

3. “Sometimes, if there arises in a case any difficult matter of law, the jury, for the sake of better information, and to avoid the danger of having their verdict attained, will find a special verdict.” 3 Bl. Com. 377.

4. Bouvier's Law Dict., “Verdict;” 4 Black. Com. 361; Stevens on Pl. 19; Bacon's Abr., “Verdict,” d.; Dowman's Case, 9 Coke 12; Devizes v. Clark, 3 Ad. & El. 506; 1 Chitty's Cr. Law 642.

It is said, however, in 1 Chitty's Crim. Law 637, “To this rule there seems, indeed, to have been an exception in the case of libel until lately, where the jury were directed to find the defendant guilty, on proof of the mere fact of authorship or publication, and were excluded from entering into any discussion as to the libelous quality of the paper charged as seditious; and, of course, from taking it all into consideration the defendant's motive for the publication or its tendency. But after this anomalous principle had undergone much and a very able discussion by Lord Erskine, in the various stages of the prosecution against the Dean of St. Asaph, it was entirely destroyed by legislative provision. The Statute of 32 Geo. III., refers the whole of the case to the jury—the nature of the work, as well as the fact that it is published—and enables them to give a general verdict to the merits, as in any authority to require,¹ nor the right to refuse a special verdict, if the jury choose to render one, provided, of course, in the latter instance, the matter specially found was pertinent to the issue.²

Statutes in many of the states prescribe limits to, or wholly deprive juries of the exercise of this discretion.³

other case, where malicious intention is necessary to constitute guilt." The author continues, "But there are many cases where the law is doubtful, in which it may be prudent for them to find the facts specially, and leave the inference to the court."

There was also a case at common law where the jury were required, in giving the general verdict, to set forth the facts, which were when the jury, upon an indictment for murder, found the homicide to be in se defendendo or per infortunium, so that if they were mistaken, the court might give such a verdict as was warranted by the circumstances. Hawk P. C. b. 2, § 4; 2 Hale 302; 1 Chitty's Crim. Law 642.

The right of jurors to find special verdicts has existed in England since the passage of the Statute of Westminster II., 18 Edw. I., ch. 30, § 2.

3. In California, a statute has been enacted providing that in actions for the recovery of money only, or specific property, it is within the discretion of the jury as to whether they shall render a special or general verdict. In cases other than this, the court may direct the jury to find a special verdict in writing. American Co. v. Bradford, 27 Cal. 360.

Colorado.—A statute, in this respect similar to the California provision just cited, has been enacted. Thompson v. Gregor, 11 Colo. 531. Under this statute it has been held that in an action of replevin, where the pleadings only raised issues regarding the recovery of money, the court has no power to order special findings. Meyers v. Hart (Colo. App. 1893), 33 Pac. Rep. 647.

In Indiana, it is held to be the duty of the court, whenever a special verdict is demanded, to give each of the parties the privilege and time required to prepare with care a draft of the special verdict, and if either of the parties refuse to avail himself of this right, he cannot complain of undue advantage gained by the other party in thus presenting his views of the evidence to the jury. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 294; 10 Am. Rep. 111; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Frawley, 110 Ind. 18. In this latter case, it is declared to be the duty of the jury, upon the request of the parties for a special verdict, to return the material facts which they find to have been proved to the court without any regard to the legal value or ultimate consequences of such facts. It then becomes the duty of the court to declare the law upon the facts returned.

Under the Iowa Code, § 2807, it is held to be within the discretion of the jury to render a general or special verdict. In Schultz v. Cremer, 59 Iowa 182, it is held that where the court instructed the jury against the defendant's objection to render a special verdict only, the court erred in depriving the jury of that discretion to which they were entitled, and to which the defendant was entitled that they should have. Under the provision of the code cited, the court might have directed the jury, if they had found a general verdict, to find a special verdict, or more properly to make the findings on particular questions of fact, but it had no right to instruct them to find a special verdict alone. Heffner v. Bromwell, 78 Iowa 648; White v. Adams, 77 Iowa 295. And see Hall v. Carter, 74 Iowa 364.

In State v. Ridley, 48 Iowa 370, it is held that this section of the code (2807), to the effect that it is in the discretion of the jury whether a verdict shall be general or special, but where the jury find a general verdict, they may be required by the court, and must be so required, on the request of any party to the action, to find specially upon any particular questions of fact, is applicable to civil cases only.

Kansas.—It seems that in this state statutes have been enacted abolishing special verdicts, but regulations exist providing for special findings of fact which achieve practically the same result. In Foster v. Turner, 31 Kan.

58, it was held that in a cause tried by the court and a jury, either party might request the court to direct the jury to find upon particular questions of fact, but such party should himself state the particular facts with reference to which he wished the jury to find, leaving the jury merely to give answers with reference to such facts, and generally such party should not expect the court to direct the jury to find with reference to facts not stated particularly by the party himself.

It seems that the court may, in its discretion, refuse to require the jury to state new facts showing why it finds in a particular way upon some very general question of fact stated by one of the parties. Johnson v. Husband, 22 Kan. 277; Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Plunkett, 25 Kan. 188; Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Ferry, 28 Kan. 686; Prescott v. Leonard, 32 Kan. 145; Gripton v. Thompson, 32 Kan. 370. And see Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Johns, 36 Kan. 784.

Missouri.—The provision of the revised statutes of Missouri concerning special and general verdicts is, "In all actions the jury shall, upon the issues made up and submitted to them by the court, return a general verdict; and the court, upon the request of either party, shall direct the jury, under proper instructions, to find a special verdict upon all or any of the issues submitted to them, which submissions shall be in writing, distinctly specifying each issue on which the jury are to find, and such special finding shall be recorded with the verdict." This statute has been construed as one intending that the issues in the case shall be submitted to the jury for special finding, and not particular questions of fact as may be done in some states. Turner v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 23 Mo. App. 12.

Nebraska.—Nebraska Code, § 293, provides that in every action for the recovery of money only or specific real property, the jury in their discretion may render a general or special verdict. In all other cases the court may direct the jury to find a special verdict in writing upon all or any of the issues. Marx v. Kilpatrick, 25 Neb. 107.

New Jersey.—See Springer v. Reeves, 4 N. J. L. 207.

Trial Before Justice.—A jury may find a special verdict in such a case. Springer v. Reeves, 4 N. J. L. 207.

New York.—New York Code Civ. Proc., § 1187, provides: "In an action to recover a sum of money only, or real property, or a chattel, the jury may render a general or a special verdict, in its discretion. In any other action, except where one or more specific questions of fact, stated under the direction of the court, are tried by a jury, the court may direct the jury to find a special verdict, upon all or any of the issues."

Ohio.—Ohio Civil Code, § 5201, provides: "In all actions, the jury, unless otherwise directed by the court, may, in its discretion, render either a general or special verdict; but the court shall, at the request of either party, direct them to give a special verdict in writing upon all or any of the issues," etc. For a construction of this section, see Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Terry, 8 Ohio St. 570; Adam's, etc., Express v. Pollock, 12 Ohio St. 618.

Pennsylvania.—The jury have a right in all cases whatever, whether capital or otherwise, to find a special verdict by which the facts of the case are put on record, and the law is submitted to the judges. Com. v. Chathams, 50 Pa. St. 181; 38 Am. Dec. 539.

South Carolina.—See Code of Civil Proc., § 282; Rumph v. Hiatt, 35 S. Car. 444.

Texas.—The Texas Code of Procedure provides for special verdicts in writing on issues made up under the direction of the court. Kuhlman v. Medlinka, 29 Tex. 385.

References to the codes of the above states, prescribing the practice in respect to special verdicts, are made merely for the purpose of illustrating the general nature of the statutory provisions on the subject, manifestly not being intended as a complete guide to the practice prevailing in the various jurisdictions.

United States Courts.—Although the courts of the state in which the trial is, are required to submit a special verdict upon request, it seems that the United States courts holding session in such state are not bound to do so, it being decided that such proceeding is not within the meaning of the revised statutes of the United States, providing that the pleading, practice, forms, and modes of proceeding in the federal courts, shall conform as near as may be to those existing in the courts of the states where such federal courts are held. U. S. Mut. Accident Assoc. v. Barry, 131 U. S. 100.

d. REQUISITES—(1) In General.—A special verdict should find all the facts which are necessary to enable the court to determine, by consideration of the pleadings and the verdict alone, which party is by law entitled to judgment, without referring to the evidence.¹ For the purpose, therefore, of deciding what judgment is to be given, the court is not warranted in examining the jury has been required to return a special verdict, general instructions as to the law of the case are not proper. They should be instructed only as to the nature of the action, the issues, and the general principles regulating their duties in the premises.

In Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Frawley, 110 Ind. 18, Mitchell, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "There is neither propriety nor fitness that the court should, either upon its own motion or at the request of either party, give general instructions as to the law of the case. The jury should be left entirely free to find the facts material to the several issues, without instruction as to whether the law will declare one way or the other, upon any fact or state of facts which may be found. A statement by the court of the matters put in issue by the pleadings, and of the rules for weighing or reconciling conflicting testimony, with whatever else may be necessary to enable the jury clearly to comprehend the subjects which are to be covered by their special verdict, is all that is proper when a special verdict is to be returned." *Pittsburgh, etc., R. In an action to recover damages, caused by the act of the defendant in tearing down a gate and allowing cattle to trespass on the plaintiff's land, the jury did not find that the trespassing cattle belonged to the defendant, or that the defendant had anything to do with them, and the verdict was therefore insufficient. Casey v. Dwyre, 15 Hun (N. Y.) 153.

In an information upon the statute of usury, the verdict found that the defendant received profits to the value of sixty pounds, in performance of the corrupt agreement, but did not find the loan as set out in the information, and for this reason it was held imperfect. Cook v. Lauday, Cro. Jac. 210. See also Rex v. Francis, Stra. 1015; Cas. Temp. Hardw. 113.

Pleadings and Verdict.—In Barto v. Himrod, 8 N. Y. 485; 59 Am. Dec. 506, as the case presented no general verdict, but simply a special finding by the jury of the value of the property taken, leaving all other facts upon which the legal rights of the parties depended as stated in the pleadings, it became a point whether the case presented any legal question upon which the court could act. In the first consultation it was doubted by a majority of the court, whether it could go behind the verdict and ascertain from the pleadings what facts were admitted in them, and then examine those facts in connection with the fact found by the jury, in order to determine what questions of law were presented, and whether the special verdict should not, in order to properly present the legal questions to this court, contain as well the facts admitted by the pleadings, as those found by the jury. Upon reargument, however, all the judges agreed that the facts admitted by the pleadings, together with those found by the jury, presented the whole case in proper form for the consideration of the court.

False Pretenses.—On a trial for the offense of obtaining money by false pretenses, a verdict was rendered in the following words: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of obtaining money on false pretenses to the amount of $500." This was held to be a special and not a general verdict, and as a special verdict altogether too defective to authorize any judgment to be rendered upon it. It should have stated what the pretense was, to whom it was made, from whom the money was obtained, to whom the money belonged, and in what county the offense was committed; and being a special verdict, it could not be helped by intentment, or by reference to extraneous facts which might appear upon the record. Clay v. State, 43 Ala. 350.

Detinue.—In an action of detinue for slaves, the jury found a special verdict as to some of the slaves, omitting to state circumstances which were necessary to ascertain whether the plaintiff was entitled to them or not. It was held that the verdict was insufficient and a venire facias de novo should have been awarded. Robinson v. Brock, 1 Hen. & M. (Va.) 213.

Obstructing Road.—A special verdict, in a case rendered on a trial for obstructing a road, is defective if it does not state that the user of the road by the public was as of right and adversary, for, unless it was such, it would not impose an easement upon the defendant's land. State v. Stewart, 91 N. Car. 566.

Construction of Devise.—A special verdict, intending to present the question of the construction of a devise, referred to the devise as being contained in the will of I. W., mentioning the date of the will and of the probate, but not stating the devise. It was held that such a verdict was defective in substance. Walker v. Dewing, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 520.

Mixed Question of Law and Fact.—If a special verdict, on a mixed question of law and fact, finds facts from which the court can draw clear conclusions, it is no objection to the verdict that the jury have not themselves drawn such conclusions and stated them as facts in the case. Seward v. Jackson, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 406; Moukhouse v. Hay, 8 Price 256.

Facts Only.—A special verdict should set forth facts only, as distinguished from evidence, immaterial circumstances, argumentative inferences, or conclusions of law. Ross v. U. S., 12 Ct. of Cl. 565; Erwin v. Clark, 13 Mich. 10.

Conclusion of Law.—A special verdict which amounts only to a conclusion of law must be set aside. Where the jury found "We, the jury, find that the plaintiff had a right to replevy the mill," it was held that such finding would not authorize a judgment for the possession of the property. Keller v. Boatman, 49 Ind. 104; Hatfield v. Lockwood, 18 Iowa 206. See infra, this title, Surplusage, and notes thereto.

Negatives.—As a general rule, negatives need not be found by a special verdict, yet they must be, when it is necessary to show that a person or thing does not come within a particular exception. Mayor v. Lambert, Willes 117; Com. v. Dooly, 6 Gray (Mass.) 360.

The facts involved in the finding of a special verdict, are evidentiary and inferential. It is the duty of the jury to consider the evidentiary facts but to find the inferential facts, and if the special verdict shows upon its face that the jury found the evidentiary facts but not the inferential, the verdict is ill because it shows that the jury ought to have found other facts, namely, the inferential. The jury should not find evidence of facts but the inferential facts. Locke v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 66 Ind. 353.

Duty of Jury.—In framing and returning a special verdict, the whole duty of the jury is discharged when they have found and set forth, in an orderly and intelligible manner, all the principal facts which are proven within the issues submitted to them. Conner v. Citizen's St. R. Co., 105 Ind. 62; 55 Am. Rep. 177.

evidence adduced at the trial.¹ Even though some of the material facts may be undisputed, it seems that they should, nevertheless, be incorporated by the jury in their special verdict.² That the special verdict should contain facts, and not mere evidence of facts, is a vital principle regulating its formation.³

1. Eisemann v. Swan, 6 Bosw. (N. Y.) 668; Jenks v. Hallet, 1 Cai. (N. Y.) 60; Williams v. Jackson, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 502; Wallingford v. Dunlap, 14 Pa. St. 33. See infra, this title, Special Verdict—Construction; catch line in notes, Nothing to Be Intended.

The definition of a special verdict imports by the plainest implication that the special verdict must contain all the facts which are in issue by the pleadings, the determination of which is necessary to enable the court to give judgment; and it clearly excludes the idea that the court can look into the evidence itself to ascertain the facts, or any one of them. Eisemann v. Swan, 6 Bosw. (N. Y.) 668. The supreme court of Wisconsin, in several of its decisions, seems to depart from this principle, holding that if a special verdict does not find upon a question of fact not admitted by the pleadings, which it is necessary should be found in favor of the party for whom judgment is entered, in order to sustain such judgment, such omission in the special verdict will not be error for which the judgment will be reversed, if it appears from the bill of exceptions that uncontradicted evidence in the case establishes such fact in favor of the party for whom such judgment was entered. Ward v. Busack, 46 Wis. 408; McNamara v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 41 Wis. 69; Hutchinson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 41 Wis. 541; Williams v. Porter, 41 Wis. 422.

2. Undisputed Facts.—A special verdict should find all the facts upon which the court is to pronounce judgment, even though some of the facts may be undisputed. Hence, if the court states to the jury that certain facts are undisputed, and directs a special verdict as to the disputed facts alone, and the jury return such a verdict, it is error to pronounce judgment thereon. Wallingford v. Dunlap, 14 Pa. St. 33; Vansyckel v. Stewart, 77 Pa. St. 124.

Facts Admitted by Pleadings.—It is declared by the supreme court of Wisconsin, that a special verdict need not find facts admitted by the pleadings. Catlin v. Henton, 9 Wis. 476; Hawkes

"In Tsack v. Clark, 1 Roll. 132, Lord Coke says: 'If a deed of feoffment were given in evidence made forty years previous, if possession had gone according to the deed, although it could not be proved that livery was made, this would be good evidence for the jury, and that he would direct them to find a livery, for that would be presumed.' But if the jury found all these matters specially, the court could not adjudge this to be a good feoffment without livery. In such a case, if all the evidence necessary to presume the fact is found by the special verdict, but the verdict is imperfect in not finding the fact itself, which ought to have been presumed by the jury, a venire de novo may be awarded to supply the defective finding." Walworth, Ch., in Rogers v. Eagle F. Ins. Co., 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 611.

(2) Responsiveness.—In order to support a judgment it is held that the special verdict must pass upon all the material issues made by the pleadings.¹

Upon a special verdict, the court cannot draw, from other statements contained therein, any inferences of facts necessary to the determination of the case. Tancred v. Christy, 12 M. & W. 316; Hubbard v. Johnstone, 3 Taunt. 209.

If the evidence necessary to presume a fact is found by the special verdict, but the verdict is imperfect in not finding the fact itself, which ought to have been presumed by the jury, a venire de novo will be awarded to supply the defective finding of the jury. Walworth, Ch., in Rogers v. Eagle F. Ins. Co., 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 611. See also Witham v. Earl of Derby, 1 Wils. 55.

If a special verdict does not find facts, but simply sets out evidence from which the facts might be inferred, an appellate court, which is empowered only to pass upon mistakes of law committed in the lower courts, cannot find the omitted facts even with the consent of both parties. Seward v. Jackson, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 406.

In Blank v. Fonshee, 4 Munf. (Va.) 61, it is held that a verdict submitting to the court, for its judgment as to the law, certain documents and other evidence, oral and written, without finding the facts established thereby, is too uncertain and insufficient for a judgment to be founded thereupon. Henderson v. Allens, 1 Hen. & M. (Va.) 235.

A special verdict, to enable the court of errors to act upon it, must find facts and not merely state the evidence. Where it states evidence merely, without stating the conclusions of the jury, the court cannot act upon matters so found, but if other facts are found properly, and judgment in the court below be rendered contrary to the facts so properly found, the judgment will be reversed, though the evidence stated in the special verdict may have warranted a verdict and judgment the other way. Seward v. Jackson, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 406. Per Jones, Chancellor, LaFrombois v. Jackson, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 589; 18 Am. Dec. 463.

In Barnes v. Williams, 11 Wheat.

(U. S.) 415, the plaintiff's claim was founded upon a bequest of certain slaves, and it was therefore essential, to recover at law, that the assent of the executor to the legacy should be proved; the special verdict, instead of distinctly stating this fact, detailed a mere account of the evidence going to prove it, and also, as to the defendant's defense under the Statute of Limitations, the special verdict did not find any facts by which the court could ascertain at what time the right of action accrued. Chief Justice Marshall, upon inspecting the record, stated that for the above reasons, the special verdict was too imperfect to enable the court to render judgment upon it, "although," said the learned judge, "in the opinion of the court, there was sufficient evidence in the special verdict from which the jury might have found the facts, yet they have not found it, and the court could not, upon a special verdict, intend it." Garland v. Davis, 4 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 131; Prentice v. Zane, 8 How. (U. S.) 484; Suydam v. Williamson, 20 How. (U. S.) 441; Chesapeake Ins. Co. v. Stark, 6 Cranch (U. S.) 268.

Relevancy of Testimony.—A special verdict, presenting no other question than the relevancy of testimony adduced on the trial of a cause, is irregular, unauthorized, and presents no foundation upon which a judgment can be pronounced. Welland Canal Co. v. Hathaway, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 479; 24 Am. Dec. 51.

Circumstantial Evidence.—Where the facts established by the evidence are circumstantial, the jury should exhaust their function by going to the very furthest limit of their jurisdiction, declaring the ultimate deduction from the circumstantial facts found. Ross v. U. S., 12 Ct. of Cl. 565.

Facts Unsupported by Evidence.—No finding should be made in a special verdict as to facts upon which there was no evidence at the trial. Lafayette v. Allen, 81 Ind. 166.

Conclusive Legal Presumption.—A special verdict, finding a state of facts which the law has made conclusive evidence of a certain other fact, is equivalent to the finding of such fact. John v. Bates, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 106.

S.) 441; Hilliard v. Outlaw, 92 N. Car. 266; Moore v. Moore, 67 Tex. 293; See supra, this title, General Verdict—Responsiveness.

Whether the jury find a general or special verdict, it is their duty to decide every point in issue, and although a court in which a cause is tried may give form to a general finding, so as to make it harmonize with the issue, yet if it appears to that court or to the appellate court that the finding is different from the issue, or is confined to a part only of the matter in issue, no judgment can be rendered upon the verdict. Patterson v. U. S., 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 221.

All "Litigated" Issues.—"A special verdict," said the court, in Ward v. Busack, 46 Wis. 407, "which disposes of all the litigated issues in an action, is sufficient."

Where a special verdict is an insufficient response to the issue, judgment for this reason cannot be rendered on it. Clay v. State, 43 Ala. 350.

A verdict which finds but part of the issue, and says nothing as to the rest, is insufficient, because the jury have not tried the whole issue. So if several pleas are joined and the jury find some of them well, and as to others find a special verdict, which is imperfect, a venire facias de novo will be granted for the whole. 2 Roll. Abr. Pl. 722; Auncelme v. Auncelme, Cro. Jac. 31; Woolmen v. Caston, Cro. Jac. 113; Treswell v. Middleton, Cro. Jac. 653; Rex v. Hays, 2 Ld. Raym. 1518.

A special verdict which is defective cannot form the basis of a valid judgment, unless it finds all the material facts put in issue by the pleadings; and this, though the evidence may clearly establish the existence of the facts not found. Moore v. Moore, 67 Tex. 293.

When a special verdict is ambiguous or imperfect, or when it finds only the evidence of facts and not the facts themselves, or finds but a part of the facts in issue and is silent as to others, the court will regard the finding as a mistrial and order a venire facias de novo. Barnes v. Williams, 11 Wheat. (U. S.) 415; Prentice v. Zane, 8 How. (U. S.) 484; Carrington v. Pratt, 18 How. (U. S.) 63; Suydam v. Williamson, 20 How. (U. S.) 441.

In Housworth v. Bloomhuff, 54 Ind. 487, Howk, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, used this language: "A special verdict must contain a finding by the jury, pro and con, as to every material fact in issue necessary to constitute the plaintiff's cause of action or the defendant's defense. And the reason of this requirement is, that the court can neither supply an omitted necessary fact, nor can it render judgment upon an imperfect verdict. If the special verdict should not contain a finding by the jury, either for or against each material fact in issue necessary to constitute the cause of action or cause of defense, then the proper remedy for the aggrieved party is a motion to set aside the verdict and for a venire facias de novo." Bosseker v. Cramer, 18 Ind. 44; Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Washburn, 25 Ind. 259; Smith v. Jeffries, 25 Ind. 376; Jenkins v. Parkhill, 25 Ind. 473.

1. "A verdict," said Lord Coke (Co. Litt. 227 a), "finding matter uncertainly and ambiguously, is insufficient, and no judgment will be rendered thereon." Loew v. Stocker, 61 Pa. for it is of the gravest importance that the record should be definite and certain, and show unequivocally what matters have been adjudicated, and that the decision should be ultimate regarding the questions in issue.¹

(4) Formality.—The form of a special verdict seems to be immaterial, so that the facts found are distinctly and intelligibly set forth.² Some courts have held, however, that the conditional conclusion—finding for the plaintiff if the law on the facts found is adjudged to be in his favor, and if otherwise, then for the defendant—is essential to the validity of the verdict;³ but the guson, 4 Leigh (Va.) 37; 24 Am. Dec. 707.

Where a special verdict is imperfect by reason of ambiguity or uncertainty, so that the court cannot say for which party judgment should be given, a venire facias de novo should be awarded; but if the verdict be not ambiguous in itself, but the plaintiff has stated a defective case or a defective title, then the judgment should be for the defendant, and a venire facias de novo ought not to be granted. Bellows v. Bank, 2 Mason (U. S.) 31. And see State v. Curtis, 71 N. Car. 56.

Direct and Intelligible.—In Carroll v. Bohan, 43 Wis. 218, it is said: "The statute providing for special verdicts is an excellent one, tending to dispel the occasional darkness visible in general verdicts. But special verdicts are worse than useless, if courts do not submit for them single, direct, and plain questions, and insist upon positive, direct, and intelligible answers. Indirect, evasive, uncertain, or unmeaning answers should never be received. And when none other can be drawn from a jury, the verdict should not stand for a moment."

Ambiguous.—Where there are such inconsistencies or ambiguities in a special verdict as to render it uncertain or doubtful which way the jury intended to find, it is proper to award a venire facias de novo. Mitchell, J., in Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Frawley, 110 Ind. 18; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Flanagan, 113 Ind. 488.

Inconsistent.—In Cottrill v. Cramer, 59 Wis. 231, it is held that a special verdict in an action of libel, finding facts which would justify the giving of exemplary damages but awarding nominal damages only, should be set aside as inconsistent. Murray v. Abbott, 61 Wis. 198; Puffer v. Lucas, 107 N. Car. 322. As to inconsistency, see also McBride v. Union Pac. R. Co., 3

Wyoming 247; McCurdy v. Locker, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 220.

Documents in Evidence.—The requisite certainty may not be attained by reference to documents given in evidence at the trial. Walker v. Dewing, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 520; Eisemann v. Swan, 6 Bosw. (N. Y.) 668; Jackson v. State, 21 Tex. 668.

In McArthur v. Porter, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 626, the special verdict referred to a deed of conveyance, which was described, but not set out substantially or literally. A deed was found in the record, but the court refused to consider it as part of the finding of the jury or refer to it in aid of the verdict.

1. Dray v. Crich, 3 Oregon 300.

Unmistakable Language.—A special verdict must find all the issues made by the pleadings in language which does not admit of mistake. It should be the end and not result in a continuance of the controversy. Moore v. Moore, 67 Tex. 293.

2. A special verdict, however informal, is good if the court can understand it. It is to have a reasonable construction and not to be avoided unless from necessity. If rendered upon substantial issues of fact, it should not be disregarded for mere technical defects. Daniels v. McGinnis, 97 Ind. 549; Clark v. Clark, 132 Ind. 25.

Substantially Good.—It is sufficient if the verdict is substantially good, mere inartificial wording being immaterial. Fenn v. Blanchard, 2 Yeates (Pa.) 543; Evansville, etc., R. Co. v. Taft, 2 Ind. App. 237.

Criminal Case.—It is sufficient if the jury find all the substantial requisites of the charge, without following the technical language used in the indictment. Com. v. Chatham, 50 Pa. St. 181; 38 Am. Dec. 539; Chitty's Crim. L. 642.

3. It is held in the case of State v.

better doctrine is believed to be that, while usual and proper, the conditional conclusion is not absolutely necessary.¹

c. CONSTRUCTION.—The special verdict of a jury must be read as an entirety,² and in the light of the issues formed by the pleadings.³ In rendering judgment thereon, the court can look only Wallace, 3 Ired. (N. Car.) 195, that the jury in a special verdict must show that they find one way or the other according as the opinion of the court may be upon the law. This case was an action on an indictment for assault and battery, and the jury returned the following verdict: "The jury find that while the prosecutor was sitting in a chair, the defendant raised his gun in a striking position, being within striking distance of the prosecutor, and declared that if he repeated certain words just uttered, he would strike him, which words were not repeated by the prosecutor, and the jury submit to the court whether this is in law an assault." "In this case," said the court, "the jury submit to the court whether the defendant be guilty of an assault, but they do not find the defendant guilty, if, in the opinion of the court, he is guilty; and not guilty if, in the opinion of the court, he is not guilty." State v. Stewart, 91 N. Car. 566; State v. Monger, 107 N. Car. 771; State v. Divine (S. Car. 1887), 4 S. E. Rep. 477.

1. "The want of a technical ending," said the court, in Hendrickson v. Walker, 32 Mich. 68, "is immaterial. When the jury find facts, they find for the party who should prevail on those facts, and he is entitled to judgment."

The case of State v. Moore, 7 Ired. (N. Car.) 228, has been cited by the courts of this state to support the position which they assume, holding the essentiality of the conditional conclusion. It would seem to us, however, to be an authority for exactly the opposite contention, for in this case it is held, "that a special verdict is in itself a verdict of guilty or not guilty, as the facts found in it do or do not state in law the offense charged." See also State v. Ewing, 108 N. Car. 755; State v. Spray (N. Car. 1893), 18 S. E. Rep. 700.

In Toler v. Keiher, 81 Ind. 383, it is held that where a jury return a special verdict, which is imperfect by the omission of a formal conclusion, the court may instruct them as to the same, and direct them to retire and add it.

2. If a portion of a verdict is doubtful or obscure, reference may be had to the context for the purpose of ascertaining the true meaning. Alhambra, etc., v. Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 598. And see Elliott, J., in Woodward v. Davis, 127 Ind. 172; Miller v. Shackleford, 4 Dana (Ky.) 271.

3. Foster v. Jackson, Hob. 52; Rex v. Saddler's Co., 7 Jur. N. S. 143; Eisemann v. Swan, 6 Bosw. (N. Y.) 668; Barto v. Himrod, 4 Seld. (N. Y.) 483; 59 Am. Dec. 506.

In Rex v. Plummer, 12 Mod. 627, it was declared by Holt, C. J., that though in an indictment for manslaughter, it be necessary to say that it was done voluntarily, yet it is not necessary it should be found in a special verdict; for if it be found that he did the act, without any more, it must be understood that he did it voluntarily, as it is laid in the indictment, if the contrary do not appear; for a man is a free agent, and what he does must be intended to be done voluntarily, if the contrary does not appear.

Liberality of Construction.—Although the verdict seems to wander and not answer formally to the words of the issue, yet if the point in issue may be concluded out of it, the verdict will serve. "A special verdict," observed Elliott, J., in Woodward v. Davis, 127 Ind. 172, "is not to be defeated by strict interpretation, but a reasonable construction is to be given it, and the construction is to be put upon it in an entirety, and not in fragmentary parts." Miller v. Shackleford, 4 Dana (Ky.) 271; Plummer v. Currier, 52 N. H. 287. "More or Less."—As to construction of the words "more or less," see Gonzales v. Leon, 31 Cal. 98.

On a sci. fa. against the executors of Thomas Jackson, the defendants pleaded that the testator was taken in execution by virtue of a capias ad satisfaciendum. The special finding set out that the testator was taken in execution by virtue of an alias capias ad satisfaciendum. This was adjudged as maintaining the plea of the defendant, and it was laid down that, "In every act there is a substance, a body, a principal, and there are certain accessories or incidents; and concerning this it is to such facts as properly arise under the issues joined, and which appear in the verdict itself,¹ for whatever facts do not appear in a special verdict must be taken not to exist.² In a criminal case, a true axiom, unumquodque maxime est id quod est principalius in ipso, and therefore things are nominated ex eo quod sunt per se, non per accidens. Now where the substance be capias, whether it be first alias or pluries, those are but distinctions of number or order. Foster v. Jackson, Hob. 52.

An indictment charged the defendant with forging an indorsement upon a bank note by erasing a memorandum of payment, and the jury found that he forged the face of the note where, by the method of the company, the minute of payment was made. The defendant's counsel insisted that an indorsement signified a writing upon the back of any note or deed, but it was held by all the judges, that the defendant was guilty, for the writing upon the face of the note was of the same effect as an indorsement, being introduced by the company instead of writing on the back, and always accepted for an indorsement, and therefore was within the words of the indictment. Rex v. Bigg, Stra. 18.

Upon a charge for murder three wounds were mentioned, but the verdict only spoke of two, finding that the first alone was mortal, yet the court said that this was a good verdict, for it found the death of the party killed from a wound given by the defendant. King v. Morgan, 1 Bulst. 87; Hawkins ch. 47, § 4, note.

1. McCarty v. Hudsons, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 291. In this case it was held also that though a fact found by the special verdict would prevent a recovery or defeat the defense if properly pleaded, it would not be regarded by the court.

"In judging upon a special verdict," says Ashe, J., in State v. Blue, 84 N. Car. 807, "the court is confined to the facts expressly found, and cannot supply the want thereof as to any material part, by an agreement or implication from what is expressly found; and when the facts are of an equivocal character, which may mean one thing or another, the court cannot determine as a question of law the guilt or innocence of the defendant." State v. Curtis, 71 N. Car. 56.

In rendering judgment on a special verdict, the court must be confined to the verdict itself and not look to the facts proved but not found in the verdict. Where the verdict is found upon special issues alone, the court cannot look beyond it to any other fact apparent in the record in aid of the judgment. Kuhlman v. Medlinka, 29 Tex. 385. See also cases cited in following notes.

Inherent Qualities.—A special verdict must be self-sustaining; it cannot be aided by a reference to extrinsic facts, appearing in the record. It must stand or fall according to its own inherent qualities. Vansyckel v. Stewart, 77 Pa. St. 124.

2. De Non Apparentibus et Non Existentibus Eadem est Ratio et Judicium.—This maxim is applicable to special verdicts. People v. Wells, 8 Mich. 104; Collins v. Riley, 104 U. S. 327; Thayer v. Society of United Brethren, 20 Pa. St. 60; Wallingford v. Dunlap, 14 Pa. St. 33; Berks County v. Jones, 21 Pa. St. 413; Vansyckel v. Stewart, 77 Pa. St. 124; Lawrence v. Beaubien, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 653; 23 Am. Dec. 155.

A special verdict must contain all the facts from which the law is to arise, and whatever is not found therein is, for the purpose of a decision, to be construed as not existing. It must present in substance the whole matter upon which the court is asked to determine the legal rights of the parties, and cannot be aided by intendment, or by extraneous facts, although such facts may appear elsewhere in the record. Collins v. Riley, 104 U. S. 327.

In a proceeding to recover rent due upon a perpetual lease granted out of land with right of distress and entry if the rent is not paid, a special verdict finding the entry of the grantee of the rent upon the land, and the holding by him and those claiming under him for 43 years, but which does not find that the original entry was under the right of entry given by the deed, or that the parties held adversely, nor any facts from which such an entry or such a possession results as a conclusion of law, affords no ground upon which the court can infer either fact. Turner v. Smith, 18 Gratt. (Va.) 831.

On a petition for freedom, where the petitioners claimed to be descended from one Ann Joice, a free woman of where the jury return a special verdict, all the circumstances which constitute the offense must be set forth to enable the court

England, the special verdict found that she came into the country with Charles, Lord Baltimore, when he came from England, but did not expressly find that she came from England. The court held the verdict to be imperfect because every word might have been true, yet Ann Joice might never have been in England. Mahoney v. Ashton, 4 Har. & M. (Md.) 210.

Necessary Consequence.—In State v. Duncan, 2 McCord (S. Car.) 129, Johnson, J., in delivering the opinion of the court declared, that "To authorize the court in pronouncing its judgment on a special verdict, the legal affirmative or negative conclusion must follow as a necessary consequence of the facts stated. This cannot happen where they are doubtful, for the obvious reason that the premises from which the deduction is to be drawn are wanting, nor can it happen for the same reason where distinct facts are set in opposition to each other."

"Nothing to be Intended."—It is a widely recognized rule of law, that nothing is to be intended in aid of a special verdict. To this effect, see Tancred v. Christy, 12 M. & W. 316; Rex v. Aire, 2 T. R. 660; Sewall v. Gledden, 1 Ala. 52; Stodder v. Powell, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 287; Lee v. Campbell, 4 Port. (Ala.) 198; Clay v. State, 43 Ala. 350; Hann v. Field, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 376; State v. Ritchie, 3 La. Ann. 511; People v. Wells, 8 Mich. 104; Hodge v. Ludlum, 45 Minn. 290; Knickerbocker, etc., Min. Co. v. Hall, 3 Nev. 194; Jenks v. Hallett, 1 Cal. (N. Y.) 60; State v. Custer, 65 N. Car. 339; Blake v. Davis, 20 Ohio 231; Fenn v. Blanchard, 2 Yeates (Pa.) 542; Croustillat v. Ball, 3 Yeates (Pa.) 375; 2 Am. Dec. 375; Wallingford v. Dunlap, 14 Pa. St. 33; Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Evans, 53 Pa. St. 250; Loew v. Stocker, 61 Pa. St. 347; Lawrence v. Beaubien, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 623; 23 Am. Dec. 155; Allen v. Fogler, 6 Rich. (S. Car.) 54; Jones v. State, 2 Swan (Tenn.) 399; Kuhlman v. Medlinka, 29 Tex. 385; Collins v. Riley, 104 U. S. 327; Alexandria Bank v. Swann, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 136; McMichen v. Amos, 4 Rand. (Va.) 137; Brown v. Ralston, 4 Rand. (Va.) 504; Stribbling v. Valley Bank, 5 Rand. (Va.) 159; Tunnell v. Watson, 2 Munf. (Va.) 283.

Inferences of Law.—The rule excluding "intendment" in aid of a special verdict refers to inferences of fact. The court may draw inferences of law from the facts found in the special verdict. Thus, it was held to be sufficient that the special verdict found facts which amounted to usury, though not finding the corrupt argument in technical words. Gibson v. Fristoe, 1 Call (Va.) 72; 1 Am. Dec. 502. And in State v. Fuller, 1 Bay. (S. Car.) 245; 1 Am. Dec. 610, it was resolved that if a special verdict states the passage of a forged note, knowing of the forgery, it is sufficient to warrant a judgment of conviction, though such finding does not express that it was done with fraudulent intent, for the fraudulent intention springs out of the knowledge of the forgery as a natural and legal consequence.

Issues Ignored.—It has been held that where a special verdict, not defective on its face, fails to determine all the issues by the facts found, such issues as are ignored must be regarded as not sustained by the party on whom rests the burden of proof. Graham v. State, 66 Ind. 386; Jones v. Baird, 76 Ind. 164; Henderson v. Dickey, 76 Ind. 264; Lafayette v. Allen, 81 Ind. 166; Glantz v. South Bend, 106 Ind. 305; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Hart, 119 Ind. 273; Brazil, etc., Coal Co. v. Hoodlet, 129 Ind. 327; Davis v. Schmidt (Ind. App. 1892), 31 N. E. Rep. 840; Evansville, etc., R. Co. v. Charlton, 6 Ind. App. 56; Evansville, etc., R. Co. v. Maddux (Ind. 1893), 33 N. E. Rep. 345; Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Tapp, 6 Ind. App. 304.

An objection that a special verdict, which is otherwise sufficient, does not cover the issues in the cause, or so far covers them that the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment, is not presented by a motion for a venire facias de novo, but by a motion for a new trial or by a motion for judgment on the verdict. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Hart, 119 Ind. 273.

A special verdict should contain a finding by the jury upon every material fact in issue necessary to state the plaintiff's cause of action, or the defendant's defense upon which there is evidence. There should be no finding upon immaterial facts, nor upon facts not within the issue. A failure to find upon to render judgment.¹ When a verdict is deficient in this respect, it has been held that the court may direct the jury to retire for any material fact in issue, is equivalent to a finding against the party upon whom the burden of proof rests to establish such fact. Brazil, etc., Coal Co. v. Hoodlet, 129 Ind. 327.

1. Thus, where the carrying away and disposing of the slave of another constitutes no offense under the statute, unless the owner is thereby deprived of the use and benefit of the slave, and the verdict does not state that the carrying away was without the owner's consent, no judgment can be rendered on it. State v. Ritchie, 3 La. Ann. 511. See Charleston v. Gadsden, 8 Rich. (S. Car.) 180.

A special verdict finding the defendant guilty of embezzlement of a sum of money less than twenty-five dollars, without more, is insufficient to support a judgment of conviction. It should state that the money was the property of the person named in the indictment, and that the offense was committed in the county in which the court sat, with all other material ingredients of the offense. Huffman v. State, 89 Ala. 33.

When intent is an element of a crime it should be stated. As where a person was charged with obtaining money by false pretense the special verdict omitted to find that the act was done with the intent to defraud. State v. Oakley, 103 N. Car. 408. So, on an indictment for larceny, the jury stated that the defendant obtained a piece of mutton, representing himself as the agent of another person, and saying that he would be back in a few minutes to pay for it. He did not come back immediately, but afterward returned saying the mutton was for his own use and that he would pay for it. The special verdict did not find that the act was done animo furandi and was, therefore, held imperfect. State v. Bray, 89 N. Car. 480. Again, in Jackson v. State, 21 Tex. 668, where proceedings of disbarment were had against an attorney for malpractice, the verdict found him to have abandoned one side of a cause and taken up the other, but did not allege that he did so from any corrupt motive or evil intent, and this was considered a vital omission.

Where an offense consisted in tempting or persuading a slave to leave his master's service, with the design or intent to convey the slave out of the state and deprive the true owner thereof, and the special verdict in the prosecution omitted to state that the facts were done with this intent or design, although from what was stated there was sufficient prima facie evidence of the intent, yet the verdict was set aside. Jones v. State, 2 Swan (Tenn.) 399.

Where the special verdict simply found that the representation made by the defendant was false, but did not find the intent with which the representation was made, it was held to be insufficient, inasmuch as the intent to cheat and defraud the prosecutor is an essential ingredient in the crime of false pretense, and the verdict should have found the fact distinctly one way or the other, either that the defendant made the representation with the intention to cheat, or that he made the statement with an honest conviction of its truth. State v. Blue, 84 N. Car. 807.

On a complaint for selling intoxicating liquor, without any license, appointment, or authority, a special verdict "that the sale was made as set forth in the complaint," or "that defendant made the sale as set forth in the complaint," is not sufficient to warrant a judgment against the defendant, because it does not show that the sale was unauthorized. Com. v. Dooly, 6 Gray (Mass.) 360. And see Com. v. Call, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 513; 32 Am. Dec. 284.

In criminal cases, the county in which the offense was committed may be a necessary element. Thus, for example, upon an indictment for murder the special verdict did not find in what county the murder was committed, and the counsel for the crown argued that the indictment having been found by the grand jury, and the verdict having been rendered by the petty jury of Burton, that fact was sufficient to determine the county, but Buller, J., said: "If all the facts be found, and all those facts be true, yet if they are found in another county than that in which they are laid in the indictment, judgment cannot be given, and, therefore, to enable the court to give judgment, the verdict should find the facts in the same county as is laid in the indictment." Hazel's Case, 1 Leach 372. See further consideration,¹ the defective finding not entitling the accused to a discharge nor operating as an acquittal.²

f. SURPLUSAGE.—If a special verdict, in addition to the facts at issue, contains conclusions of law, or inferences upon the facts in the nature of legal conclusions, facts collateral to or outside of the issue, or evidence of facts instead of the facts themselves, such additional matter is surplusage, and may be ignored by the court;³

also Com. v. Call, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 509; 32 Am. Dec. 284.

Where the defendant was charged with adultery, a verdict was returned, that "The jury find the defendant guilty of having sexual intercourse with Eliza Foster, the person named in the indictment, she at the same time being an unmarried woman and the defendant being a married man and having a lawful wife at the time then living." As the county in which the offense was committed was not stated, the verdict was declared imperfect. Com. v. Call, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 509; 32 Am. Dec. 284.

No facts can be inferred by the court which the jury have not inferred and set forth. Especially is this the case against a defendant in a criminal case. People v. Wells, 8 Mich. 104.

1. When the verdict returned on the trial of a criminal case fails to pronounce affirmatively or negatively on all the facts necessary to enable the court to give judgment, the order of the court should be that the jury retire for further deliberation, but when this order is not made, it does not entitle the defendant to a discharge, but the court may set aside the defective verdict and order a new trial. State v. Arthur, 21 Iowa 322. And see State v. Curtis, 71 N. Car. 56; State v. Wallace, 3 Ired. (N. Car.) 195; State v. Lowry, 74 N. Car. 121.

2. State v. Arthur, 21 Iowa 322; State v. Ritchie, 3 La. Ann. 511.

Contra.—The statement that a verdict, deficient in setting forth the essential elements of the offense charged, does not operate as an acquittal, is contradicted by the decision rendered in State v. Belk, 76 N. Car. 10. Observe the remarks of the court: "It is familiar law," says Rodman, J., in this case, "that nothing can be added to a special verdict by inference. If it omits to set forth any fact essential to constitute the offense charged, it is defective and the defendant must be held acquitted; in like manner, if it shows a defense, the defendant must be acquitted."

Legal Conclusions.—The court is to draw legal conclusions upon the facts; if the jury draw such conclusions, the court may reject that portion of the special verdict and pronounce judgment upon the facts alone. Butler v. Hopper, 1 Wash. (U. S.) 499; Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Bush, 101 Ind. 582; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Balch, 105 Ind. 93; Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Adams, 105 Ind. 151; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Flanagan, 113 Ind. 488. And see Smith v. Inland, 4 Utah 187.

Motion to Strike Out.—If conclusions of law are stated in a special verdict, the court will disregard them, but it is not error to refuse to strike them out. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Frawley, 110 Ind. 18.

Facts in Issue.—A special verdict should be limited to the case made by the pleadings, should find all the facts proven under the issues, and should not embody or state conclusions of law.

and if the verdict, stripped of its superfluity, is yet sufficient to support a judgment either way under the issues, a motion for a venire facias de novo will be overruled.¹

g. FORM—PREPARATION OF.—The jury have nothing to do with the formal preparation of the special verdict. When it is agreed that such a verdict shall be given, the jury merely state their conclusions as to the existence of any fact remaining in doubt, and the verdict is then adjusted as to form by the counsel on both sides under the supervision of the judge.²

Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Adams, 105 Ind. 151; Indiana, etc., R. Co. v. Finnell, 116 Ind. 414; U. S. v. Collier, 3 Blatchf. (U. S.) 325.

In an action of debt brought against a sheriff for the escape of a prisoner who had been in execution at the suit of the plaintiffs, the jury found a special verdict to the effect that the prisoner had returned voluntarily before the suit was brought, and continued that the defendant had not filed with his plea an affidavit that the escape was without his knowledge or consent. It was held that the fact found by the jury that the plea was accompanied by no such affidavit, was a finding not within the issue before them, as they had nothing to do with the legal requisites of the plea, and that this excess was to be rejected as surplusage. Richmond v. Tallmadge, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 307.

Inferential Conclusions.—The jury, in an action of negligence, after stating the facts which occasioned the misfortune, said that, "The conduct of the plaintiff on the occasion of the injury was ordinarily prudent and cautious under the circumstances, and that he did not wholly contribute to the said injury by any fault or negligence on his part, but that said injury was caused mostly by the agent of the defendant, driver of said car." Mitchell, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, observed that, in determining the legal value and quality of the facts found, the paragraph set out was nothing more than inferences on conclusions, drawn by the jury upon the precedent facts, and upon these it was not the province of the jury, either to express opinions or draw conclusions. Conner v. Citizens' St. R. Co., 105 Ind. 62; 55 Am. Rep. 177.

In Rowe v. Huntingdon, Vaughn 77, it was said that, "As a witness may prove the contents of a deed or will, so may a jury find them, the deed or will itself not being found in haec verba. But if a jury by their verdict shall take upon themselves to collect the contents of a deed, and yet by the same verdict find that deed in haec verba, the court is not to regard the collection they have made of the substance of the deed itself."

1. Heyden's Case, 4 Coke 426; U. S. v. Collier, 3 Blatchf. (U. S.) 325; Conner v. Citizens' St. R. Co., 105 Ind. 62; 55 Am. Rep. 177; Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Adams, 105 Ind. 151; Indiana, etc., R. Co. v. Finnell, 116 Ind. 144; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Green, 120 Ind. 367; Terre Haute, etc., R. Co. v. Brunner, 128 Ind. 542; Reeves v. Grotendick, 131 Ind. 107.

Where the jury, in their special verdict, not only find facts but also conclusions of law, the court, in rendering judgment, may look only to the facts, disregarding the conclusions of law. Thus, a special verdict which seems to be incongruous in finding that in any event the defendant was entitled to certain items, and yet declaring that the allowance of such items depended upon conclusions of law to be submitted to the decision of the court, has been construed as not restricting the authority of the court to pass upon the whole subject-matter including those items. U. S. v. Collier, 3 Blatchf. (U. S.) 325.

Opinion of Jury.—The jury in an action of trover, after stating the facts, declared that if a certain usage, alleged by the defendant, was allowed to prevail, the plaintiff could not recover; but the court finding sufficient facts to sustain the claim, disregarded the opinion of the jury and entered judgment on the verdict. Erwin v. Clark, 13 Mich. 10.

2. English Practice.—Under the old English practice a minute or memorandum was made of the facts on which it was desired that the jury should pass, and submitted to the judge for his approval. It was then signed by one counsel for each party, although if all the counsel for one side refused to sign it, the court might still present it to the jury as signed by only one party. After passing through the hands of the jury the finding was entered in the minute book of the clerk, and a copy furnished to counsel. From these minutes it was the duty of the party, at whose request special facts were found, to draw the formal verdict. Either litigant, however, was privileged to do so. The whole proceedings were then entered on the record and argued before the court in bank. 10 Bacon's Abr., "Verdict" D.

Speaking of the present practice in England, it is said, in Stephen on Pleading 91, "that the jury have nothing to do with the formal preparation of the special verdict. When it is agreed that a verdict of that kind is to be given, the jury merely declare their opinion as to any fact remaining in doubt, and then the verdict is adjusted without their further interference. It is settled, under the correction of the judge, by the counsel and attorneys on either side, according to the state of facts as found by the jury, with respect to all particulars on which they have delivered an opinion; and with respect to other particulars, according to the state of facts which it is agreed that they ought to find upon the evidence before them. The special verdict, when its form is thus settled, is, together with the whole proceedings on the trial, then entered on record, and the question of law arising on facts found, is argued before the court in bank, and decided by that court as in case of demurrer." See also 2 Tidd's Practice 897.

American Practice.—Each party may draw up a special verdict in proper form, setting forth such facts as he thinks the evidence establishes and are necessary to be incorporated therein, and have it submitted to the jury for their deliberation. If this is done by both parties, the jury will have before them the proper form, and the state of facts which is claimed to be proved by each party. They may adopt either in whole or in part, or reject both and prepare such a recital of facts as, in their judgment, is warranted by the evidence.

Buskirk, J., delivering the opinion of the court, in Pittsburg, etc., R. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 309, said: "The jury had before them the outline of the facts that each party claimed to have proved upon the trial, and the proper form and manner of stating them, with the instructions of the court and the argument of counsel. The evidence was fresh in their recollections. They were entirely competent to determine what facts had been proved. They were required to find facts from their own convictions, and upon their own responsibility. They had the undoubted right to adopt either draft submitted to them, if they found, as a question of fact, upon their oaths, that it contained the facts; or they had the right to alter or change them to correspond with their recollections of the testimony; or they had the right to prepare a special verdict for themselves. We think that it is the duty of the court, whenever a special verdict is demanded, to give each of the parties the privilege and time required to prepare with care the draft of a special verdict. If either of the parties should refuse to do so, this would in no manner deprive the other party of the right; and the party refusing would have no right to complain that the other party had gained an advantage over him by presenting his views of the evidence to the jury. Jurors are very competent to understand the evidence, find facts and draw conclusions from the facts found; but as a general rule, and especially in complicated cases, they are not equal to the task of preparing a special verdict. They do not know what facts should be found to cover the issues, nor the manner of stating them." See also Hopkins v. Stanley, 43 Ind. 558.

In Pittsburg, etc., R. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 294; 10 Am. Rep. 111, the draft of the special verdict was written out in full by the attorneys for each side, and both forms submitted to the jury with proper instructions from the court. The amount of damages was inserted in the draft prepared by the plaintiff's attorney, was signed by the foreman and returned into court without any other change or alteration.

Supervision of Court.—In Miller v. Shackleford, 4 Dana (Ky.) 264, it is said: "A jury is not expected to be able (especially in a complicated case) to draw up a special verdict without assistance. The facts are to be found upon their own convictions and responsibility; the form of the finding, and its sufficiency as to the extent of the facts embraced, must be looked to by the court."

When a special verdict is demanded, the court has a large discretion in fixing the term and scope of the specific

h. AMENDMENT OF SPECIAL VERDICT.—It seems that a special verdict may be amended so as to be put in proper form in the same manner as a general verdict.¹ However, if the alteration amounts to a substantial variation from the verdict as returned, the consent of the parties to the suit is requisite.²

questions to be submitted; but they must necessarily cover all the controverted issues. Knowlton v. Milwaukee R. Co., 59 Wis. 278. And see Doran v. Ryan, 81 Wis. 63; Herbst Importing Co. v. Burnham, 81 Wis. 408.

The form of the verdict submitted is largely within the discretion of the trial court, and it should see that the questions cover all the controverted issues of fact; otherwise, there must necessarily be a failure to determine such issues, resulting in a mistrial. Pratt v. Peck, 65 Wis. 463.

It is no objection to a special verdict that it is drawn up by counsel in the case, in order to show what facts must be inserted (if found true) and the proper form of stating them, provided that the rights and duties of the jury, the effect of their verdict, etc., is fully explained to them by the court. Miller v. Shackleford, 4 Dana (Ky.) 264.

May Be Drawn by the Court.—In Carlin v. Donegan, 15 Kan. 173, the parties having asked for a special verdict, a form was prepared by the court and submitted to the jury, without the knowledge of the counsel for either party. The jury adopted this form and on appeal the special verdict was sustained.

It was said, however, by Buskirk, J., in Pittsburg, etc., R. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 294; 10 Am. Rep. 111, that "The court should not be required to prepare a special verdict for many reasons. In the first place, the opinion of the court as to what had been proved would have undue influence with the jury. In the next place the court is required to pass upon the form and sufficiency of the special verdict. And in the third place, after the verdict has been returned, the court is frequently required to pass upon motions for venire de novo, new trial, and in arrest of judgment; and this cannot be fairly and satisfactorily done, if the judge has been required to prepare a draft of what he believed had been proved at the trial." And see Germond v. Central Vermont R. Co., 65 Vt. 126.

Should Be Drawn by Counsel.—"The counsel engaged in a trial of a cause, understand the issues involved, the facts necessary to be found to cover the issues, the testimony in the cause, and the requisite form to be adopted. Nor do we think that there is any danger that an attorney would take advantage of his position to deceive or mislead the jury. An attorney acts under the solemnity of an oath, and the responsibility that he owes the court, the jury, his client, and the public; and all these weighty considerations would induce him to act fairly and truthfully in preparing a special verdict. Besides, he knows that if he does not state the facts correctly, the fraud would be discovered by the jury, and would operate to the prejudice of his client and the injury of his cause." Buskirk, J., in Pittsburg, etc., R. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 294; 10 Am. Rep. 111.

Duty of Plaintiff's Counsel.—It is the duty of the plaintiff's counsel to have the special verdict properly drawn up, settled, and entered of record. Wallingford v. Dunlap, 14 Pa. St. 33. And see Percival v. Jones, 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 393.

Every Issuable Fact.—Where the form of the special verdict is prepared before hand by the court or counsel of the parties, and submitted to the jury, it should cover every controverted issuable fact. Hoppe v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 61 Wis. 358; McLimans v. Lancaster, 63 Wis. 604; Pratt v. Peck, 65 Wis. 463.

Positive, Direct, Intelligible.—The questions submitted for a special verdict should admit of positive, direct, and intelligible answers. Murray v. Abbot, 61 Wis. 198.

1. Archibold's Crim. Pl. & Ev. 148; 1 Bishop's Crim. Proc., § 1013, note 9; Quinn v. State, 123 Ind. 59; Crich v. Williamsburg F. Ins. Co., 45 Minn. 444; Sleight v. Hartshorn, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 149. See supra, this title, Amendment of Verdict.

2. Walker v. Dewing, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 520; U. S. v. Bird, 2 Brev. (S. Car.) 85. The court on its own responsibility alone can never amend a special verdict in matter of substance. Archibold's Crim. Pl. & Ev. 148; 1 Bishop's Crim. Proc., § 1013; Rex v. Hayes, 2 Stra. 843;

4. Verdict Subject to Opinion.—It seems that at common law a jury may return a general verdict for the one party or the other, subject to the opinion of the court on a point of law.¹ This is not properly a general, nor yet is it a special verdict,² though some text-writers have designated it a species of the latter class;³ it seems rather to be a hybrid, partaking of the characteristics of both a general and special verdict.

Rex v. Keat, 1 Salk. 47; Walker v. Dewing, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 519; People v. Wells, 8 Mich. 103; Crich v. Williamsburg F. Ins. Co., 45 Minn. 444; Wallingford v. Dunlap, 14 Pa. St. 31; Olhweiller v. Lohmann, 82 Wis. 198.

1. An illustration of this species of verdict is afforded by the case of Castle v. Hobbs, Cro. Car. 21, which was an action of ejectment for lands in which letters patent from the Crown were the basis of contention. Here the jury concluded "that if it were a good patent, then for defendant; if otherwise, then for the plaintiff."

Where a doubtful question of law arises in the trial of a cause, by agreement of counsel it may be reserved and the trial proceed, and a verdict rendered subject to the opinion of the court upon this point of law. Brooks v. Ratcliff, 11 Ired. (N. Car.) 321.

Points of law reserved for the decision of the court on which the fate of the case depends, ought to appear on the record before it is closed. Robinson v. Scotts, 5 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 278.

In the case of McMichen v. Amos, 4 Rand. (Va.) 134, which was an action brought by a slave to recover his freedom, the jury brought in a verdict: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiffs their freedom and one cent damages, subject to the opinion of the court whether the removal of A B with his family, from the State of Maryland to the county of Rockingham in this state, in the month of November, 1800, and the bringing with him the plaintiffs, and the taking the oath prescribed by law within sixty days after his arrival in Rockingham county, by C, the wife of said A B, was a compliance with the law regulating the importation of slaves. If, in the opinion of the court, the law be for the defendant, then we find for the defendant."

2. The court, in McMichen v. Amos, 4 Rand. (Va.) 134, in its observations regarding the verdict set forth above, said: "This is not a special verdict in the usual acceptation of the term; a verdict finding all the facts supposed to belong to the case and referring to the court the decision of the law arising on those facts. The jury do not profess to find all the facts which constitute the case. On the contrary, the finding is a general one that the plaintiffs are free, unless, upon a single point of law reserved, the court shall be of the opinion that the law is for the defendant. There can be no difficulty in comprehending the true nature of a verdict like this, although writers in attempting to name it may not have used terms of the greatest precision."

3. "Another method," says Blackstone, "of finding a species of special verdict, is when the jury find a verdict generally for the plaintiff, but subject, nevertheless, to the opinion of the judge of the court above, on a special case, stated by the counsel on both sides with regard to a matter of law." 3 Bl. Com. 378.

Pennsylvania.—Citing this portion of Blackstone the court, in Wallingford v. Dunlap, 14 Pa. St. 33, said: "But this proceeding has gone out of practice; perhaps it never existed in Pennsylvania."

However, in Watsonstown Car Co. v. Elmsport Lumber Co., 99 Pa. St. 605, a general verdict subject to a point reserved was rendered, and in this connection it was held that the question thus reserved must be distinctly stated, and the facts on which it arises must either be admitted on the record, or found by the jury. See also Wilson v. Steamboat Tuscarora, 25 Pa. St. 317; Ferguson v. Wright, 61 Pa. St. 258.

In 2 Tidd's Practice 898, it is said: "Another method of finding a species of special verdict is when the jury find a verdict generally for either party, but subject, nevertheless, to the opinion of the court, on a special case, stated by the counsel on both sides with regard to a matter of law."

Difference of Nomenclature.—In 1 Archibold's Practice 192, it appears: "Also, where a difficulty in point

5. Special Findings—a. AT COMMON LAW.—Under the common law, as it existed in England, a jury, possessing the unquestioned right to return, at their discretion, either a general or a special verdict, could not be compelled to do more, the court having no power to require, in addition to a general verdict, findings as to the existence of particular facts.¹

of law arises, the jury may, instead of finding a special verdict find a general verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the judge, or the court above, on a special case stated by the counsel on both sides in regard to a matter of law."

In an action of waste, a verdict finding for the plaintiff and assessing damages is, nevertheless, a general verdict, though it is subject to the opinion of the court, whether upon certain facts stated the plaintiff can maintain the action. Dejarnatte v. Allen, 5 Gratt. (Va.) 499.

In New York, the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1185, provides that where, upon the trial of an issue by a jury, the case presents only questions of law, the judge may direct the jury to render a verdict subject to the opinion of the court.

The provision of the code which authorizes the verdict to be directed subject to the opinion of the court, applies only to cases where, the facts being found or conceded, it only remains to pronounce the law. Whitaker v. Merrill, 28 Barb. (N. Y.) 526; Sackett v. Spencer, 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 180; Bell v. Shibley, 33 Barb. (N. Y.) 610; People v. Ransom, 56 Barb. (N. Y.) 514; Briggs v. Merrill, 58 Barb. (N. Y.) 389; Wilcox v. Hoch, 62 Barb. (N. Y.) 509; Brooklyn City Bank v. McChesney, 20 N. Y. 240; Purchase v. Matteson, 25 N. Y. 211; Byrnes v. Cohoes, 67 N. Y. 204; Biddlecom v. Newton, 13 Hun (N. Y.) 582; Purchase v. New York Exch. Bank, 10 Bosw. (N. Y.) 564; Brower v. Orser, 2 Bosw. (N. Y.) 365.

In Howell v. Adams, 68 N. Y. 316, the trial court directed a verdict subject to the opinion of the general term. This was held to be no error by the court of appeals, as there was no conflict of evidence as to the material facts, nor any doubtful inferences to be deduced from the facts proved, nor any exception but to the denial of the motion for nonsuit made when the plaintiff rested, and also at the close of the whole evidence.

In Whitesboro Fire Department v. Thomson, 16 Hun (N. Y.) 474, the order directing the verdict subject to the opinion of the court was held to be illegal, inasmuch as exception had been taken by each party to the rulings admitting or excluding evidence, and the defendants had also excepted to the refusal of the judge to submit to the jury certain questions of fact. See also Hall v. Hall, 13 Hun (N. Y.) 306.

Where a verdict is ordered subject to the opinion of the court, without qualification, exceptions cannot be heard, and the only question before the general term is, which party is entitled to final judgment on the uncontroverted facts. For that reason it is improper to direct a verdict subject to the opinion of the court where exceptions have been taken on the trial or the facts are controverted. Durant v. Abendroth, 69 N. Y. 148; 25 Am. Rep. 158.

On Exceptions.—A disputed question of fact, conflicting evidence in relation thereto, and exceptions to the exclusion of evidence, prevent the court at a special term from sending the case to be heard in the first instance at the general term unless on exceptions. Cobb v. Cornish, 16 N. Y. 602; Gilbert v. Beach, 16 N. Y. 606; Brower v. Orser, 2 Bosw. (N. Y.) 365; Sackett v. Spencer, 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 180.

Inferences in Support of Verdict.—When a verdict is taken subject to the opinion of the court, every inference which a jury would be justified in drawing from the evidence, the court will draw in support of the verdict. Williams v. North America Ins. Co., 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 345.

1. In Devizes v. Clark, 3 Ad. & El. 506; 30 E. C. L. 135, it was held that the jury have a right to find a general verdict (the case being tried on the general issue) and they cannot be required to find a particular fact. The same principle was recognized in Davies v. Lowndes, 1 Bing. N. Cas. 619. Upon the trial at bar of a writ of right the tenant claimed to hold the property in dispute under a will, but the court, with a view to render superfluous any ques-

The practice of having the jury find specially on one or more questions of fact, at the time their general verdict is returned, for the purpose of exhibiting the grounds upon which it is founded, seems to have been accorded its first distinct recognition in some of the New England States, as the offspring of practical utility and convenience, rather than the creature of legislative enactment.¹

In these jurisdictions it is held that the presiding judge may interrogate the jury, when they return their general verdict, as to the grounds upon which they found it,² or may instruct them to return with their general verdict findings as to certain facts, the existence of which is material to the rights of the parties, tion as to the effect of the will, requested the members of the grand assize, before considering their general verdict, to find whether or not the demandant, who claimed as heir of the blood of the person last seised, had established her pedigree to their satisfaction. The members of the grand assize found a general verdict for the tenant and refused to express any opinion upon the demandant's pedigree, and, though a bill of exceptions was tendered on other grounds, neither the counsel nor the court excepted to the general verdict.

1. The case of Hix v. Drury, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 302, is the first instance of this practice which we have noticed. In this case, the court held that the jury, by their oath to give a true verdict, were as much bound to make true answers in court touching their verdict as if they had been sworn specifically for that purpose.

2. Lawler v. Earle, 5 Allen (Mass.) 22; Spoor v. Spooner, 12 Met. (Mass.) 281; Mair v. Bassett, 117 Mass. 356; First Congregational Church v. Holyoke Mut. Ins. Co. (Mass. 1893), 33 N. E. Rep. 572; Smith v. Putney, 18 Me. 91; Dyer v. Greene, 23 Me. 464; Gordon v. Wilkins, 20 Me. 134; Walker v. Bailey, 65 Me. 354; Walker v. Sawyer, 13 N. H. 106; Smith v. Powers, 15 N. H. 546; Johnson v. Haverhill, 35 N. H. 74; Clough v. Clough, 26 N. H. 24; Dearborn v. Newhall, 63 N. H. 301; Morris v. Haverhill, 65 N. H. 89.

At the close of the charge of the judge in Mair v. Bassett, 117 Mass. 356, he said to the jury: "I shall, when you come in, if you find for the plaintiff, ask you upon which count you find, and will thank you to be prepared to state. If you find for the defendant, you need not say anything more." When the jury returned into court with their verdict, which was for the defendant, they also, in answer to a question from the judge, said they found their verdict on the ground that no loan or payment of money had been made to the defendant, etc. The plaintiff excepted to this question, but it was held by the appellate court that the presiding judge, in the exercise of his discretion, could properly inquire of the jury the grounds upon which they found their verdict for the defendant. He was not even precluded from doing so, because he stated to them, at the conclusion of his charge, that if they found for the plaintiff, he should ask them to say upon which count, but if they found for the defendant, they need say nothing more.

Inquiry—When Made.—In Maine, in the case of Smith v. Putney, 6 Me. 91, it was held that the inquiry to determine whether the verdict of a jury be conformable to legal principles, must be made at the time of the return of the verdict. In New Hampshire, it has been held in Clough v. Clough, 26 N. H. 24, and Dearborn v. Newhall, 63 N. H. 301 that this may be done after the jury have been discharged from the case and have separated.

The object of these interrogations is that it may be determined, by the answers elicited, whether or not the case has been properly tried. Pierce v. Woodward, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 206; Parrott v. Thacher, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 431; Walker v. Sawyer, 13 N. H. 106; Smith v. Powers, 15 N. H. 546; Clough v. Clough, 26 N. H. 24; Johnson v. Haverhill, 35 N. H. 74; Dearborn v. Newhall, 63 N. H. 301; Norris v. Haverhill, 65 N. H. 89.

constituting the premises from which the conclusion of the jury is derived.¹

Where the special findings are irreconcilably inconsistent with the general verdict, the latter is thereby rendered void;² likewise,

1. In Barstow v. Sprague, 40 N. H. 27, it was held to be the proper course for the judge who tries the cause to direct the jury, against the objection of the defendant, to return, with a general verdict, answers to specific questions submitted to them, and it was held that this might be done as well against the objection of both parties. Richardson v. Weare, 62 N. H. 80. See Florence Mach. Co. v. Daggett, 135 Mass. 582; M. E. Parish v. Clarke, 74 Me. 110.

In Wheeler v. Schroeder, 4 R. I. 383, it was held that where there were two or more grounds of action or defense under the same issue, it was proper for the court, in its discretion, to direct the jury specially to declare upon what ground their verdict was found, in order to ascertain whether a particular instruction of the court affected the verdict.

New York.—This practice existed also in New York, before the adoption of the code making express provision for it, for in McMasters v. Westchester County Mut. Ins. Co., 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 379, the course of the trial judge in submitting questions to the jury, with the request that they might be answered separately in the verdict which they should render, was approved by the supreme court. It was held that such practice was not uncommon, and that it frequently avoided the trouble and expense of a new trial.

Effect of Special Findings.—It seems that the special findings of the jury, under certain circumstances, may cure irregularities occurring at the trial, by showing that the alleged error could not have affected the jury in the rendition of their general verdict. Thus, in Lawler v. Earle, 5 Allen (Mass.) 22, which was an action for slander, and in which a verdict had been rendered for the defendant on the ground that the alleged slanderous words were privileged, questions arising in the course of the trial respecting the admission or exclusion of evidence, in reference to the truth of the words spoken, and as to the defense of justification on the ground of the truth of the statements made by the defendant, were by the special finding of the jury rendered immaterial.

Another instance of this remedial effect is afforded by the case of Spurr v. Shelburne, 131 Mass. 429, where, in an action against a town to recover for injury to the plaintiff's horse sustained by falling into a ditch in the highway, the defect charged being the want of suitable railings, it appeared that the animal left the wrought and traveled part of the road and proceeded some twenty-five or thirty feet along a ditch outside of the highway, fell in and was injured. The jury found for the defendant and stated that on account of the nature of the land and the distance of the ditch from the traveled way, that no railing was necessary: It was held that this finding rendered immaterial a question as to the correctness of an instruction, that if no railing was reasonably required at the place where the horse left the traveled way, the town would not be liable for want of a railing at the place where the accident happened.

2. Richardson v. Weare, 62 N. H. 80. And see Walker v. Sawyer, 13 N. H. 191; Willard v. Stevens, 24 N. H. 271.

Where Not Inconsistent.—Where the jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff and a special finding not inconsistent therewith, it was held that the judge, in his discretion, might set aside the special finding and allow the general verdict to stand. Monies v. Lynn, 119 Mass. 273.

Where a jury render a general verdict and also find specially in response to a question by the court, the general verdict will not be set aside on account of the alleged obscurity and uncertainty of the special finding, where the special finding does not qualify the general verdict, and where it appears from the bill of exceptions that the special finding was put into the form in which it appeared of record, through misapprehension and mistake. Roche v. Ladd, 1 Allen (Mass.) 436.

Where the jury returned with their general verdict, a special finding, without direction of the court, which is immaterial to the issue and not inconsistent with the general verdict, such special finding should be disregarded, and a judgment rendered on the general verdict. Billings Slate, etc., Co. v. Hanger, 62 Vt. 160.

where the verdict is shown, by the answers to the interrogatories, to be founded on unsubstantial grounds, or the result of misconception, it will not be allowed to stand;¹ in general, this practice has been held not to be dependent upon the consent of the parties or their counsel, but as resting within the sound discretion of the court, to be exercised for the promotion of justice or the prevention of unnecessary litigation.²

Withdrawal of Interrogatories.—In Florence Mach. Co. v. Daggett, 135 Mass. 582, it was held that where questions in writing have been submitted to a jury, and the jury return their general verdict ignoring the questions, it is within the discretion of the presiding judge to withdraw the interrogatories and accept the verdict as returned.

1. Pierce v. Woodward, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 206; Parrott v. Thacher, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 431.

2. Discretionary with Court.—It is within the exercise of the discretion of the presiding justice to put inquiries to the jury, as to the grounds upon which they found their verdict, and the answers of the foreman assented to by his fellows, may be made a part of the record and will have the effect of special findings of the facts stated by him, and no exception lies to the exercise of this discretion. Spurr v. Shelburne, 131 Mass. 429; Lawler v. Earle, 5 Allen (Mass.) 22. And see Spoor v. Spooner, 12 Met. (Mass.) 281; Mair v. Bassett, 117 Mass. 356; Barstow v. Sprague, 40 N. H. 27.

The court, in its discretion and for the purpose of promoting justice or restraining useless litigation, has a right to inquire of the jury, when they return a verdict, upon which of several grounds taken by the parties, the verdict was based, or the rule upon which they assessed damages, though it is often said that this power is to be exercised very sparingly and with great caution. Walker v. Bailey, 65 Me. 354.

Consent of Parties.—In Dorr v. Fenno, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 525, Morton, J., in reference to this practice of questioning the jury in relation to their verdict, observed: "This practice does not depend upon the consent of the parties. The presiding justice has a discretionary power to make such inquiries of the jury in relation to the business before them as the proper administration of justice may require. Such has ever been the usage of this court. It sometimes happens that the verdict first returned by the jury is not entirely certain, or does not precisely meet the issue joined or some of the issues do not appear to be definitely found. In such cases, before the verdict can be drawn in form, it is not only proper, but necessary, to ascertain from the jury the real meaning of their finding, that, when the verdict is affirmed, it may with certainty express the true intent of the jury, or that the jury may again be sent out for further deliberation, if any material question appears not to have been determined by them. And even after the verdict has been affirmed and recorded, it may be important to the due administration of justice or to prevent unnecessary litigation, to ascertain whether certain points have been determined, and how they have been determined. It is not uncommon to have several grounds relied upon in a trial, when it cannot be ascertained from the verdict itself upon which ground it was found. In such cases, the court will make the proper inquiries of the jury, and if it appear to have been found upon an illegal principle, or if the jury did not all agree upon any one ground, the verdict may be set aside."

In Lawler v. Earle, 5 Allen (Mass.) 22, it is held that the presiding judge may inquire of the jury on what grounds they find their verdict, in the absence of, and without the knowledge or consent of, the parties or their counsel.

Notwithstanding the objection of both parties, the court may direct the jury to return, with their general verdict, answers to specific questions. Richardson v. Weare, 62 N. H. 80.

New Hampshire.—In Walker v. Sawyer, 13 N. H. 191, a distinction is made between the practice of submitting questions to the jury before they retire for the consideration of their verdict, for the purpose of having particular facts found, and that of questioning the jury upon the return of their general verdict as to the grounds upon which they proceeded. The right of the court, in its discretion, to resort to the latter

b. BY STATUTE.—Statutory provisions in many of the states have been made for the regulation of the practice relating to special findings, a reference to which, together with the citation of cases adjudicating numerous questions arising in its operation and application, will be found in the notes below.¹

practice, is expressly approved on the authority of several Massachusetts cases, and one Maine adjudication; but upon the consideration of an English case, Devizes v. Clark, 3 Ad. & El. 506; 30 E. C. L. 135, it is held that where the trial is upon the general issue, the court cannot submit a particular question of fact to the jury to be found and returned by their verdict, except by the consent of the parties. Willard v. Stevens, 24 N. H. 271; Richardson v. Weare, 62 N. H. 80.

Some time afterward, in Johnson v. Haverhill, 35 N. H. 74, another distinction is made; namely, that the rule requiring the consent of parties for the submission of questions as to particular facts, when the trial is upon the general issue, applies where the direction of the court is to return the special findings instead of a general verdict; that where the direction is to return special findings with the general verdict, no consent is required; that a party cannot be permitted to lie by and await the result, and then raise his objection, is certain.

Consent Presumed.—In cases where consent of parties is necessary, it will be presumed, unless, when such questions are proposed to be submitted, objection is made. Allen v. Aldrich, 29 N. H. 63; Walker v. Sawyer, 13 N. H. 191; Willard v. Stevens, 24 N. H. 271; Barstow v. Sprague, 40 N. H. 27; Richardson v. Weare, 62 N. H. 80.

In Walker v. Sawyer, 13 N. H. 191, the supreme court said that usually, when the court proposes to give other than general instructions, the intention is stated to the parties, that objection, if any, may be suggested. But this is not necessary, as the matter is one of practice, and the objection, if raised, could be obviated at the time, by a change of the instructions from special to general. Therefore, the objection should be stated before the case goes to the jury.

1. Object of These Statutes.—Referring to the Indiana statute on the subject, the court, in Buntin v. Rose, 16 Ind. 210, said: "Before the enactment of our statute enabling a party to ask that a jury shall respond to interrogatories, it was difficult to have placed upon the record of a trial, the component parts of, or elements which entered into and formed, the verdict of a jury. This was felt and considered as operating injuriously in many instances, because of the current of decisions in this court for many years, to the effect that a verdict in a civil case should not be disturbed on the evidence where there was any proof tending to sustain it." Cole v. Boyd, 47 Mich. 98; Rombauer, J., in Benton v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 25 Mo. App. 156.

Difference Between Special Findings and Special Verdicts.—In Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Dunleavy, 129 Ill. 143, Bailey, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, used this language: "It is manifest, of course, that a special finding by a jury upon material questions of fact submitted to them, under the provisions of the statute, is not a special verdict, but an essentially different proceeding. A special verdict cannot be found where there is a general verdict, but the special findings of fact provided for by the statute can be required only in case a general verdict is rendered. But while this is so, much light in relation to special findings upon questions of fact, and their office and objects, may be derived from the rules applicable to special verdicts. Both forms of verdict are provided for by the same statute, and they must, therefore, be construed as being in pari materia. In giving construction to the statute, the first, and perhaps the most important, question relates to the scope and meaning of the phrase, 'material question or questions of fact.' May such questions relate to mere evidentiary facts, or should they be restricted to those ultimate facts upon which the rights of the parties directly depend? Evidently the latter. Not only does this conclusion follow from analogy to the rules relating to special verdicts, but it arises from the very nature of the case. It would clearly be of no avail to require the jury to find mere matters of evidence, because, after being found, they would in no way aid the court in determining what judgment to render. Doubtless a probative fact from which the ultimate fact necessarily results would be material, for there the court could infer such ultimate fact as a matter of law. But where the probative fact is merely prima facie evidence of the fact to be proved, the proper deductions to be drawn from the probative fact presents a question of fact and not of law, requiring further action by the jury, and it cannot, therefore, be made the basis of any action by the court. Requiring the jury to find such probative fact is merely requiring them to find the evidence and not the facts, and results in nothing which can be of the slightest assistance to the parties or the court in arriving at the proper determination of the suit."

While, as has been stated, the form of a verdict, subject to certain qualifications, is immaterial, it is eminently proper that approved and established precedents should be regarded. For this purpose, a reference to some reliable book of forms should be made.

Technical Objections Disregarded.—In Pickett v. Richet, 2 Bibb (Ky.) 178, the court said: "Verdicts are to be favorably construed, and technical objections to the want of form in wording them disregarded," and in Lindsay v. State, 1 Tex. App. 327, Ector, J., delivering the opinion of the court, observed, that "technical objections to form are to be disregarded." See also Mays v. Lewis, 4 Tex. 38.

Where the jury, in their verdict, found the defendant guilty and assessed her punishment at the sum of five dollars, it was, nevertheless, held not to be invalid for using the word "punishment" instead of the word "fine." Beggs v. State, 122 Ind. 54.

"We, the Jury, Believe."—A verdict, "we, the jury, believe" has been upheld, though the words, "we, the jury, find" are admittedly better form. The court held that the expressions are substantially equivalent, inasmuch as what the jury find, or what they believe is alike derived from the evidence, and either form of expression amounts to the same thing. Patton v. Gregory, 21 Tex. 513.

Form—Debt—Trespass.—It is held, in Scudder v. Bloomfield, 3 N. J. L. 950, that a verdict in action of debt must not be in form of that in trespass; and in Wheeler v. Allen, 49 Barb. (N. Y.) 460, it is maintained that a verdict in form as if action were on the case, is totally unwarranted in an action for the claim and delivery of personal property.

Misconception as to Nature of Action.—An action having been brought in debt under a penal act, for $96, for cutting down twelve trees, a verdict for $8.41 was held insufficient, the jury evidently considering the action as one of trespass. Scudder v. Bloomfield, 3 N. J. L. 950.

Criminal Cases.—Though a verdict in a criminal case may be informal, it is nevertheless valid if it can be clearly understood as a general verdict of guilty or not guilty. People v. McCarty, 48 Cal. 557; People v. Welch, 49 Cal. 177; People v. Buckley, 49 Cal. 241; People v. Perdue, 49 Cal. 425.

Nor is it necessary that the verdict should state the name of the prisoner or the specified crime for which he is condemned. State v. Faulk, 30 La. Ann. 831; State v. Adam, 31 La. Ann. 717; Cooper v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1893), 20 S. W. Rep. 979.

In Missouri, this practice prevails as regards specification of the crime, with the qualification that where the conviction is of a crime inferior in degree to that charged in the indictment, the offense of which the defendant is found guilty should be set forth in the verdict. State v. Matrassey, 47 Mo. 295.

But the defendant must in some manner be designated as the guilty party, for in Williams v. State, 6 Neb. 334, a verdict, "We, the jury in this case, being duly impaneled and sworn, do find and say that — is guilty of manslaughter," was declared void for failing to comply with this requirement.

Failure to Name Cause.—In Miller v. Morgan, 143 Mass. 25, where the jury merely brought in a verdict for the plaintiff without naming the cause, an objection was taken thereto for this reason. The court denounced the exception as frivolous and said: "Although it does not mention the name of the case in which it was rendered, the record of the court supplies this omission, as it shows that it was rendered in open court as the verdict in this case, and was filed in the case as such verdict."

Objections to—When Taken.—Objections to form should be taken when the verdict is returned; such objections cannot be raised for the first time on writ of error. Davis v. People, 50 Ill. 199.

Before It Is Recorded.—Objections to the form of a verdict should be taken before it is received and recorded. Algier v. Maria, 14 Cal. 170; Alhambra, etc., Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 598.

Instructing Jury as to Form.—See Montag v. People, 141 Ill. 75.

Formulation by Prosecuting Attorney.—In the case of Brantley v. State, 87 Ga. 149, which was a prosecution for a felony, it was allowed the solicitor general, at the request of the jury, to reduce their verdict of conviction to proper form.

Substantial Correctness.—In respect to verdicts, it seems that substantial correctness will satisfy all legal requirements. Riggs v. Maltby, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 88; Emery v. Osgood, 1 Allen (Mass.) 244; Jones v. King, 30 Minn. 368; DeFord v. Furniss, 43 Miss. 132; Morrissey v. Schindler, 18 Neb. 672; Kolb v. Bankhead, 18 Tex. 228; Hart v. State, 38 Tex. 382; Allard v. Lamirande, 29 Wis. 502; Wausau Boom Co. v. Plumer, 49 Wis. 118.

Form Furnished by Court.—It is not necessary that the jury be furnished with a form for a verdict by the court. Territory v. McFarlane (N. Mex. 1894), 37 Pac. Rep. 1111.

Abbreviations may be employed,¹ or words may be even omitted,² without rendering the verdict fatally defective, subject to the qualification just stated.

The law does not require that jurors shall be orthographeists or philologists; hence, bad spelling,³ the misuse of words,

1. Figures with Dollar Mark.—A verdict in figures, with the symbolical prefix denoting dollars, is good. Mayson v. Sheppard, 12 Rich. (S. Car.) 254.

In Stout v. Hopping, 6 N. J. L. 125, it was contended that the verdict should be set aside on the ground that it was entered in figures. The court declined to notice this objection, stating that as the judgment thereon was entered in words at length, it cured the irregularity in form.

2. Omission of Words.—In Hopkins v. Orr, 124 U. S. 510, the omission of the word "dollars" was held to be not such a defect as to prevent the rendering of judgment according to the manifest intent of the jury, and Jones v. State, 7 Tex. App. 103, decides that it is not a valid objection to a verdict that it omits to say "confinement in" the penitentiary.

An Iowa case, State v. Lee, 80 Iowa 75, is authority for the statement that the omission of the word "find" is immaterial, while in Shaw v. State, 2 Tex. App. 487, exactly the reverse is held.

Omission of "Intent."—Where, upon the trial of an indictment for the statutory offense of "an assault with a deadly weapon with intent to inflict bodily injury," the jury returned a verdict of "assault with a deadly weapon to inflict bodily injury" (omitting the words "with intent"), the finding was held not to be materially defective. State v. Collyer, 17 Nev. 275; Jenkins v. State (Ga. 1893), 17 S. E. Rep. 693.

3. State v. Ross, 32 La. Ann. 855; State v. Smith, 33 La. Ann. 1414; State v. Wilson, 40 La. Ann. 751; Kellum v. State, 64 Miss. 226; State v. McNamara, 100 Mo. 100; Taylor v. State, 5 Tex. App. 569; Haines v. State, 7 Tex. App. 32; Curry v. State, 7 Tex. App. 91; McMillan v. State, 7 Tex. App. 100; McCoy v. State, 7 Tex. App. 379; Wilson v. State, 12 Tex. App. 481; Reynolds v. State, 17 Tex. App. 413; Pertain v. State, 22 Tex. App. 100; Harwell v. State, 22 Tex. App. 251; Shelton v. State, 27 Tex. App. 443; Pharer v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1892), 20 S. W. Rep. 555; Birdwell v. State (Tex.

Crim. App. 1892), 20 S. W. Rep. 556; Stepp v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. App. 349; Pace v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1892), 20 S. W. Rep. 762; Parks v. Turner, 12 How. (U. S.) 39; Lincoln v. Iron Co., 103 U. S. 412; Snyder v. U. S., 112 U. S. 216.

"The law does not require jurors to be philologists," said the court, in State v. Smith, 33 La. Ann. 1414. "All that the law requires is their ability to appreciate the facts and apply the law. When they have done that and expressed their sense in an intelligible and unequivocal form, the law is satisfied." In this case, a verdict of guilty of "mansluder" was held to be a sufficient verdict.

To the same effect, are the cases of Parks v. Turner, 12 How. (U. S.) 39; Lincoln v. Cambria Iron Co., 103 U. S. 412; Snyder v. U. S., 112 U. S. 216, holding that bad English will not vitiate a verdict where the intention and finding of the jury, upon the issue submitted to them, is clearly manifested.

In State v. Ross, 32 La. Ann. 855, the verdict was: "Gilty without capitel purnish," but the court held that it was not illegal and approved the judgment; and a verdict reading, "we, the joshwrys find the defendant gilty" was held to be not substantially defective, in Shelton v. State, 27 Tex. App. 443.

A verdict, "We, the jury, find the accused guilty with and assault by sut-inge with intent to murder," was upheld in State v. Wilson, 40 La. Ann. 751, as the supreme court declared that it was clear that the idea the jury intended to convey was, that they found the prisoner guilty of an assault with intent to murder, and they only clothed that idea with inartificial verbiage.

"Penitentiary."—The spelling of the word "penitentiary" seems to have proved an obstacle which the learning of many juries has been unable to surmount, but as their attempt rarely fails to betray their intent, such errors have not been regarded as serious. Some of the cases in which this mistake has been made are, State v. McNamara, 100 Mo. 100; Haines v. State, 7 Tex. App. 32; McMillan v. State, 7 Tex. App.

and grammatical errors form no substantial ground for objection.¹

2. Oral Verdict.—Under the common law, the result of the jury's deliberations is usually declared orally by a member of the jury;² a practice originating, perhaps, in the general illiteracy of jurors.³ The announcement is most frequently made by a designated spokesman, called the foreman, the other jurors being presumed to consent to the verdict unless they express their dissatisfaction when it is rendered.⁴

3. Written Verdict.—Statutes to the effect that verdicts shall 100; Reynolds v. State, 17 Tex. App. 413. In the last mentioned case the court observed, in regard to the insubstantial and immaterial character of an error in spelling, that neither bad spelling nor bad grammar would vitiate a verdict when its meaning was clear. Technical and insubstantial objections to a verdict would not be considered in determining its sufficiency, and the omission of the letter "i" forming the second syllable of the word penitentiary, was immaterial.

1. When the sense is clear, neither bad spelling nor bad grammar will vitiate a verdict. Taylor v. State, 5 Tex. App. 569.

Where a verdict assessed a "fine" against the defendant, it was held that the context clearly enough showed that the word was intended for "fine," and such construction was adopted. Bland v. State, 4 Tex. App. 15.

In Dillon v. Rogers, 36 Tex. 152, however, a verdict finding a certain sum as "impunitive" damages was pronounced void on the ground of unintelligibility.

Transposition of a Letter.—Where the jury, in entitling their verdict, by the transposition of a letter made the name "Framness" read "Farmness," it was held to be an error so slight as to be immaterial. State v. Framness, 43 Minn. 490.

2. Roberts v. State, 14 Ga. 18.

It is maintained, in State v. Jenkins, 43 La. Ann. 917, to be an elementary principle that a verdict may be validly rendered orally in open court, even where no foreman is appointed. So, also, when it is returned written, though unsigned either by the foreman or any member of the jury, or not containing the name of the accused, or describing the offense charged. State v. Moore, 8 Rob. (La.) 525; State v. Briscoe, 30 La. Ann. 434; State v.

Smith, 33 La. Ann. 1416; State v. Howard, 34 La. Ann. 369; State v. Simon, 37 La. Ann. 569.

In State v. Ross, 32 La. Ann. 854, Todd, J., said: "The law does not require even in capital cases that the jury should reduce their verdict to writing. It is sufficient if it is delivered orally." And see State v. Daniel, 31 La. Ann. 96; State v. Nolan, 8 Rob. (La.) 513.

Criminal Cases.—In Lord v. State, 16 N. H. 326; 41 Am. Dec. 391, the court said: "The custom in criminal cases is for the jury to render their verdict of guilty or not guilty orally and in open court, and a record to be made of it. . . . The written verdict which the foreman undertook to make, was irregular and was correctly rejected by the court below." See also Com. v. Duffee, 100 Mass. 146.

3. See Nisbet, J., in Roberts v. State, 14 Ga. 18.

4. In Blum v. Pate, 20 Cal. 69, the court disposed of the objection that the assent to the verdict was expressed by the foreman and not by the jurors themselves, by stating that "there is nothing in it." The court continued: "The jurors, acting as a body, speak through their foreman. . . . His assent is conclusive upon all, unless a disagreement be expressed at the time."

Where the jury were inquired of by the judge whether they had agreed upon a verdict, their foreman answered that they had, and handed the verdict to the judge, who read it aloud and then accepted it, but it was not otherwise ascertained by inquiry of the jury, or in any other way, that they had all concurred in the verdict, it was held that in the absence of any objection made at the time, to this mode of rendering and taking the verdict, it was sufficiently authenticated. Raymond v. Bell, 18 Conn. 81. See also Roberts v. State, 14 Ga. 18.

be reduced to writing exist in some of the states.¹ Whether such enactments are peremptory, or directory only, depends upon the construction which they have received from the judicatures whose proceedings they control.²

Signing Verdict.—As there is no rule of the common law requiring that a verdict shall be in writing, naturally there is none that it shall be signed.³ In some of the states this practice is regulated by statute,⁴ generally in connection with a direction

1. See statutes of Iowa, Indiana, Kentucky, Missouri, Ohio, Texas, and other states.

In Griffin v. Larned, 111 Ill. 432, it was held that a verdict may be reduced to writing and signed by the jury, or it may be delivered ore tenus by the foreman. The validity of a verdict does not depend upon its being reduced to writing and signed by the members of the jury, but whatever may be pronounced as the verdict by the jury in open court, whether in writing or verbally through the foreman, is to be regarded as the verdict of the jury.

In Foreign Language.—In Walsh v. Barrow, 3 La. Ann. 265, the verdict was returned written in French, the jury being able to write only in that language. In this form the verdict was received by the court, translated into English under its direction, read to the jury as translated, and as read assented to by them, signed by the foreman, and recorded in their presence. This was held to be the proper proceeding.

Written with Lead Pencil.—It seems that a statute requiring a verdict to be in writing will be satisfied by a verdict in lead pencil. Ellis v. State, 30 Tex. App. 601. And see State v. Anderson (La. 1893), 12 So. Rep. 737.

Verdict Written by Officer.—Where it appeared that after the jury had arrived at a verdict of guilty, one of the jurors had an officer of the court write out the verdict at his dictation, which verdict was returned by the jury, it was held that while this was a censurable practice, the verdict should not be disturbed, as it did not appear that it had anything to do with the result reached, or that the defendant's rights were impaired. Territory v. Edie (N. Mex. 1892), 30 Pac. Rep. 851.

Written on Quashed Indictment.—Where a verdict of guilty is inadvertently written by the jury on a quashed indictment, instead of on the indictment on which the prosecution is based, it is not for that reason void, as it is not essential that the verdict be written, or when written that it be signed or put on the indictment. State v. Jenkins, 43 La. Ann. 917.

2. The supreme court of Iowa, for example, in Morrison v. Overton, 20 Iowa 465, regards the section of the code of that state, providing that "the verdict must be written and signed," etc., as directory, and not peremptory. A similar view has been taken by the judiciaries of other states. In Sage v. Brown, 34 Ind. 464, a contrary position was maintained.

3. Boyle, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court in Com. v. Ripperdon, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 195, said: "We are not apprised of any law requiring the verdict of a petit jury, either in a criminal or civil case, to be signed; and it would, no doubt, be good without a signature; yet we know that it is the usual practice for one of the jury to sign it, and very often as foreman. But most certainly the omission of this circumstance would not render a verdict void."

4. In Indiana, for instance, a statute has been passed directing that the verdict of a jury shall be reduced to writing, signed, and returned to the court by the foreman. Under this statute, in Sage v. Brown, 34 Ind. 464, a verdict lacking the signature of the foreman was held void.

In Missouri, a similar statute has been enacted. Menne v. Neumeister, 25 Mo. App. 300.

In Texas, the rule seems to be that the jurors must all sign the verdict; but where a member of the jury is excused by consent of the counsel of both parties after the trial has begun, and a verdict is rendered by the remaining eleven, as may be done under the Texas statutes, it is not necessary that all the jurors, including the one who is dismissed, shall sign it. Tram Lumber Co. v. Hancock, 70 Tex. 312. See Yarber v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1894), 24 S. W. Rep. 645.

that the verdict be reduced to writing, but in the absence of enactment on the subject no signature is necessary.¹

a. SEALED VERDICT.—A convenient practice prevails in most jurisdictions of allowing a jury, when they agree upon a verdict during an adjournment of the court, to seal it up and separate; then to reassemble and bring it into court at the expiration of the period of adjournment.² The general rule is that the Burton v. Bondies, 2 Tex. 204, was decided before the enactment of any statutes in this state making it necessary that a verdict should be signed, hence, in this case, following the common-law rule, it was distinctly stated that no signature was requisite.

When the parties to an action in the county court consented to reduce the number of jurors to five, it was held that the signature of one of the jurors to the verdict, as foreman, was sufficient, since the rule requiring the signatures of all the jurors does not apply in such cases. Bluefields Banana Co. v. Wollfe (Tex. Civ. App. 1893), 22 S.W. Rep. 269.

Kentucky.—In Berry v. Pusey, 80 Ky. 166, the requirement of the code that a verdict shall be signed by the foreman of the jury, is regarded as directory only. See also Thomas v. Com. (Ky. 1891), 15 S. W. Rep. 861.

Iowa Rev. Stat., § 3073 (Rev. of 1860), direct that a verdict should be signed. This section, however, has been held to be directory and not imperative; hence, a judgment should not be reversed because the verdict was not signed by the foreman of the jury when returned by the jury into court and received. Morrison v. Overton, 20 Iowa 465. See also Miller v. Mabon, 6 Iowa 456, holding that a verdict need not be signed.

Illinois.—In Harrison v. Singleton, 3 Ill. 21, it is maintained that a verdict need not be signed, except where the trial is before a ministerial officer.

1. Anderson v. State, 5 Ark. 444.

In Georgia, it is held that, though verdicts are usually signed by the foreman, if in any case it be not done and the verdict appears in the record without his signature, and a judgment is signed thereupon, it must be presumed that the verdict was satisfactory to the court and deemed by it to be sufficient in form and substance to warrant a judgment. Harris v. Barden, 24 Ga. 72. See also Malony v. Harkey, Ga. Dec. 159; Roberts v. State, 14 Ga. 18; Woods v. Com., 86 Va. 933; Hall v. Com., 16 Va. L. Jour. 547.

It was held, in Patterson v. Murphy, 63 Ga. 281, that although a verdict was not signed by any member of the jury, that as the names of the jurors who rendered the verdict appeared in the record, there was no error in overruling the defendant's motion in arrest of judgment on this ground.

In criminal cases, said the court, in State v. Faulk, 30 La. Ann. 831, it is not necessary that the verdict of the jury should be written or signed. It is sufficient that a member of the jury delivers it orally.

In most of the above cases, the practice of allowing the jury to seal up their verdict and separate, and the course to be pursued upon the reassembling of the jury, is distinctly recognized and set forth. Some of them, however, as it will be noticed, are only applicable by way of analogy, holding that even though there has been no verdict, nor sealing, the separation of the jury may be immaterial. Hence, it would seem a fortiori that a sealed verdict would be good.

Graham, in his practice, says: "Where the jury are liable to be absent for some time and the business of the day is through, it is usual to ask them when they have agreed upon their verdict to seal it and bring it into court the next morning. Whether the judge may do this without the consent of the parties has never been expressly decided." Graham's Prac. (2d ed.) 316.

Upon the trial of a case in the circuit court, by the consent of counsel, the jury were authorized to return a sealed verdict and the court adjourned; but before the judge had left his seat on the bench, the jury, having agreed, delivered an open verdict, in the presence of the judge, clerk, and the plaintiff's attorney, in favor of the plaintiff, but in the absence of the defendant and his counsel, and the jury were discharged. It was held that as the agreement was that the verdict should be sealed, it was violated by receiving an open verdict, and under the circumstances it should have been refused. Chicago v. Rogers, 61 Ill. 188.

The jury in a criminal case, after it had been committed to them, were allowed, during an adjournment of the court, to disperse by direction of the judge, upon stating to the officer that they had agreed and sealed up a verdict; upon coming into court after such dispersion they rendered a verdict orally without the sealed verdict being opened; the verdict thus rendered was held invalid. Com. v. Durfee, 100 Mass. 146.

In the case of Oliver v. First Presbyterian Church, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 283, the jury procured their liberation by pretending to the constable that they had agreed upon a sealed verdict when in reality they had not. After the separation of the jury, a conversation was carried on in the presence of some of them, relative to the cause, by persons not on the jury. Upon reassembling, they were sent out again, though not without the protest of the plaintiff, and they then returned with a verdict for the defendant. It was held that under such circumstances the verdict must be set aside.

Where there was an understanding between the parties to the suit that if the jury agreed upon a verdict they might seal it up and hand it to the clerk, but instead of pursuing this course they sealed up a paper which stated that they could not agree and delivered it to the clerk and then dispersed, it was held that such a proceeding was a gross violation of their duty as jurors, and that the cause could not be given to the jury again, even if the parties did not object. White v. Martin, 3 Ill. 69.

Unsealed.—The jury were instructed to reduce their verdict to writing and have it signed by the foreman, and bring it into court the next morning; at the appointed time they brought in the indictment on which the trial was proceeding, but in an unsealed envelope, with a verdict of guilty written upon it, and presented it to the court as the verdict agreed upon and signed before the jury separated the evening before. The jury, to a question by the clerk sealed verdict must be delivered in open court,¹ when any member of the jury may dissent from the conclusion previously reached;² and when this is the case the verdict is not to be received.³ If the sealed verdict as returned is informal, it is proper whether the defendant was "guilty or not guilty," replied "Guilty," and the verdict was affirmed, received, and recorded. It was held that it sufficiently appeared that the jury agreed before they separated upon the verdict which they returned. Com. v. Slattery, 147 Mass. 423. In this case it will be seen that the jury, perhaps through inadvertence, failed to comply with the direction of the court to seal their verdict. Some other irregularities may be deemed more serious. For instance, in a criminal case, the jury, upon retiring at the adjournment of the court for the day, were instructed that when they agreed upon a verdict, they might seal it up and separate. Upon coming into court the next morning, it appeared that they had agreed upon a verdict and separated during the night, but that through some misunderstanding on their part, the verdict had not been reduced to writing. The judge, thereupon, against the plaintiff's direction, directed them to retire and reduce their verdict to writing and return it as agreed upon the night before and without further deliberation on their part. The jury accordingly retired and soon after brought in a verdict of guilty. It was held that the verdict so rendered was invalid. Com. v. Dorus, 108 Mass. 488.

Delivery to Clerk.—Where, by agreement, the jury were to seal and deliver their verdict to John Peyton, a clerk of the court, and the verdict was sealed and delivered at his office in his absence, it was decided that as no personal confidence had been reposed in him, this was a substantial performance of the agreement. McMurry v. O'Neil, 1 Call (Va.) 246.

1. In Com. v. Heller, 5 Phila. (Pa.) 128, it was said: "The practice of sealing the verdict in this country, seems to have been substituted for the privy verdict in England, for both must be rendered in court to be of any effect." Willard v. Shaffer, 6 Phila. (Pa.) 520. See also cases cited in preceding note.

In Willard v. Shaffer, 6 Phila. (Pa.) 520, it was said, by Sharswood, J., that "A sealed verdict is no verdict of itself. The verdict recorded in court is the only verdict; the paper returned by the jury is not evidence, nor is it to be filed or preserved." Dornick v. Reichenback, 10 S. & R. (Pa.) 84.

Presence of Prisoner.—Unless the right is waived by the prisoner, he should be present in court when the verdict is opened, and where the record did not show that he was so present, judgment was reversed. Doyle v. U. S., 11 Biss. (U. S.) 100. See also supra, this title, Presence of Parties.

Announcement by Foreman.—Where the jury, on adjournment of the court, were told if they agreed before the court met, they might seal up their verdict and separate, and the sealed verdict was brought in next morning, opened by the judge and handed to the prothonotary, who then asked the jury to listen to their verdict as the court had ordered it recorded, and added as usual "so say you all" it was held that this was sufficient, though the more formal method of taking the verdict, ore tenus, from the jury by the mouth of their foreman, was to be preferred. Willard v. Shaffer, 6 Phila. (Pa.) 520; Blum v. Pate, 20 Cal. 69.

2. Douglass v. Tousey, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 352; 20 Am. Dec. 616; Bunn v. Hoyt, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 255; Devereux v. Champion Cotton Press Co., 14 S. Car. 396; Perry v. Mays, 2 Bailey (S. Car. 354.

Birchard, J., delivering the opinion of the court in State v. Engle, 13 Ohio 490, held that a sealed verdict could not be changed, when delivered in public, from a verdict of acquittal to a verdict of guilty, but he seemed to be of opinion that the jury were at liberty to dissent from a verdict of guilty and change it to one of acquittal.

3. Course Upon Disaffirmance.—Where one or more members of the jury dissent to a verdict agreed upon and sealed before separation, upon the appearance of the jury in court for the delivery and affirmance of their finding, the presiding judge may direct them to retire and reconsider the case.

In Douglass v. Tousey, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 352; 20 Am. Dec. 616, the cause was submitted to the jury in the evening, with the direction that if they for the presiding judge to send the jury out again to mould it into proper form.¹ In certain particulars this practice varies could agree they might seal up the verdict and bring it into court the next morning. The jury presented their sealed verdict according to the direction of the court, but when polled one of them refused to agree to it. They were sent out again and finally brought in the same verdict which they had signed and sealed the evening previous, the former dissenting juror signing it with the others. It was held that the verdict could not, under the circumstances, be set aside for this alleged irregularity. In this case, the direction to seal up the verdict was given without the express consent of counsel, but the court held that as there was no objection to this course on the part of the defendant, he must be deemed to have impliedly assented to it.

In Bunn v. Hoyt, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 255, a question arose very similar to the one before the court in Douglass v. Tousey above cited. The jury retired and deliberated several hours, sealed up their verdict, separated, and the next morning brought it into court. On being polled, one of them disagreed to it, and the judge, Chief Justice Kent, sent them out again, and the disagreeing juror ultimately assented to the verdict which had first been brought in unsealed, and the verdict was received as finally rendered. Jessup v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 82 Iowa 243.

Increase of Amount.—The jury, having been authorized to bring in a sealed verdict, brought it in for the plaintiff for $6,000, and it was entered on the clerk's minutes. Upon being polled, they did not agree and were ordered by the court to retire again. They did so, but returning for instructions as to whether they could increase the verdict, the court instructed them that they might render such verdict as they thought proper. They brought in a verdict for $7,000. It was held no error. Warner v. New York Cent. R. Co., 52 N. Y. 437; 11 Am. Rep. 724.

St. 348; High v. Johnson, 28 Wis. 72. Compare Williams v. People, 44 Ill. 478.

In trover for certain promissory notes, where the title and not the value was the only subject of controversy, the jury being sent out late in the evening, with permission to separate after agreeing and sealing up their verdict, did so, and returned a verdict the next morning for the plaintiff, with the amount of damages in blank; the foreman observing that they had some doubts as to the time from which interest should be computed, and that some supposed this would be done by the court. By direction of the judge they retired again and returned a new verdict for the amount of the notes and interest. Mellen, C. J., who delivered the opinion of the court, while admitting that in actions sounding damages, and where the amount of damages is the principal subject of consideration for the jury, as in actions of trespass of various kinds, actions for libels or the speaking of defamatory words, or on account, or actions of covenant, the omission to calculate on damages before separation would be fatal; yet here the only subject litigated was the title, there was a tacit acknowledgment of the amount of the note; and as the contested point had been settled the assessment of damages was a mere matter of course. Bolster v. Cummings, 6 Me. 85.

More Explicit.—Where, by an agreement of counsel, the jury is permitted to separate after an adjournment of the court, the defendant cannot complain that, after having sealed their verdict as directed by the court, the jurors separated for the night, and that after their verdict was delivered into court the next morning, they were sent out again with the papers in the suit to make the verdict more explicit. McIntosh v. Smith, 2 La. Ann. 756.

widely in different states. For instance, in its applicability to criminal cases;¹ as regards the consent of the parties to the

Not as Agreed Upon.—When a jury bringing a verdict into court, after having sealed it up and separated, declare that it is not as agreed upon, it may be submitted to them again for correction. Loudy v. Clarke, 45 Minn. 477.

Inadvertent Error.—It is not error to permit a jury, after it has returned a sealed verdict into court, to correct an error in the verdict which has occurred through inadvertence only. Hamilton v. Barton, 20 Iowa 505.

Guilty—Not Guilty.—In Beal v. Cunningham, 42 Me. 362, the jury returned a sealed verdict in a case which had been submitted to their consideration the night before. On the suggestion of the foreman that there was error in the verdict as read by the clerk, he was permitted by the court to amend the same by inserting the word "not" before the word "guilty," after which amendment by the foreman, the verdict was affirmed and recorded. "This," said the court, "was merely the correction of a verbal error, thereby reducing the verdict to form, and making it indicate truly the result to which the jury had, on deliberation, arrived. No impropriety in the course adopted is perceived."

Defendants—Plaintiff.—In Loudy v. Clarke, 45 Minn. 477, the jury, without the consent of the parties, sealed a verdict for the "defendants," separated, and the next morning were permitted to substitute "plaintiff." It was held that such a course afforded no ground for not receiving the altered verdict, unless it was objected to when the sealed verdict was attempted to be read.

Substantial Deficiencies.—It was held, in Rogers v. Sample, 28 Neb. 141, that where the verdict as returned into court is insufficient in substance or form, the court has the power to send the jury back to correct it.

1. In Louisiana, it has been held that in all criminal cases the separation of the jury, though by leave of court and with the consent of the accused and his counsel, will vitiate the verdict if such separation takes place after the evidence has been closed and the charge of the court given, and before the verdict is rendered. State v. Populus, 12 La. Ann. 710; State v. Hornsby, 32 La. Ann. 1268.

On the other hand, the Ohio courts seem to regard the practice as admissible, in the discretion of the presiding judge, in all cases—in criminal, without regard to the grade of the offense, as well as in civil—and this without regard to the consent of the parties. Sutliff v. Gilbert, 8 Ohio 405; Sargent v. State, 11 Ohio 472; State v. Engle, 13 Ohio 490.

In California, in the case of People v. Kelly, 46 Cal. 357, it was declared that the jury in a criminal case may render a sealed verdict, provided the proceeding is sanctioned by the consent of the defendant's counsel.

Iowa.—In this state there is a statute prohibiting the practice, on the part of the jury, of sealing the verdict and separating, in all criminal cases, misdemeanors as well as felonies. §§ 4442, 4458, 4460, 4462, 4470. State v. Fertig, 84 Iowa 79.

Indiana.—Here the prohibition as to sealed verdicts extends only to felonies. Farley v. People, 138 Ill. 97.

In Maine, the practice, as declared in an anonymous case, 63 Me. 590, is that in criminal cases, except capital cases and cases where the punishment is imprisonment for life, the presiding judge may, in his discretion, authorize the jury, when they agree during an adjournment of the court, to seal up their verdict and separate, and have it opened, read, and affirmed when the court reconvenes, with the same effect as if pronounced in open court. This seems to be the most generally approved practice on the subject.

It was held in the case of State v. McCormick, 84 Me. 566, in which the defendant was tried for the crime of rape, that a sealed verdict consisting merely of the word "guilty," without more, is insufficient; nor can the insufficiency be remedied by confirmation in open court.

In Pennsylvania, it has been held that in all cases except those of homicide, the jury may seal up their verdict and separate. Com. v. Boyle, 9 Phila. (Pa.) 592.

Washington.—In capital cases, the jury may not seal up their verdict and separate after the case has been finally submitted to them, and before they have rendered their verdict in court. The fact that this has been done with consent of defendant's counsel is immaterial. Anderson v. State, 2 Wash. 183.

In Com. v. Slattery, 147 Mass. 423, the defendant was charged with rape and the jury were permitted to render a sealed verdict. On this occasion it was said, by Mr. Justice Allen: "In civil cases, and in criminal cases not capital, the court can permit a jury, after they have agreed upon their verdict, to separate before rendering the verdict in court. In civil cases, the verdict being in writing, is made before the jury separate, and afterwards affirmed by them in court; in criminal cases the verdict must be rendered orally in court, but it must appear to be the verdict which the jury had agreed upon before they separated. The usual practice is to instruct the jury to bring in a sealed verdict, which is opened and read by the clerk in open court, after which in civil cases the written verdict is filed and affirmed by the jury, and in criminal cases an oral verdict is taken in the usual form. The purpose of the written statement in criminal cases is to make it plain that the verdict rendered is the one which the jury had agreed to render before they separated, and the purpose of directing it to be sealed up and delivered unopened to the court is to identify the writing." Com. v. Carrington, 116 Mass. 37; Wharton's Crim. Law, § 3193. And see U. S. v. Bennett, 16 Blatchf. (U. S.) 338.

1. Where this practice has been adopted, it has been generally with the consent or by the agreement of the parties to the suit, Reins v. People, 30 Ill. 256; Tiffield v. Adams, 3 Iowa 487; Higley v. Newell, 28 Iowa 516; Walker v. Dailey (Iowa, 1893), 54 N. W. Rep. 344; Wood v. Van Buren County, Morr. (Iowa) 581; Com. v. Costello, 128 Mass. 88; Bolster v. Cummings, 6 Me. 85; Beal v. Cunningham, 42 Me. 362; Steele v. Etheridge, 15 Minn. 501; Perry v. Mays, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 354; Devereux v. Champion Cotton Press Co., 14 S. Car. 396; Hancock v. Winans, 20 Tex. 320; comparatively few cases holding directly, one way or the other, whether or not the consent of the parties or their counsel is necessary.

In High v. Johnson, 28 Wis. 72, the question, whether the court may against the objection of either party, direct the jury to sign and seal their verdict and bring it into court the next day, is considered, but not answered, and Mr. Graham, in his work on Practice (2d ed.), p. 316, states that it has never been expressly decided whether or not the judge may instruct the jury to resort to this practice without the consent of the parties. In Iowa, at least, and perhaps in other states, this doubt has been determined by statute (see Jessup v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 82 Iowa 243, maintaining that under the Iowa code, in order to authorize a sealed verdict, the consent of the parties must first be given), and it has been held in California (People v. Kelly, 46 Cal. 357) that in a criminal case, the jury may seal their verdict and separate only by the consent of the defendant's counsel.

In Ohio, in both civil and criminal cases, the court may in its discretion direct the jury, upon finding a verdict, to seal it up and separate, wholly independent of the consent of the parties. Sutliff v. Gilbert, 8 Ohio 405; Sargeant v. State, 11 Ohio 472; State v. Engle, 13 Ohio 490.

In the case of Com. v. Carrington, 116 Mass. 37, the question arose whether, in a criminal case, not capital, the jury may be authorized by the court, without the consent of the defendant, to separate, after agreeing upon and signing and sealing up a paper in the form of a verdict, and afterwards return the verdict in open court in accordance with the result so stated and sealed up. It was held that such a course was proper. In this case, the court said: "The tendency of modern decisions has been to relax the strictness of the ancient practice which required jurors to be kept together from the time they were impaneled until they returned their verdict or were finally discharged by the court." See also People v. Douglass, 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 32; 15 Am. Dec. 332.

In Chicago v. Langlaas, 66 Ill. 361, the court, in the absence of counsel, directed the jury to seal up their verdict and separate, and return it into court the next day. It was held that this was no error.

In Indiana, it has been held that where no objection is made, the jury may, by order of court, seal up their verdict and separate. Jarrell v. State, 58 Ind. 293.

poll;¹ and even the necessity for a reassembling of the jury and confirmation in open court.²

Contrary to Direction of Court.—In the case of People v. Douglass, 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 26; 15 Am. Dec. 332, it was said by the chief justice, that in a civil suit it is clear that the separation of the jury without and even contrary to the direction of the court, will not in itself warrant the court in setting aside the verdict. See also Smith v. Thompson, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 221; Ex p. Hill, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 355.

Without Direction of Court or Agreement of Parties.—In the case of Sutliff v. Gilbert, 8 Ohio 405, the jury, without order or leave of court or of the parties, sealed up their verdict and separated, and the next morning came into court and delivered it. The supreme court declined to disturb it for irregularity of procedure.

Several Issues—Agreement on Part—Separation.—The separation of the jury without the permission of the court, before they agreed on all the issues submitted to them, is irregular and improper. But this misconduct does not necessarily impair or affect the validity of their finding on other issues which were submitted to them, nor should it operate to deprive the other party of the benefit of their verdict on the questions upon which the jury had already passed, where it does not appear that the issues on which there was no verdict were so connected with or related to those on which they rendered a verdict as to make it appear that their finding would have been different if they had been obliged to determine all the issues submitted to them. Vennard v. McConnell, 11 Allen (Mass.) 555.

Waiver of Exceptions.—The agreement of the parties that the jury, after agreeing upon a verdict, might seal the same and separate, was held to be a waiver of all exceptions because of such separation. Wood v. Van Buren County, Morr. (Iowa) 581.

1. See supra, this title, Polling the Jury.

Waiver of Right to Poll.—In the case of Miller v. Mabon, 6 Iowa 456, it was held that when the jury, by consent of parties, seal their verdict and separate before rendering the same, that the jury cannot be polled unless such a course has been agreed upon. See also Bass v. Hanson, 9 Iowa 563.

In Florida, it has been decided that where a sealed verdict by consent of parties has been rendered by a jury, neither party has a right to demand that the jury be polled. This may be done, however, at the discretion of the judge, whose duty it is to see that no wrong or injustice is done to the parties, and whose discretion in such case is not matter of review by the appellate court. Whitner v. Hamlin, 12 Fla. 18.

In Koon v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co., 104 U. S. 106, it was held that a stipulation that the jury, when they agree on their verdict, if the court should not then be in session, may sign and seal the same and deliver it to the officer in charge and disperse, is equivalent to an agreement by both parties, that on the retirement of the jury, the court may, when the sealed verdict is handed in by the officer, open it in the absence of the jury and reduce it to proper form if necessary, and that stipulation was also construed as a waiver of the right to poll the jury if the parties were not in court when the verdict was affirmed.

Right to Poll Not Waived.—The agreement of the parties that the jury may seal up their verdict and separate, does not deprive either of the right to poll the jury when the verdict is returned, and the jurors are at liberty to dissent from the verdict to which they had privately agreed. Root v. Sherwood, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 68; 5 Am. Dec. 191. To the same effect, see Wright v. State, 11 Ind. 569; Stewart v. People, 23 Mich. 63; 9 Am. Rep. 78.

U. S. v. Potter, 6 McLean (U. S.) 186, also supports the view that an agreement between the parties to the effect that the jury may bring in a sealed verdict, does not affect the right to poll the jury when the verdict is returned.

2. When, by consent of parties, the jury is allowed to seal their verdict and separate before rendering the same, such sealing is equivalent to a rendition and recording thereof in open court, and the jury in such case cannot be polled or permitted to disagree thereto, unless such a course has been agreed upon by the parties in open court and entered of record. Iowa Rev. Stat., § 3075; Miller v. Mabon, 6 Iowa 456; Bass v. Hanson, 9 Iowa 563.

Where the parties stipulated in open court that the jury might seal their

4. Privy Verdict.—The practice of allowing the jury to deliver their finding to the judge privately, when a verdict is reached during an adjournment or absence of the judge from the court, in order that the jury may be delivered from confinement, has never been distinctly recognized in this country, and is rarely resorted to in England where it originated. Even on occasions when it has been exercised, the verdict delivered privily is held to be of no inherent force or effect, requiring, as it does, confirmation in open court, at which time the jury are not in the slightest degree bound by their previous declaration.¹

5. Public Verdict.—In a certain sense, all verdicts are public verdicts. In other words, a verdict, to have its legally attributed effect, must be declared in open court,² by which proceeding it is constituted a public verdict.³

verdict, deliver it to the clerk, and then separate, such delivery is equivalent to a delivery in open court, and the power of the court to open and act upon it at a subsequent term is unquestionable. Nor is the authority of the court so to act at all lessened because of an agreement by the parties that such verdict should be opened on a particular day of the term at which it was rendered. The court, nevertheless, may open and act upon it on any other day. Pierce v. Hasbrouck, 49 Ill. 23.

1. A privy verdict is when the judge has left or adjourned the court, and the jury being agreed, in order to be delivered from their confinement, obtain leave to give their verdict privily to the judge out of court; which privy verdict is of no force unless afterwards affirmed by a public verdict given openly in court; wherein the jury may, if they please, vary from a privy verdict. So that the privy verdict is indeed a mere nullity; and yet it is a dangerous practice, allowing time for the parties to tamper with the jury, and, therefore, very seldom indulged. 3 Bl. Com. 377.

A privy verdict could not be rendered in a criminal case, "which touched life or member." 4 Bl. Com. 360. The reason of this rule was that it "deprived the prisoner of meeting the jury face to face, and demanding of each his separate verdict." Birchard, J., in State v. Engle, 13 Ohio 490. In this case, the same judge observed: "It is laid down by elementary writers that the verdict of a jury in criminal cases, is to be considered and delivered in the same form as in civil cases, except that they cannot give a privy verdict, nor can they be discharged without giving a verdict but in cases of necessity."

In an anonymous case (63 Me. 590), the reason assigned for the ancient rule prohibiting privy verdicts in certain criminal cases, is "because of the requirement, in cases of felony, that the jurors should look upon the prisoner when the verdict is pronounced."

It is said, in Hale 300, that "in a case of felony or treason, the verdict must be given in open court, and no privy verdict can be given."

The old idea of rendering privy verdicts seems to have furnished the foundation for our practice relating to sealed verdicts. Anonymous, 63 Me. 590; Com. v. Heller, 5 Phila. (Pa.) 123.

2. See supra, this title, Reception of Verdict.

A cause was submitted to the jury at four o'clock, and the court adjourned until nine o'clock the next morning, the judge announcing that the court would at all times be open for the purpose of receiving the verdict if they agreed upon it before midnight. At eleven o'clock the judge went to the court room and, in the absence of all the parties to the suit and their counsel, received the finding of the jury, discharged them from further consideration of the case, kept the verdict until the opening of the court next morning, and after having read it aloud, handed it to the clerk for entry upon the record. This was deemed illegal, because it should have been afterwards affirmed publicly in open court. Young v. Seymour, 4 Neb. 86; Kennedy v. Raught, 6 Minn. 155.

3. Thus it will be seen that an oral verdict by announcement, and a writ-

IV. EFFECT OF VERDICT—1. In General.—A verdict, regularly found and declared, entitles the prevailing party to a judgment in conformity with the facts established by the verdict.¹

2. As a Cure for Irregularities—a. AT COMMON LAW.—Where there is a defect, imperfection, or omission in any pleading, whether in substance or form, which would have constituted a fatal objection on demurrer, yet if the issue joined is such as necessarily required on trial, proof of the fact so defectively or imperfectly stated or omitted, and without which it is not to be presumed that either the judge would have directed the jury to give, or the jury would have rendered, the verdict found, such defect, imperfection, or omission is cured by the verdict at common law,² ten, sealed, or privy verdict by affirmation in open court, becomes a public verdict.

In 3 Bl. Com. 377, verdicts are divided into four classes: general and special; public and private. In reference to public verdicts, it is written: "The only effectual and legal verdict is the public verdict, in which the jury openly declare to have found the issue for the plaintiff or for the defendant."

1. "As soon as the facts of the case are ascertained by the trial, the judgment of the court, which is the conclusion of law from the facts, ought in due course to follow." 4 Minor's Inst. (2d ed), p. 836.

Thus, though the plaintiff may have stated his title or ground of action defectively or inaccurately, it is nevertheless a fair presumption after verdict in his favor, that such was proved, because, to entitle him to recover, all circumstances necessary in form or substance to complete the title or cause of action so imperfectly stated, must be proved at the trial. Rushton v. Aspinall, 2 Doug. 679.

In Heymann v. Reg. L. R., 8 Q. B. 105, it was said, by Lord Blackburn: "It is a general rule of pleading at common law, . . . where an averment which is necessary for the support of the pleading is imperfectly stated, and the verdict on an issue involving that averment is found, if it appears to the court, after verdict, that the verdict could not have been found on this issue without proof of this averment, then, after verdict, the defective averment, which might have been bad on demurrer, is cured by the verdict." Biedlaugh v. Reg., 3 Q. B. Div. 607.

In Gray v. James, Pet. (C. C.) 476, it was said by Washington, J.: "It may be laid down as a general rule, that a declaration ought always to show a title in the plaintiff, and that with convenient certainty. It ought to state all matters that are of the essence of the action, without which the plaintiff fails to show a right in point of law to ask for the judgment of the court in his favor. If his title depends upon the performance of certain acts, he must affirm the performance of those acts. If enough is stated to show title in the plaintiff, and with sufficient certainty to enable the court to give judgment, but with less certainty than the case admitted of, and which, for the purpose of notice to the adverse party or otherwise, ought to have been stated, the defect is cured by the verdict. The court will presume that all such omissions were supplied, and obscurities explained at the trial by the evidence given to the jury."

Judge Story similarly expressed the doctrine by saying: "The general principle of law is that, where there is a matter so essentially necessary to be proved, to establish the plaintiff's right to recovery, the jury could not be presumed to find a verdict for him unless it had been proved at the trial, there the omission to state the matter in express terms in the declaration is cured by the verdict, if the general terms of the declaration are otherwise sufficient to comprehend it." Dobson v. Campbell, 1 Sumn. (U. S.) 326.

Verdict and Issue.—As will be seen from the rule laid down in the text, the intendment to supply the omission or cure the irregularity, must arise not merely from the verdict, but from the verdict taken in connection with the issue upon which such verdict was rendered. 1 Chitty's Pl. 705; Dale v. Dean, 16 Conn. 579.

Formal Defects.—All immaterial facts omitted, and all informality in allegations, such as duplicity, for instance, are cured by verdict, and the reason of this rule is not so much that the defects are supposed to be supplied by proof, as that it would be unreasonable to suffer a party to avail himself of such defects after putting the defendant to the expense of a trial by the jury. Spencer v. Overton, 1 Day 186; Sewall's Falls Bridge v. Fisk, 23 N. H. 180; Ward v. Bartholomew, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 409.

—Surplusage.—In the same manner surplusage in pleading does not, in any case, vitiate after verdict. Adams v. Goose, Cro. Jac. 96; Tiamond v. Johnson, Cro. Jac. 428; Carroll v. Peake, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 18; Chapman v. Smith, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 78.

Thus, if a plaintiff sues or pleads by a conservator, and the record is in the usual form and judgment is in his favor, it will be good, and those words will be rejected as surplusage. Woodford v. Webster, 3 Day (Conn.) 472.

Also, where the plaintiff declared on a promissory note payable in chattels, as under the statute, and assigned for breach that the defendant did not pay the money mentioned in the note, it was ruled that the reference to the statute could be rejected as surplusage, and that the contradiction in assigning the breach was cured by the verdict. Thomas v. Roosa, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 461.

—Ambiguities.—Where the terms of a pleading are ambiguous or equivocal, they will be understood in that sense which is most favorable to sustaining the verdict, if equally consistent with the context and the circumstances of the case. Sheen v. Rickie, 5 M. & W. 175; France v. White, 1 M. & G. 731; Emmons v. Elderton, 4 H. L. Cas. 626; Kempe v. Crews, Ld. Raym. 167; Commercial Ins. Co. v. Treasury Bank, 61 Ill. 482; Hickman v. Southerland, 4 Bibb (Ky.) 194; Manwell v. Manwell, 14 Vt. 14.

Defects of Substance.—There are some defects of substance as well as form which are aided by verdict. Hitchins v. Stevens, 2 Show. 244; Wright v. Goddard, 8 Ad. & El. 144; Sewall's Falls Bridge v. Fisk, 23 N. H. 180.

—Omission of Material Allegations.—Though material facts are entirely omitted, yet if they are necessarily concomitants of the material facts alleged in the declaration, so that, in their finding, the jury must have found the facts omitted, the defect is cured by the verdict. Spencer v. Overton, 1 Day (Conn.) 183; Addington v. Allen, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 375.

Thus, a failure to aver a seisin in a writ of entry will be cured after verdict. Ward v. Bartholomew, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 409.

Lord Ellenborough, in delivering the judgment of the court in Jackson v. Pesked, 1 M. & S. 234, said: "Where a matter is so essentially necessary to be proved that had it not been given in evidence the jury could not have found such a verdict, there the want of stating that matter in express terms in a declaration, provided it contains terms sufficiently general to comprehend a fair and reasonable intendment, will be cured by verdict; and where a general allegation must, in fair construction, so far require to be restricted that no judge or no jury could have properly treated it in an unrestricted sense, it may reasonably be construed after verdict that it was so restrained at trial."

—Material Facts Imperfectly Stated.—

Where material facts are stated too generally, imperfectly, or with such ambiguity that the declaration would be bad on demurrer, these defects are cured by verdict. Lane v. Crockett, 7 Price 566; Amev v. Long, 9 East 473; Jackson v. Pesked, 1 M. & S. 234; Dale v. Dean, 16 Conn. 579; Spencer v. Overton, 1 Day (Conn.) 186.

In McCune v. Norwich Gas. Co., 30 Conn. 525; 79 Am. Dec. 278, Sanford, J., said: "If a material fact is stated in such general and indefinite terms that, if demurred to, the pleading would be adjudged bad for want of sufficient certainty, yet if, instead of demurring, the other party takes issue upon it, and the verdict is against him, the defect is cured, because the fact stated could not have been proved at all without proving at the same time those concomitant circumstances attending it, for the omission of which the pleading was demurrable. Thus, if a tender is pleaded without time or place, the pleading is bad on demurrer, for the opposite party has a right to be informed by the plea when and where the tender is claimed to have been made, in order that he may prepare to meet the claim. But if, instead of demurring, he takes issue upon the plea, and the verdict is against him, the plea is cured; because tender could not have been proved at all without proving when and where it was made."

Where a declaration, upon an agreement by way of lease, alleged in substance that the defendant below agreed to rent and to farm-let to the plaintiff, a farm, for one year from the first of January, 1820, and agreed to remove the former tenant, and that the plaintiff should have the possession and occupancy of the farm from the first of January aforesaid, free from all hindrance or disturbance of anyone, and further averred that on the said first day of January, 1820, at the county aforesaid, the plaintiff was ready and willing, and offered to the defendant to take possession of the said land and farm, and to rent and occupy the same, and afterwards assigned breaches in this, that although specially requested so to do on the said first day of January, 1820, the defendant refused and neglected to turn out the said tenant, etc., it was held sufficient that the averment should state the plaintiff's readiness and offer, and his request on the first day of January generally, and not at the last convenient hour of that day. Carroll v. Peake, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 18.

Defects in Declaration.—After verdict a declaration will be good, if enough appears from it to show that the plaintiff had a good cause of action. English v. Burnell, 2 Wils. 258; Crouther v. Oldfield, 1 Salk. 365; Weston v. Mason, 3 Burr. 1725; 1 Saund. 228, note 1; Bishop v. Hayward, 4 T. R. 470; Farnworth v. Bishop of Chester, 4 B. & C. 555; Reeves v. State, 29 Fla. 527; Dotterer v. Harden, 88 Ga. 145; Dickerson v. Hays, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 44; Worster v. Canal Bridge, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 541; Hurst v. Ash Grove, 96 Mo. 172; Smith v. Eastern R. Co., 35 N. H. 356; Walpole v. Marlow, 2 N. H. 386; Elliott v. Heath, 6 N. H. 428; Sewall's Falls Bridge v. Fisk, 23 N. H. 180; White v. Concord R. Co., 30 N. H. 188; Corey v. Bath, 35 N. H. 530; Nelson v. Ford, 5 Ohio 473; Cornelius v. Molloy, 7 Pa. St. 293; Miles v. Oldfield, 4 Yeates (Pa.) 423; 2 Am. Dec. 412; Smith v. Veating, 6 C. B. 136; Richardson v. Eastman, 12 Mass. 505; Ingersoll v. Jackson, 9 Mass. 496; Livermore v. Boswell, 4 Mass. 437; Lahiffe v. Hunter, Harp. (S. Car.) 184; State v. Freeman, 63 Vt. 496.

The rule has been stated in Indiana, that when a complaint is attacked for the first time after the verdict, every legal intendment will be summoned to its rescue, and if there is enough to bar another suit for the same cause, and no necessary averment is totally absent, the verdict will cure the delinquencies. Donellan v. Hardy, 57 Ind. 393; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Spain, 61 Ind. 460; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Kreiger, 90 Ind. 380; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Harrington, 92 Ind. 457; Hedrick v. Osborne, 99 Ind. 143; Burkett v. Holman, 104 Ind. 6; Orton v. Tilden, 110 Ind. 131; Du Souchet v. Dutcher, 113 Ind. 249; Colchen v. Ninde, 120 Ind. 88; Peters v. Banta, 120 Ind. 416; Duffy v. Carman, 3 Ind. App. 207.

Averment as to Amount of Damage.

—It was held, in Brauns v. Glesige, 130 Ind. 167, that the omission of an averment as to the amount of damages sustained is cured by the verdict, as it is a matter which may be supplied by proof.

Averment of Special Demand.—The omission of an averment of special demand is cured after the verdict. Bliss v. Arnold, 8 Vt. 252; 30 Am. Dec. 467. And see Bowdell v. Parsons, 10 East 359.

Averment of Notice.—Though the declaration is defective in not alleging notice to the defendant that the plaintiff has performed the condition which was the consideration of the promise sued on, yet this notice, after the verdict for the plaintiff, must be presumed to have been proved, as it was involved in the issue and necessary to have been established by proof or admission. Colt v. Root, 17 Mass. 229.

In Crocker v. Gilbert, 9 Cush. (Mass.) 131, it was held that an objection to a declaration on account of its failure to allege notice to the defendant of the non-payment of the note on which he was guarantor, comes too late after the verdict.

The omission in a declaration, in a suit upon a special agreement to allege specifically the breach of the agreement or notice to the plaintiff to perform it, is cured by a verdict. Weigley v. Weir, 7 S. & R. (Pa.) 307. See also Spencer v. Overton, 1 Day (Conn.) 183.

Demand and Notice—Mercantile Instrument.—Where suit was brought against the indorser of a bill of exchange, the plaintiff did not allege a demand and refusal by the acceptor on the day when the note was payable, nor was notice to the defendant stated in the declaration. Neither of these defects was considered to be cured by verdict, and the want of either was held to prevent the declaration from containing a cause of action. Rushton v. Aspinall, 2 Doug. 679; Anderson v. Yell, 15 Ark. 9.

Averment as to Due Care.—In an action by an employee to recover damages for personal injuries arising from the negligence of the employer, the omission to aver that the defendant had not observed due care in respect to the acts complained of, is cured by a verdict for the plaintiff. Fox v. Spring Lake Iron Co., 89 Mich. 387.

In an action to recover damages for an injury sustained by reason of a defective highway, an averment that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was walking along and across the highway in due prosecution of his business and in a proper manner, was considered, after verdict, as expressing that the plaintiff was at the time in the exercise of ordinary care. Raymond v. Lowell, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 524.

—Profane Swearing—Language Used.

—A complaint for profane swearing charged that the defendant "did profanely curse," without setting forth the language used. No objection was made at the trial to the sufficiency of the complaint. The language used was shown by the evidence, and the defendant's counsel informed the jury that they were the judges of the law, and of the profanity of the language used. The court charged what constituted profane cursing, and the charge was not excepted to. It was held that the verdict cured the defect in the complaint. State v. Freeman, 63 Vt. 496.

—Condition Precedent.—Failure to allege the performance of a condition precedent will be cured by a verdict at common law. Happe v. Stout, 2 Cal. 460; Bailey v. Clay, 4 Rand. (Va.) 346.

—Time.—Time, unless it be matter of essential description in the cause of action, will, after verdict, be presumed to have been proved, and the want of it in the count will not be matter in arrest of judgment. Gould's Pl. 499; 3 Bl. Com. 394; Blackwell v. Eales, 5 Mod. 287; Acton v. Eels, 2 Salk. 662; Stockton v. Bishop, 4 How. (U. S.) 155; Hickman v. Southerland, 4 Bibb (Ky.) 194; Marsh v. Blythe, 1 McCord (S. Car.) 360; Perkins v. State, 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 559.

In an action of trespass, unless the declaration alleges trespass to have been committed on a day certain, which day must be before the action was commenced, it is demurrable, but the alleging of a trespass on an impossible day or on a day subsequent to the commencement of the suit, is aided by verdict. Blackwell v. Eales, 5 Mod. 286; Acton v. Eels, 2 Salk. 662; Blackhall v. Evans, 3 Salk. 8; Sorrel v. Lewin, 3 Keb. 354; Story v. Barrell, 2 Conn. 665.

—Place.—Where all material facts are stated, defects as to place will be aided by verdict. Hickman v. Southerland, 4 Bibb (Ky.) 194; Stone v. Van Culer, 2 Vt. 115.

—Registry of Assignment.—A declaration upon an assignment of a patent right, omitting to state that the assignment was duly entered in the state department, is helped by verdict. Dobson v. Campbell, 1 Sumn. (U. S.) 319.

—Attornment.—Where the bargainee of a reversion declared in debt for rent, the omission to state attornment in the declaration was decided to be aided by verdict. Hitchins v. Stevens, 2 Show. 233.

—Misjoinder of Counts.—A misjoinder of counts will not be aided by a general verdict. Vaughn v. Gardner, 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 328. To this doctrine, the court, in Dalson v. Bradbury, 50 Ill. 82, added, "as for aught we can see, the jury may have found damages under both counts." See also Clark v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 36 Mo. 202.

—Defective Count—Civil Actions.—Sedgwick, J., in Benson v. Swift, 2 Mass. 50, said: "There is no doubt that the principle of law is settled, that where there are several counts in a declaration, and one of them is materially defective, or bad, and a general verdict is found upon them all, the judgment must be arrested."

Of like import are the remarks of Mr. Sergeant Williams: "It is a settled rule," he says, "that where there are several counts and a verdict is entered generally on all the counts and entire damages are given, and one count is bad, it is fatal." To this effect, see 1 Chitty's Pl. 714; 2 Wm. Saund. 307; Onslow v. Horne, 3 Wils. 185; Ottawa Gas Light, etc., Co. v. Thompson, 39 Ill. 598; McCauley v. Elrod (Ky. 1894), 27 S. W. Rep. 867; Stevenson v. Hayden, 2 Mass. 406; Kingsley v. Bill, 9 Mass. 198; Warren v. Litchfield, 7 Me. 63; Clark v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 36 Mo. 202; Glines v. Smith, 48 N. H. 259; Cheetham v. Tillotson, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 430; Haselton v. Weare, 8 Vt. 480; Needham v. McAuley, 13 Vt. 69.

If a general verdict be given in several counts, some of which are for demands not within the jurisdiction of the court, it is bad for the whole. Kline v. Wood, 9 S. & R. (Pa.) 294.

This rule invalidating a verdict, if one of the counts in the declaration is faulty, has sometimes been evaded by amending the verdicts by the minutes of the judge, so as to take it only upon such counts as were sufficient. 2 Saund. 171, note; 1 Burrill's N. Y. Pr. 243; Chitty's Pr. 922; Empson v. Griffin, 11 Ad. & El. 186; Reg v. Virrier, 12 Ad. & El. 317; Grant v. Astle, 2 Doug. 722; Eddowes v. Hopkins, 1 Doug. 377; Lewin v. Edwards, 9 M. & W. 720; Spencer v. Goter, 1 H. Bl. 78; Baker v. Sanderson, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 348; Cornwall v. Gould, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 446; Barnard v. Whiting, 7 Mass. 358; Glines v. Smith, 48 N. H. 259; Sayre v. Jewett, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 135; Baker

v. Rand, 13 Barb. (N. Y.) 152; Descamps v. Dutihl, 4 Yeates (Pa.) 442; and see Small v. Rogers, 46 N. H. 177.

Thus, in Baker v. Sanderson, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 348, Wilde, J., said: "The rule is, that where there is but one cause of action, and there are several counts, and a general verdict is returned, the court will not arrest the judgment, although one count be bad, but will allow the verdict to be altered so as to refer to the good count. So, if the evidence supports one count and not the others, no new trial will be granted, but judgment will be entered according to the verdict. For as there is but one cause of action, it is immaterial on which count the verdict is taken, or whether it be general or special." And see Barnard v. Whiting, 7 Mass. 358.

In Cornwall v. Gould, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 446, Wilde, J., again observed: "The rule is, that when there are several counts for the same cause of action, and a general verdict is returned, it may be altered so as to apply to any one count, because such alteration cannot prejudice the defendant on the question of damages." In order, however, that the verdict may be sustained by this practice of amendment, there should be something to show that it was rendered on the good counts alone. Hemmenway v. Hickes, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 497; Dryden v. Dryden, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 546; McKee v. Bartley, 9 Pa. St. 189. And see Glines v. Smith, 48 N. H. 259.

However, where a verdict is not entered generally on all the counts, but specially on one count which is good, such verdict will be upheld though all the other counts be faulty. Dougherty v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 62 Mo. 554.

In Bess v. Shepherd, 2 Bibb (Ky.) 226, there is a dictum to the effect that, "where there are several counts in a declaration, one of which is faulty, and entire damages are given, the verdict is good." This seems to be in conflict with the common-law doctrine as set forth above. The court continued: "But where the finding is distinctly upon a bad count, though there be good ones in the declaration, the court cannot give judgment thereon, but must award a venire facias de novo."

But One Cause of Action.—Where there is but one cause of action, although set out in several counts to meet any possible state of facts developed in the evidence, if there be one good count in the petition, the verdict will be upheld. West v. Platt, 127 Mass. 367; Brownell

v. Pacific R. Co., 47 Mo. 239; Owens v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 58 Mo. 394; McKee v. Calvert, 80 Mo. 348; Glines v. Smith, 48 N. H. 259.

Statutes in some of the states have changed this common-law rule that where there are several counts in a declaration, and one of them be faulty, and the verdict, being for the plaintiff, does not indicate upon which of the counts it was founded, it is necessary to arrest judgment. Thus, in Alabama, a statute was enacted in 1824, entitled "an act to regulate pleadings at common law," providing "that no cause shall hereafter be arrested, reversed, or otherwise set aside, after verdict or judgment, for any matter on the face of the pleadings not previously objected to; provided the declaration contains a substantial cause of action, and a material issue be joined thereon." Under this statute, in Harris v. Purdy, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 231, it was held that a general verdict on good and bad counts in an action for slander, must be sustained.

By statute in Illinois, it is provided that an entire verdict given on several counts shall not be set aside nor reversed on the ground of any defective count, if one or more of the counts in the declaration be sufficient to sustain the verdict. Bradshaw v. Hubbard, 6 Ill. 390; Snyder v. Gaither, 4 Ill. 91; Davis v. Taylor, 41 Ill. 405; Missouri, etc., Tel. Co. v. Sioux City Bank, 74 Ill. 217; Reece v. Smith, 94 Ill. 362; James v. Dexter, 113 Ill. 654; Gebbie v. Mooney, 22 Ill. App. 369; Shreffler v. Nadelhoffer, 133 Ill. 536.

The Indiana Rev. Stat. (1843), p. 732, § 322, provide that, "when a general verdict is given on the trial of any civil action for the plaintiff, in which some of the counts in the declaration are bad, and any one of them is good, judgment on the verdict for that reason shall not be arrested or reversed in the superior court, but that on the trial the court, at the request of the defendant, may instruct the jury to disregard any such faulty count."

In Newell v. Downes, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 523, the court, citing this statute, declined to reverse a judgment rendered by the lower court in an action for slander, on account of a defect in one of the counts contained in the plaintiff's declaration.

In Virginia, the legislature have enacted that where there are several counts, one of which is faulty, the defendant, instead of demurring to it as at common law would be proper, may ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard it; yet, if entire damages be given, the verdict shall be good. Virginia Code 1873, ch. 173, § 12.

Defective Count—Criminal Cases.—In criminal cases, it has been held that a single good count in an indictment will be sufficient to sustain a general verdict; the presumption being that the jury were controlled in their action by a reference to the good count or counts. See INDICTMENT, vol. 10, p. 599. See also State v. Coleman, 5 Port. (Ala.) 40; Baker v. State, 30 Ala. 521; Hornsby v. State, 94 Ala. 55; State v. Tuller, 34 Conn. 280; Hiner v. People, 34 Ill. 297; Mead v. State, 53 N. J. L. 601; Arlen v. State, 18 N. H. 563; Glines v. Smith, 48 N. H. 259; Kane v. People, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 203; Guenther v. People, 24 N. Y. 100; People v. Curling, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 321; State v. Carter (N. Car. 1893), 18 S. E. Rep. 517; State v. Lee (N. Car. 1894), 19 S. E. Rep. 375; Brice v. State, 2 Overt. (Tenn.) 254; Taylor v. State, 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 460. But where there has been a demurrer to the defective counts, which has been improperly overruled, a verdict rendered on all counts will not be sustained, Avirett v. State, 76 Md. 510; and in Virginia it has been held that this rule of practice in criminal cases, sustaining an indictment if it contains a single good count, is not applicable where the indictment is for a crime punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, as in such cases the jury determines the term of imprisonment, and the evidence on the bad count might have aggravated the punishment. Mowbray v. Com., 11 Leigh (Va.) 643; Clere v. Com., 3 Gratt. (Va.) 586.

Duplicity in Indictment.—This may result first : from charging the same offense twice, or second : from charging two distinct offenses in the same or different counts of the same indictment. The first instance mentioned is regarded as a mere formal defect which cannot be taken advantage of after verdict. State v. Holmes, 28 Conn. 230; Lazier v. Com., 10 Gratt. (Va.) 708. In this regard, see also the case of Kilbourn v. State, 9 Conn. 560. In this case, we think that the duplicity was clearly of the latter variety, for the appeal was from a judgment of the county court upon an indictment containing two counts, acquitting the defendant upon one and declaring him guilty upon the other. It is so regarded in the argument of the counsel of the plaintiff in error, who contended that the complaint was irregular because it did embrace two distinct offenses. Naturally, in endeavoring to set aside the judgment he does not advert to the fact which we establish below, that under such circumstances a verdict declaring the defendant guilty on one count and innocent on the other, is good. The supreme court, in its opinion, seems to have confounded the two kinds of duplicity which we mention, as it simply disposes of the objection made to the verdict on account of its duplicity by stating that such objection can only be taken advantage of by special demurrer; an observation which would have been true if applied to the sort of duplicity resulting from repetition or reiteration.

In order that a verdict may operate to cure the second sort of duplicity mentioned, it must declare the defendant guilty on one count, or of one offense, and not guilty on or of the other. State v. Miller, 24 Conn. 522; Com. v. Packard, 5 Gray (Mass.) 101; Com. v. Holmes, 103 Mass. 440; Com. v. Adams, 127 Mass. 15; State v. Merrill, 44 N. H. 624; People v. Wright, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 193.

Action on Award.—In Kingsley v. Bill, 9 Mass. 198, it is held that a declaration in an action upon an award, which alleges no promise of the parties to perform the award, may nevertheless be held good after verdict; but that a declaration which contains no allegation that the award was published or made known to the defendant except by bringing the action, must be held to be fatally bad.

Defective Plea.—Where in an action of debt for rent the defendant pleaded entry by the plaintiff, but did not aver expulsion, but after verdict, issue having been taken on non-intravit and found for the defendant, the plea was held to be good. Reynolds v. Buckle, Hob. 326a. See also Bacon's Abr., Pleas and Pleading I., 2; Hazard v. Irwin, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 95.

So a plea of accord and satisfaction, which fails to state that the matter relied upon as an accord was accepted by the plaintiff as a satisfaction, is bad on demurrer, but good after a verdict sustaining it. Wilkerson v. Bruce, 37 Mo. App. 156.

Defective Replication.—See Dignam v. Baily, L. R., 6 Q. B. 47; Griffin v. Pratt, 3 Conn. 513.

independent of statutory provision;¹ this rule, however, being subject to the reasonable qualification that the fact, which is presumed to have been proved, must always be such as can be implied from the averments on the record by fair and reasonable intendment.² Hence, it results that an intendment which is inconsistent with the allegations on the record will never be made by the court.³

Omission of Essential Element.—Where a party totally omits to allege in the pleading, either expressly or impliedly, a matter essential to his action or defense, such defect is irremediable and entirely beyond the salutary effects of a verdict.⁴

Criminal Cases.—In England, it is maintained that under the doctrine of intendment after verdict, as recognized at common law, there is no distinction between civil and criminal pleadings, as to the defective allegations which are aided by the verdict. Heymann v. Reg., L. R., 8 Q. B. 105; Reg. v. Aspinall, 2 Q. B. Div. 48; Bradlaugh v. Reg., 3 Q. B. Div. 607; Reg. v. Bowen, 13 Ad. & El. N. S. 795.

Bradwell, J., in delivering the opinion in Bradlaugh v. Reg., 3 Q. B. Div. 607, said that at common law there was no difference between civil and criminal pleadings, except that, according to the spirit in which the law is administered, if there were a difference, more strictness would be required in criminal than in civil cases.

In the United States it has been held that an indictment which is bad on demurrer must be held insufficient upon a motion in arrest of judgment, thus excluding, in such cases, the doctrine of intendment after verdict in a criminal prosecution. Com. v. Childs, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 200; Com. v. Bean, 14 Gray (Mass.) 54; State v. Barrett, 42 N. H. 466.

When Doctrine of Intendment Applicable.—It is clearly obvious that the doctrine of intendment after verdict can have no application, unless the verdict be given for the party in whose favor the intendment is to be made, since it is for the purpose of supporting the verdict that the court indulges the presumption arising upon the averments on the record. 1 Chitty's Pl. 705; Legg v. Dunlevy, 10 Mo. App. 461.

The rule is thus stated by Ld. Ch. B. Gilbert (Hist. C. Pl. 139): "If anything essential to the plaintiff's action be not set forth there, though the verdict be found for him, he cannot have judgment, because, if the general part of the declaration be not put in issue, the verdict can have no relation to it, and if it had been put in issue it might have been found false, and such matter as is the foundation of the action not being alleged, there is no ground for judgment; as if an action of trespass be brought by a master for beating his servant, and it does not show per quod servitium amisit. This is ill after verdict. Whatever is essential to the gist of the action cannot be cured by verdict. Such substantial facts must be alleged so that the defendant may traverse them distinctly if he pleases, for where he may traverse the whole so may he traverse each substantial part in order to put the weight of the action upon anything that will put an end to it."

Chancellor Kent, in rendering the opinion in Bartlett v. Crozier, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 438, said: "The court are never to presume a cause of action after verdict, when none appears."

Distinction Between Defective Statement of Title, and Statement of Defective Title.—The rule, as usually laid down, is, that a verdict will cure the defect where the plaintiff makes a defective statement of title, but not where he either states a defective title or totally omits to state any title or cause of action whatever. Rushton v. Aspinall, 2 Doug. 679; Crouther v. Oldfield, 1 Salk. 365; Spieres v. Parker, 1 T. R. 141; Carlisle v. Weston, 1 Met. (Mass.) 26; Reid v. Chelmsford, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 128; Walpole v. Marlow, 2 N. H. 385; Elliott v. Heath, 6 N. H. 428; Bedell v. Stevens, 28 N. H. 122; Sawyer v. Whittier, 2 N. H. 316; Addington v. Allen, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 385.

The true distinction between a defective title and a title defectively stated is this: when any particular fact is essential to the validity of the plaintiff's title, if such fact is neither expressly stated in the declaration nor necessarily implied from those facts which are stated, the title must be considered as defective and judgment must be arrested; but if such fact, although not expressly stated, be necessarily implied from what is stated, the title must be considered as only defectively stated, and the defect is cured by verdict. Walpole v. Marlow, 2 N. H. 385; Bedell v. Stevens, 28 N. H. 122.

Statement of Consideration.—A good illustration of the operation of the rule which distinguishes between the statement of a defective or no cause of action, and the defective statement of a cause of action, is furnished by the established practice regarding the averment of a consideration. Thus, though a defective statement of consideration will be cured by verdict, Hendrick v. Seely, 6 Conn. 176; Martin v. Blodgett, 1 Aik. (Vt.) 375; yet a declaration in assumpsit which does not allege any, or which does allege an illegal consideration, is fatally defective, and cannot be cured by verdict. Hitchcock v. Page, 1 Root (Conn.) 293; Russell v. Slade, 12 Conn. 455; Vadakin v. Soper, 1 Aik. (Vt.) 287; Harding v. Cragie, 8 Vt. 501; Mosely v. Jones, 5 Munf. (Va.) 23.

Action on Negotiable Instrument.—Actions of assumpsit on negotiable instruments form an exception to the rule requiring the averment of a consideration, as it is a universal rule of the law that in such obligations the consideration is presumed. Hemmenway v. Hickey, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 499.

Omission of Essential Element.—Where the plaintiff brought an action of trespass on the case, as being entitled to the reversion of a certain inclosure, to which the declaration alleged a certain injury to have been committed, but failed to allege that the reversion was in fact prejudiced, or to show any grievance which in its nature would necessarily prejudice the reversion, the

Collateral Parts of Pleading.—Defects, omissions, or imperfections, though in form only, appearing in some collateral parts of the pleading which were not in issue between the parties, may not be cured by the application of this doctrine of intendment, as there is no room for the presumption that the defect or omission was supplied by proof.¹

court arrested the judgment after a verdict had been given in the plaintiff's favor, and held the fault to be one which the verdict could not cure. Jackson v. Pesked, 1 M. & S. 237.

Lack of "Scienter."—In an action for deceit in the sale of a newspaper establishment, it was held that the declaration must expressly aver that the defendant made the affirmation fraudulently, falsely, or knowingly, or it will be bad, and the omission of these words will not be supplied by the concluding part of the count that, by reason of said affirmation, the plaintiff was fraudulently and falsely deceived, etc. The lack of such allegation of fraud or the scienter is not aided by verdict. Bayard v. Malcolm, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 569; 3 Am. Dec. 450.

In an action on the case for fraudulent misrepresentation by means of which a loss results, goods having been sold on credit, failure to aver that the representation was made with intent to defraud and deceive was deemed fatal after verdict. Addington v. Allen, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 374.

Identity of Defendant with Injury.—In a suit for damages resulting from the accidental overturning of the plaintiff's carriage, a complaint which failed to set forth the defendant's connection with the mishap, was ruled to be fatal after verdict. Lee v. Emery, 10 Minn. 187.

Identity of Plaintiff with Injury.—In an action of libel, judgment was arrested because it was not averred that the libel was of or concerning the plaintiff. Lowfield v. Bancroft, Stra. 934.

Averment of Special Damage.—In Sawyer v. Whittier, 2 N. H. 315, it was held in an action of trespass on the case, brought against a sheriff for a false return, that the verdict did not remedy the want of an allegation of the particular damage resulting to the plaintiff from the falsity of the return.

Want of Issue.—Where a party to an action wholly omits to plead, there will be no room for intendment and hence no ground for aid by verdict. Woods Adm. v. Woods, Minor (Ala.) 45; Channing v. Caskaden, Minor (Ala.) 74; Herbert v. Wich, 45 Md. 474; Pratt v. Phillips, 4 Yeates (Pa.) 467 (which has been overruled by Sauerman v. Wickery, 17 S. & R. (Pa.) 116).

Actions Under Statutes.—Where the plaintiff would entitle himself to an action under statute, he must allege all the facts upon which the statute grounds the action, and if he fails to do this in his declaration, he cannot have judgment. Spieres v. Parker, 1 T. R. 141; Williams v. Hingham, etc., Turnpike Co., 4 Pick. (Mass.) 341; Bartlett v. Crozier, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 456; 8 Am. Dec. 428.

Penal Statutes.—It is a general rule of pleading that in declaring upon a penal statute, the offense must be brought within the statutory description. Little v. Thompson, 2 Me. 230.

Criminal Statutes.—It is also a general rule that indictments upon statutes must state all the circumstances in the act which constitute the statutory offense, so as to bring the defendant directly within the operation of the statute. An indictment lacking in this respect will not be aided by verdict. 1 Chitty's Cr. L. 232; Com. v. Morse, 2 Mass. 127; Brown v. Com., 8 Mass. 65; Com. v. Collins, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 556; State v. Gove, 34 N. H. 515; State v. Barrett, 42 N. H. 466.

Statutory Defense.—To a declaration against a railroad company for money had and received and on accounts stated, the company pleaded that the action was brought after the passing of an Incorporating Act, and that no notice had been given pursuant to the statute. This plea was held bad after verdict because no averment was made that the action fell within the class described in the statute. Garton v. Great Western R. Co., El. Bl. & El. 837; 96 E. C. L. 836.

tion was granted, and the plaintiff pleaded non est factum, and there was a verdict for the plaintiff, the verdict was held not to cure this defect by the common law because it was not necessary that it should be proved on the trial by whom administration was granted, the title of the administrator not being in question by the issue. Gidley v. Williams, 1 Salk. 37.

1. For English Statutes of Jeofails, see 1 Chitty's Pl. 715; Tidd's Pr. 923.

We do not deem it necessary to set forth in terms the Statutes of Jeofails as they exist in the various states. Suffice it to say that their general import is the curing of all insubstantial errors, or, as it is frequently expressed, "No judgment shall be reversed or arrested by reason of any defect or error in the pleadings which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties." See Cotes v. Davenport, 9 Iowa 227; Smith v. Milburn, 17 Iowa 30; Doniphan v. Street, 17 Iowa 317; State v. Raymond, 20 Iowa 582; Weil v. Martin, 24 Hun (N. Y.) 645; Spies v. Roberts, 50 N. Y. Super. Ct. 305; Moore v. Edmiston, 70 N. Car. 510; Gorham v. Bellamy, 82 N. Car. 496; White v. Morris, 107 N. Car. 92; State v. Robinson, 35 N. J. L. 71; Connors v. State, 45 N. J. L. 211; Harkness v. McClain, 8 Utah 52; Slaughter v. Com., 13 Gratt. (Va.) 769.

Thus, it is maintained to be a rule of civil pleading that an error which is demurrable and amendable is insufficient in arrest of judgment. Haverhill Loan, etc., Assoc. v. Cronin, 4 Allen (Mass.) 141; U. S. v. Smith, 17 Fed. Rep. 512.

In pursuance of this rule it has been held that where the damages were left blank in the declaration, but were laid in the writ, it was held that the declaration was amendable by the writ, and after verdict the amendment must be considered as made. Malone v. Donally, Minor (Ala.) 12; Stephens v. White, 2 Wash. (Va.) 203.

Several of the states have statutes providing that a verdict shall cure the omission of the averment of any matter without which the jury ought not to have given such verdict, thus adopting the common law doctrine of intendment. Gander v. State, 50 Ind. 539; Robinett v. Morris, Hard. (Ky.) 99; Hamer v. Rigby, 65 Miss. 41; Welsh v. Bryan, 28 Mo. 30; Addington v. Allen, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 387; Laughlin v. Flood, 3 Munf. (Va.) 255.

Where a bond made by two is sued upon, but only one of the obligors sued, and two pleas are filed, the first alleging payment by one obligor, and the other alleging payment by the other obligor, and the single replication professing to answer both pleas was filed, on which issue was taken by the defendant, and the verdict was rendered for the plaintiff; it was held that though the replication was defective, yet the mispleading was cured by the verdict by virtue of the Statute of Jeofails. Barrow v. Wade, 7 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 49.

England—Criminal Actions.—It seems that the English Statutes of Jeofails were not regarded as applying to criminal actions. See, to this effect, 1 Chitty's Pl. 716; 2 Tidd 956; 2 Hale P. C. 193; Rex v. Atkins, 3 Mod. 3; Rex v. Sparks, 3 Mod. 78; Atcheson v. Everitt, 1 Cowp. 382; Com. v. Morse, 2 Mass. 128; Brown v. Com., 8 Mass. 59; State v. Squire, 10 N. H. 558; Com. v. Child, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 200; State v. Gove, 34 N. H. 516; State v. Barrett, 42 N. H. 470. See also Reg. v. Tutchin, 6 Mod. 268.

United States—Criminal Actions.—In the United States the rule, as established by the following adjudications, approves the application of the Statutes of Jeofails to criminal cases: Gandy v. State, 81 Ala. 68; People v. Swenson, 49 Cal. 388; People v. Monteith, 73 Cal. 7; Stone v. People, 3 Ill. 326; State v. Craighead, 32 Mo. 561; State v. Sides, 64 Mo. 383; Com. v. Walton, 11 Allen (Mass.) 238; Gray v. People, 21 Hun (N. Y.) 140; People v. Robinson, 2 Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 311; Larison v. State, 49 N. J. L. 258; State v. Robinson, 35 N. J. L. 71; Connors v. State, 45 N. J. L. 211; Lazier v. Com., 10 Gratt. (Va.) 708; Trimble v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 143; Com. v. Erwin, 2 Va. Cas. 337; Aldridge v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 447; Com. v. Bennet, 2 Va. Cas. 235.

Thus, it has been held in Missouri that the failure of the foreman of the merely formal errors,¹ even including those which occur in some grand jury to certify under his hand an indictment to be a true bill, is no cause for the arrest of judgment after the trial and conviction. State v. Burgess, 24 Mo. 381; 69 Am. Dec. 433; State v. Harris, 73 Mo. 287; State v. Mertens, 14 Mo. 95.

And in Virginia, it has been held that where an indictment filled the whole sheet of paper and was then folded in another half sheet of the same size, on which half sheet the attorney indorsed "Commonwealth v. Joseph Burgess, indictment," and immediately below, in the handwriting of the foreman of the grand jury, was indorsed, "A true bill, Robert Hamilton, Foreman," although the half sheet of paper was blank except the indorsement, and although it was not otherwise attached to the indictment than being folded around it, yet the indictment enveloped by it must be considered as the indictment which was passed on by the grand jury, and on which verdict was found by the jury. Though the objection was a good one, it would come too late after verdict. Burgess v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 483.

The objection that an indictment has no caption, or that it does not show in what court it was presented, or found, cannot be raised after verdict by a motion in arrest of judgment. Gray v. People, 21 Hun (N. Y.) 140.

Where, in a prosecution for enticing away a servant or a minor child, the complaint is wanting in that certainty of description which is essential to constitute a formal charge of crime, but is demurrable and amendable, the defect is not available in this court, unless duly objected to it in the court below. Gandy v. State, 81 Ala. 68.

An indictment, under a statute which makes it a crime to "send or convey" an insulting, indecent, lascivious, disgusting, offensive, or annoying communication to any female, which charges that the prisoner did "send and convey," is technically defective, the words "send" and "convey" importing a different mode of transmission; but this defect is amendable and, therefore, to be available the objection must be taken by demurrer or motion to quash before the jury is sworn. Larison v. State, 49 N. J. L. 256.

Where a complaint charged the keeping of a tenement or shop used for the unlawful keeping and sale of intoxicating liquors, the objection that this charge is bad because made in the alternative, is merely formal within the meaning of the statute which declares any objection to a complaint, indictment, or other criminal process for a formal defect, apparent on its face, shall be taken by demurrer or motion to quash before a judgment has been rendered by a trial justice or a police court, or a jury has been sworn in the superior court. It is within the power of the legislature to pass an act providing that formal objections to complaints and indictments must be made at a particular stage of the proceedings. Com. v. Walton, 11 Allen (Mass.) 238.

The following cases hold that where the error in the pleading is demurrable or amendable, it cannot be raised for the first time in arrest of judgment. U. S. v. Smith, 17 Fed. Rep. 510; Maguire v. State, 47 Md. 485; State v. Gedicke, 43 N. J. L. 86; Com. v. Kressler, 12 Phila. (Pa.) 628.

Maine.—In this state the same view is taken of the Statutes of Jeofails, with reference to their application to criminal cases, as the English courts have held. In Webster's Case, 5 Me. 432, it was declared to be a well established doctrine that none of the Statutes of Jeofails extend to indictments or proceedings in criminal cases. In this instance it was held that a defective indictment is not cured by verdict, if the omitted words a "true bill" are necessary to render the indictment good and legal, and the defendant's objection on this ground is as available to him on a motion in arrest of judgment as it could have been in any earlier stage of the case.

1. Collins v. Gibbs, 2 Burr. 899; Bowdwell v. Parsons, 10 East 359; Higgins v. Highfield, 13 East 407; Andre v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 30 Iowa 107; State v. Palmer, 32 La. Ann. 565; Coffin v. Coffin, 2 Mass. 364; Weil v. Martin, 24 Hun (N. Y.) 645; Spies v. Roberts, 50 N. Y. Super. Ct. 305; White v. Morris, 107 N. Car. 92; Moore v. Edmiston, 70 N. In an indictment under the New Jersey Criminal Act for Burglary, it was held to be unnecessary to aver that the crime was committed at any particular collateral part of the pleading;¹ but defects affecting the essential merits of the controversy are not remedied. Thus, where there is a total omission to state matters essential to a cause of action, or defense, or where there is a nonjoinder or want of issue, the error will be fatal.²

hour of the night; the general description "by night" being sufficient. If such description were erroneous, it could not, in consequence of the statute, be taken advantage of on writ of error, as such defect could not have prejudiced the defendant in his defense on the merits. State v. Robinson, 35 N. J. L. 71. Where the defendant was convicted upon an indictment under the 78th section of Criminal Act, which charged him with an assault upon Louis Noll, with intent feloniously, willfully, and of malice aforethought to kill and murder, without specifying particularly the manner with which the intent was manifested, it was held that the defect, if it existed, was merely formal and did not prejudice the defendant in maintaining his defense on the merits, and that, therefore, in consequence of the 89th section of the Criminal Procedure Act, judgment against him should be affirmed. Connors v. State, 45 N. J. L. 211.

Where, in a presentment, the offense is charged with a sufficient certainty for judgment to be given thereon according to the very right of the case, any defect in the presentment will be aided by verdict. Thus, where an indictment against S. for keeping an office and transacting business as agent of the Protection Insurance Company of Hartford, incorporated and authorized by the State of Connecticut, without having a license therefor, did not allege that the said company was an insurance company, the error was held to be cured by verdict. Slaughter v. Com., 13 Gratt. (Va.) 767.

Misjoinder, or Informal Joinder of Issue.—The Statutes of Jeofails, after verdict, operate to cure this defect. Myn v. Cole, Cro. Jac. 87; Hocker v. Davis, 2 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 118; Morrison v. Hart, Hard. (Ky.) 157; Chichester v. Daggett, 2 How. (Miss.) 863; State v. Smith, Peck (Tenn.) 165; Moore v. Mauro, 4 Rand. (Va.) 488; White v. Clay, 7 Leigh (Va.) 68; Southside R. Co. v. Daniel, 20 Gratt. (Va.) 361.

Want of Similiter.—It was once held that the want of a similiter was not aided by the verdict. Cooper v. Spencer, 1 Stra. 641; 2 Wm. Saund. 319. But now, by the operation of the Statutes of Jeofails, the omission of a similiter will not vitiate the proceedings, after verdict. Hall v. Banythan, Cro. Jac. 550; *Ripley v. Upon a declaration containing eight counts, issue was joined as to some, a demurrer filed as to others, one count remaining unanswered. The jury rendered a general verdict and on appeal the objection was made that there had been a trial without issue. The supreme court held that as one count in the declaration was unanswered, if evidence was given on that count that as to it there was a trial without issue, which proceeding was erroneous, and as there

Errors and irregularities in the course of a trial, other than those which occur in the pleadings, are also aided after verdict by the Statutes of Jeofails, provided they are such as do not prejudice the substantial rights of the adverse party.¹ Of such nature have been held to be irregularities in the writ of venire facias; or in drawing, summoning, or impaneling jurors;² certain errors in was nothing to show to which count the evidence was applied, and the finding of the jury in the case was general, that their only course was to reverse the judgment. Sheil v. Ferriter, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 574; Weirick v. Hoover, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 379.

Battle, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Morehead v. Browne, 6 Jones (N. Car.) 367, said: "If there be two distinct counts in the declaration, and the plaintiff offers evidence on one of them only, and not on the other, and the court instructs the jury on both, a general verdict on both will be erroneous, for the manifest reason that it does not appear that the verdict was not given, in part at least, upon the count on which there was no evidence. Jones v. Cooke, 3 Dev. (N. Car.) 112.

An immaterial issue will not be aided after verdict by the Statutes of Jeofails. Tidd's Pr. 920; 2 Wm. Saund. 319 b; Jones v. Bodimer, Carth. 371; Peck v. Hill, 2 Mod. 137; *Sandback v. L. 71; Harkness v. McClain, 8 Utah 52; Slaughter v. Com., 13 Gratt. (Va.) 769.

Defective Authentication of Record.—An objection that the authentication of the record was defective, should have been taken advantage of before trial, under the statute declaring that all questions concerning the regularity of proceedings in obtaining changes of venue, and the right of the court to which the change is made to try the cause and execute the judgment, shall be considered as waived after trial and verdict. Gardner v. People, 4 Ill. 83.

Defects in the minutes of the court, as to the formal presentation of the indictment in open court by the grand jury, cannot be taken advantage of after verdict. Jinks v. State, 5 Tex. App. 68; Honillion v. State, 3 Tex. App. 538; Alderson v. State, 2 Tex. App. 10.

2. No irregularity in a writ of venire facias, or in drawing, summoning, returning, or impaneling the jurors, shall be sufficient to set aside a verdict unless the party making the objection was injured by the irregularity, or unless the objection was made before the returning of the verdict. Crawford v. Creagh, 1 Ala. 592; State v. Beasley, 32 La. Ann. 1162; State v. Watson, 31 La. Ann. 379; Com. v. Stowell, 9 Met. (Mass.) 572; Amherst v. Hadley, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 38; *Fowler v. Grand Jurors.—This rule applies to grand jurors as well as to petit jurors. State v. Williams, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 454; State v. Robinson, 2 Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 309; State v. Ward, 2 Hawks (N. Car.) 443; State v. Jeffcoat, 26 S. Car. 114.

Selection of Jurors.—In Pressley v. State, 19 Ga. 192, it was held to be too late to object to a correction of the list of jurors directed by the court in the progress of selecting the jury, if the objection be made after the trial and verdict.

Objections to Competency of Jurors.—It is a well established doctrine that if a party knows of an objection to a juror in season to propose it before trial, and omits to do so, he shall not be allowed to raise the objection after verdict. Rex v. Sutton, 8 B. & C. 417; Hollingsworth v. Duane, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 353; Baxter v. People, 8 Ill. 369; Presbury v. Com., 9 Dana (Ky.) 203; Hallock v. Franklin County, 2 Met.

the instructions of the court;¹ and the appearance of an infant party by attorney instead of in person, provided, in this last case, the verdict be in favor of such infant party.²

3. As Evidence.—Where a verdict is sought to be introduced in evidence as proof of the facts upon which it is founded, the general rule is that it is not admissible without judgment, as the judgment may have been arrested or a new trial granted;³ but (Mass.) 560; Wassum v. Feeney, 121 Mass. 93; 23 Am. Rep. 258; Jeffries v. Randall, 14 Mass. 205; Merrill v. Berkshire, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 269; Davis v. Allen, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 468; 22 Am. Dec. 386; Fox v. Hazelton, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 277; Russell v. Quinn, 114 Mass. 103; Brown v. Reed, 81 Me. 158; Tilton v. Kimball, 52 Me. 500; State v. Bowden, 71 Me. 90; Stedman v. Batchelor, 49 Hun (N. Y.) 390; State v. Ward, 2 Hawks (N. Car.) 443; Hayward v. Calhoun, 2 Ohio St. 165; Young v. State, 23 Ohio St. 577; M'Corkle v. Binns, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 340; 6 Am. Dec. 420; Poindexter v. Com., 33 Gratt. (Va.) 776.

The reason of this rule is clearly expressed by Mr. Justice Shaw, in Hallock v. Franklin, 2 Met. (Mass.) 560. He observes: "This rule is founded on good reason. A party litigant, knowing of matter of personal exception to a juror, lies by, taking his chance for a favorable verdict. If when that verdict is against him, he could go back and take the exception, it would work great injustice. By consenting to go on, with a knowledge of the exception, he consents to abide the result whether favorable or unfavorable."

Even though the party to the suit be ignorant of the interest of the juror until after verdict, a new trial will not be granted if the objection was known to his counsel before trial. Kent v. Charlestown, 2 Gray (Mass.) 281; Russell v. Quinn, 114 Mass. 103.

Similarly, where it was objected that the verdict was insufficient and uncertain because it gave damages for prospective injuries which the defendant would sustain, it was held that the verdict might have been amended, and that it was too late to take advantage of this exception after it had lain by until it was too late for the party defendant to have it corrected in the court below. State Bank v. Batty, 5 Ill. 200.

Objection to Form of Verdict.—An objection to the form of a verdict, which might have been remedied by the court which tried the cause, if it had been made at the time of its rendition, cannot be taken in the appellate court. Roach v. Hulings, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 319; Schlenker v. Risley, 4 Ill. 483; 38 Am. Dec. 100; State Bank v. Batty, 5 Ill. 200; Pedan v. Hopkins, 13 S. & R. (Pa.) 45.

1. Thus, the court may refuse to set aside the verdict on account of alleged erroneous instruction, unless it is satisfied that a real substantial injury has been done; as, that but for such erroneous instruction, a different conclusion would have been reached by the jury. Carruthers v. McMurray, 75 Iowa 173; State v. Chase, 37 La. Ann. 165; Dunlap v. Edwards, 29 Miss. 41; Thornsburch v. Mastin, 93 N. Car. 259.

(Pa.) 70. See also Schurmpier v. Johnson, 10 Minn. 319; Schaeffer v. Kreitzer, 6 Binn. (Pa.) 430. Compare Gilbert on Evidence 36-37.

But see Kip v. Brigham, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 168, where a verdict was recovered against a sheriff for the escape of a prisoner who had given security for the liberties of the jail. It was held that the postea was admissible in evidence without judgment, in an action brought by the sheriff against the obligees on the bond of security. In this case the obligees in the bond had been notified of the pendency of the suit against the sheriff, and had actively cooperated in its defense. For this reason the court considered the verdict in effect a verdict against the obligees, holding that there was no reason why it might not be considered as evidence for the amount of the debt or demand against the sheriff. See also Robbins v. Chicago, 4 Wall. (U. S.) 657; Crawford v. Turk, 24 Gratt. (Va.) 176.

Presumption of Judgment.—In the case of Deloach v. Worke, 3 Hawks the verdict alone may be received where its object is merely to establish the fact of trial and verdict.¹

4. As a Bar to Subsequent Suits.—In civil cases, a verdict without judgment cannot operate as a bar to further litigation involving the same subject-matter and between the same parties.² In criminal cases, however, the rule is different, the defendant being allowed to plead a former verdict of acquittal or conviction, upon a subsequent prosecution for the same offense, though no judgment has been pronounced thereon by the court.³

(N. Car.) 36, it was held, on account of an early looseness of practice in making up the record, that a copy of the verdict would be received, with proof of the judgment, as this would be presumed unless the contrary was shown.

It is held, also, that a verdict in a former action of ejectment is evidence against a defendant without proof of judgment, if he has acquiesced in it by payment of costs and delivery of possession. Schaeffer v. Kreitzer, 6 Binn. (Pa.) 430.

In New York, it has been held unnecessary to produce a copy of the judgment rendered by a justice of the peace, as the justice should render judgment as a matter of course. Felter v. Mulliner, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 181.

1. 1 Greenl. on Evidence, § 510; Fisher v. Kitchingman, Willes' Rep. 367; Barlow v. Dupuy, 1 Martin N. S. (La.) 442; Kipp v. Brigham, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 168.

2. Buller's N. P. 234; Willes' Rep. 368; Schurmeier v. Johnson, 10 Minn. 319; Saylor v. Hicks, 36 Pa. St. 392; State v. Norvell, 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 24; 24 Am. Dec. 458. See also Felter v. Mulliner, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 181.

"It is the judgment or decree of the court which concludes," says Strong, J., in Saylor v. Hicks, 36 Pa. St. 392, "and not the verdict of the jury." Hence, it was held in this case that the verdict of a jury upon an issue directed by a court of equity, is not conclusive upon the parties, on the trial of an action at law in which the same question is raised.

The reason of the rule which, in a civil case, excludes the plea of a former verdict, without judgment, seems to be that by arrest of judgment or a new trial awarded, the antecedent proceedings, including the verdict, and of which it is the result, may have been invalidated. Consistent with this rationale, it has been held in New York, where a justice of the peace has no authority to arrest a judgment, or award a new trial, that it need not be shown, when a verdict rendered in a trial before such functionary is pleaded in bar for a second suit, that it was in fact followed by the pronouncement of a judgment. This must be taken for granted, as under the law the justice had no discretion to do otherwise. Felter v. Mulliner, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 181.

Where Judgment Should Have Been Pronounced, but Was Not.—In New York, it has been held that where there is an omission on the part of the court to render a judgment within four days after the return of the verdict, as required by statute, and there is a consequent loss of jurisdiction of the court so that no valid judgment can be rendered, the verdict may, nevertheless, be pleaded in bar of another action. Kane v. Dulex, 3 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 127.

Federal Constitution.—"No person shall be subject . . . for the same offense, to be put twice in jeopardy of life or limb." United States Const. Amend., art. 5.

State Constitutions—South Carolina.—Most of the state constitutions have provisions substantially similar to that contained in the Constitution of the

5. Verdicts Upon Issues out of Chancery.—Where certain issues of fact arising in a chancery cause are submitted to a jury for determination, under the rules regulating the ancient course of chancery practice, as well as that which prevails in most of the states at the present time, the decision of the jury thereon is held to be advisory merely, and in no wise binding upon the conscience of the chancellor;¹ and this is also the attributed effect of

United States, just set forth. A material diversity, however, is noticed in the fundamental law of South Carolina which in terms provides immunity only for those who have "been once acquitted by a jury." South Carolina Const., § 18, art. 1.

The doctrine as to the effect of a verdict in a criminal case, upon a subsequent prosecution for the same offense, is applicable, though the verdict may have been irregular, insufficient, or erroneous (see Nolan v. State, 55 Ga. 521; 21 Am. Rep. 281; Kelley v. People, 115 Ill. 583; 56 Am. Rep. 184; State v. Davis, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 345; Croft v. People, 15 Hun (N. Y.) 484; Rhoads v. Com. (Pa. 1886), 4 Cent. Rep. 725), unless it is so defective that no judgment could have been rendered upon it. Williams v. State, 45 Ala. 57; Lawrence v. People, 2 Ill. 414; *Wright v. Thus, it has been held where the indictment was not sufficient to authorize punishment if conviction had ensued, the verdict of conviction or acquittal cannot operate as a bar. Rex v. Taylor, 3 B. & C. 502; 10 E. C. L. 166; 1 Chitty's Crim. Law 462. And, conversely, an acquittal was successfully pleaded in bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offense, where the indictment, as it read at the time of the trial, was sufficient. People v. Cook, 10 Mich. 164; Heikes v. Com., 26 Pa. St. 514.

But where a judgment is improperly arrested upon a good indictment, the verdict may nevertheless be pleaded in bar of subsequent prosecution. State v. Norvell, 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 24; 24 Am. Dec. 458.

Even in a civil action, where the proceedings at the trial were regular and a valid verdict rendered, and judgment was not pronounced merely on account of the lapse of the statutory period within which it should have been done, the same effect was allowed the verdict, as though judgment had been actually pronounced. Kane v. Dulex, 3 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 127.

Appeal—Motion for New Trial.—Where a defendant in a criminal prosecution, during the trial of which there has been material error, instead of making a motion for new trial, elects to appeal from the judgment, the former conviction is no bar to a new trial, when the judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered. People v. Barric, 49 Cal. 342.

Wrong Judgment—Regular Trial.—Where the trial has been regular but a wrong judgment pronounced, the prisoner cannot be subjected to a subsequent prosecution for the same offense. Shepard v. People, 25 N. Y. 406.

Under the present English chancery practice, the granting of a jury trial in an equitable action, rests in the court's discretion. 2 Daniel's Ch. Pr. (6th Am. ed.) 1071 (n).

There were two classes of cases where a party to a chancery suit is entitled to demand the submission of issues of fact to a jury; the one where a suit is brought to establish a will of real estate against the heir; the other, in a suit involving the right to tithes to which a rector or vicar is a party, where the fact of a modus is drawn into the controversy. 2 Daniel's Ch. Pr. (6 Am. ed.) 1074.

Under the Bankruptcy Act, § 72, it is provided that "if in any proceeding in bankruptcy there arises any question of fact which the parties desire to be tried before a jury instead of by the court itself, or which the court thinks ought to be tried by jury, the court may direct such trial to be had and such trial may be had accordingly." In the case of Ex p. Morgan, 2 Ch. Div. 72, which was brought under this act, it was held that when a question of fact has been tried by a jury in the court of bankruptcy, the court cannot set aside or disregard the verdict unless either there was no evidence to go to the jury, or, by reason of some matter of law or of some new fact, the verdict has become immaterial to the decision of the case. It will be seen that the ordinary rules which prevail in a strictly equitable cause, as to the right of the chancellor to disregard, were not applicable to this case. This seems to support Mr. Greenleaf's statement, which appears in section 266, volume 3, of his work on Evidence. He says "In proportion to the duty of directing an issue to the jury, is the obligation of the judge to be governed by their verdict."

California.—Heydenfeldt, J., in Gray v. Eaton, 5 Cal. 448, very satisfactorily states the doctrine regarding the effect of the findings of a jury upon issues submitted to them by the chancellor under the regular chancery practice. He says, referring to the case under consideration: "The chancellor directed certain issues to be determined by the jury. This he had a right to do, as it might aid to inform his conscience. By the finding he is not bound any more than, in his sound judgment, it is supported by the evidence; so in his decree he may be governed by it, or he may disregard it. The application, therefore, of the defendants, for a new trial upon the issues, was supererogatory, because the judge had not yet decreed upon the verdict, but if he had, it was a matter in his mere discretion to grant or refuse the application, which is not revisable."

The decision of the supreme court in this case is overruled, in Duff v. Fisher, 15 Cal. 376, upon the strength of a statutory provision, to which the court says the attention of the judges in Gray v. Eaton, 5 Cal. 448, was not called. The statute referred to provides the manner in which the verdict of a jury, upon an issue submitted to its decision, may be reviewed, which is only by a motion for a new trial. By the construction adopted, this statute was held to apply to equitable as well as legal actions so far as the provisions were consistent with the rights and remedies administered in the courts of equity.

The decision in Duff v. Fisher, 15 Cal. 376, above alluded to, changed the effect of a verdict on chancery issues, for, by holding that a verdict so rendered may be reviewed only on motion for a new trial, such verdicts are placed upon the same foundation as the findings of a jury in the ordinary course of a common-law action. This view of the subject seems to have been adopted for a time by the decisions in that state. See Gagliardo v. Hoberlin, 18 Cal. 396; Allen v. Fenelon, 27 Cal. 69; Doe v. Vallejo, 29 Cal. 386. More recently, however, the tendency seems to be toward the earlier position. See Bates v. Gage, 49 Cal. 127; Wakefield v. Bouton, 55 Cal. 109; Quinby v. Conlan, 104 U. S. 420.

Colorado.—Abbott v. Monti, 3 Colo. 561.

Illinois.—A verdict upon an issue out of chancery does not necessarily constitute a basis of the adjudication in the suit, as is the case at common law. It is not conclusive of the facts thus found, but the court may, notwithstanding the verdict, find the facts the other way upon an examination of the evidence in the case, and render a decree accordingly. Or the court may adopt a part of the facts as found by the verdict, and upon other points arrive at a different conclusion. Garrett v. Stevenson, 8 Ill. 278; Sibert v. McAvoy, 15 Ill. 106; Williams v. Bishop, 15 Ill. 553; Austin v. Bainter, 50 Ill. 308; Russell v. Fanning, 2 Ill. App. 632.

In the case of Smith v. Newton, 84 Ill. 14, the right of the chancellor to disregard the findings of a jury on issues submitted to them, is also approved. It is said to be the general practice of the court, where the finding of the jury on issues submitted to them, is clearly against evidence, to set the verdict aside and submit the issues to another jury, or render a decree on the evidence heard on the trial of the issue. However, where the evidence is irreconcilably conflicting, the court will not interfere with the finding, unless it can be seen that it is clearly wrong; and in Titcomb v. Vantyle, 84 Ill. 371, it is held that the verdict of a jury, on the trial of a feigned issue out of chancery, is merely advisory to the chancellor, who may regard or disregard it, enter a decree conformable or contrary thereto, as in his judgment the weight of evidence may justify. See also Williams v. Bishop, 15 Ill. 553.

In the case of Kelly v. Kelly, 126 Ill. 550, which was a chancery cause, certain issues of fact were submitted to a jury for their determination. However, upon the rendition of the verdict by the jury, the court set it aside, vacated the order for the submission of the cause to the jury, and proceeded to find the facts and enter a decree, without evidence other than that which had been heard upon the jury trial, totally disregarding the verdict of the jury. Upon appeal, Mr. Justice Baker, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "In chancery causes, in which the right of a trial by jury is not expressly given by law, the verdict of a jury is advisory merely. In such cases, the chancellor may act as his sound judicial discretion, and his judgment and opinion of the weight of evidence, dictate. He may either predicate his findings and decree upon the verdict, or, if he is not satisfied with it, may set it aside and submit the issues to another jury, or, acting in total disregard of the verdict, may, on the evidence submitted at the jury trial, render a decree that is contrary to the findings returned by the jury."

Indiana.—It is enacted by Indiana Rev. Stat. (1881), § 409, that "Issues of law and issues of fact, in causes that prior to the eighteenth day of June, 1852, were of exclusive equitable jurisdiction, shall be tried by the court; issues of fact in all other causes shall be triable as the same are now triable. . . . Provided, that in all cases triable by the court as above directed, the court, in its discretion, for its information, may cause any question of fact to be tried by a jury, or the court may refer any such cause to a master commissioner for hearing and reporting." Under this statute it has been held that any verdict which a jury may return, upon the issues submitted to them, is only for the information of the court and not obligatory upon it; and that the court, therefore, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may disregard such verdict. Ray v. Doughty, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 115; Lapreese v. Falls, 7 Ind. 692; Hendricks v. Frank, 86 Ind. 278; Lake Erie, etc., R. Co. v. Griffin, 92 Ind. 487; Carmichael v. Adams, 91 Ind. 526; Pence v. Garrison, 93 Ind. 345; Israel v. Jackson, 93 Ind. 543; Jennings v. Durham, 101 Ind. 391.

In Maine, there is a constitutional provision, art. 1, § 20, in these words: "In all civil suits, and in all controversies concerning property, the parties shall have a right to a trial by jury, except in cases where it has, heretofore, been otherwise practiced," and by the Statutes of 1873, ch. 130, it is made imperative upon the court to order an issue on motion of either party. See Call v. Perkins, 65 Me. 439. From the tenor of these provisions, constitutional and statutory, it might be presumed that the effect of the verdict upon issues out of chancery was designed to be changed. But the courts have held otherwise, asserting that the general rule in chancery is, inasmuch as the responsibility of the whole decision rests upon the court, the findings of the jury must be such as to satisfy the conscience of the court; but it is also maintained that it is the duty of the chancellor to control any disposition, on the part of his conscience, towards unreasonable fastidiousness or caprice. Larrabee v. Grant, 70 Me. 79; Metcalf v. Metcalf, 85 Me. 473.

Maryland.—Hoffman v. Smith, 1 Md. 475.

Michigan.—In Dunn v. Dunn, 11 Mich. 284, Justice Campbell, speaking of issues out of chancery, said: "While a verdict fairly given, without improper reception or rejection of evidence, is not to be lightly disregarded, yet it has no binding force on such issues. A new trial will be ordered upon much slighter grounds than in an ordinary action at law. And even without a new trial, the court may entirely disregard the verdict and make a decree against it, although it satisfied the judge who tried the case. The reason for this difference is, that in an action at law the jury are the sole judges of questions of fact, while in a court of equity there is no process by which the chancellor can substitute the conscience or belief of the jury for his own; and he must find the facts on his own responsibility. An issue is not framed to relieve him from the responsibility, but to aid him, by a trial in open court, where witnesses are produced and examined orally more fully than they can be on paper. . . . And there is no authority which I have discovered which renders it incumbent on any court of chancery, or even proper, to follow a verdict which is not calculated to aid the conscience of the court, in solving questions of fact otherwise doubtful." And see Willard v. Magoon, 30 Mich. 273.

In Missouri, issues out of chancery are submitted to a jury, in the discretion of the chancellor, to inform his conscience and not to control his judgment. The judge presiding in an equity case is not compelled, under any circumstances, to submit special issues to a jury, nor is the finding of the jury upon such issues, when submitted to them, conclusive upon him, or upon an appellate court. The court may set aside the findings, and submit the issues to another jury, or may disregard the findings altogether, and pronounce its own judgment upon the issues upon the final hearing. Weeke v. Senden, 54 Mo. 129; Lockwood v. Limsford, 56 Mo. 68; Durkee v. Chambers, 57 Mo. 575; Gay v. Ihm, 3 Mo. App. 588; Page v. Dixon, 59 Mo. 43; Hambricht v. Brockman, 59 Mo. 52; Hess v. Miles, 70 Mo. 203; Keithley v. Keithley, 85 Mo. 217; Bevin v. Powell, 11 Mo. App. 216; Hulett v. Stockwell, 34 Mo. App. 599.

Directing Verdict.—It has been held in this state that when a jury is impaneled to try an issue out of chancery, the chancellor may peremptorily instruct them what verdict to return—so completely under his control is this proceeding. Hess v. Miles, 70 Mo. 203.

In the case of O'Bryan v. O'Bryan, 13 Mo. 16; 53 Am. Dec. 128, an appeal was taken to the refusal of the chancellor to set aside the verdict of a jury on issues made up and submitted to them. The appellate court, construing a statute regarding the awarding of new trials in chancery issues, said, through Ryland, J., who delivered the opinion on this occasion: "When the chancellor, before whom these issues have been tried, upon motion, refuses to have them tried anew, by setting aside the first finding, I must see a clear and obvious case of improper finding by the triers, or of misdirection by the triers, or of misdirection by the court, before I will interfere." In this case, the findings of the jury, upon the issues made up in a chancery cause and submitted to them, seem to have been regarded in precisely the same light as a verdict in an ordinary common-law cause, but upon what authority it does not appear. It certainly would not be so regarded now. See more recent cases in Missouri cited above.

New Jersey.—The office of a jury, in a court of equity, is not definitely and finally, as in a court of law, to settle questions of fact, but simply to inform the conscience of the chancellor where he has doubt. Freeman v. Staats, 9 N. J. Eq. 821; Coryell v. New Hope Delaware Bridge Co., 9 N. J. Eq. 457; Rusling v. Rusling, 35 N. J. Eq. 120.

New Mexico.—Huntington v. Moore, 1 N. Mex. 489.

North Carolina.—Humphreys v. Ward, 74 N. Car. 784.

In Oregon, the verdict of a jury, on issues out of chancery submitted to them, is held not to be conclusive, but it is also maintained that it should not be disregarded unless manifestly contrary to the evidence. De Lashmutt v. Everson, 7 Oregon 213; Swegle v. Wells, 7 Oregon 223.

Pennsylvania.—In the case of Scheetz's Appeal, 35 Pa. St. 88, it was held that the granting or refusal of an issue in equity is not the subject of an appeal. It is but a means of informing the conscience of the court as to disputed facts, and the verdict is not even binding if the court think it wrong. Baltimore v. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co., 3 Pittsb. (Pa.) 20; Baker v. Williamson, 2 Pa. St. 116.

South Carolina.—Gadsden v. Whaley, 9 S. Car. 147; Charlotte, etc., R. Co. v. Earle, 12 S. Car. 53; Ivy v. Clawson, 14 S. Car. 267; Small v. Small, 16 S. Car. 64; Peake v. Peake, 17 S. Car. 421; Brownlee v. Martin, 21 S. Car. 392.

Tennessee.—The verdict of a jury, on an issue submitted to them by the chancellor, is only advisory and designed to assist the chancellor in determining the facts. He has the right, and it is his duty, to disregard the finding of the jury if the same is not authorized by the rules governing courts of chancery. Humphreys v. Blevins, 1 Overt. (Tenn.) 178; Glass v. Mason, 4 Sneed (Tenn.) 508; Orgain v. Ramsey, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 580; Timmons v. Garrison, 4 Humph. (Tenn.) 148; Lowe v. Traynor, 6 Coldw. (Tenn.) 633.

Should Not be Lightly Disregarded.—The finding of an issue of fact in chancery is not as obligatory upon the court as is the finding of a verdict upon an issue at common law, but still it has much weight and should be sustained, unless it appears satisfactorily to be unsupported by proof. Timmons v. Garrison, 4 Humph. (Tenn.) 148; Lowe v. Traynor, 6 Coldw. (Tenn.) 633.

Utah.—Smith v. Richardson, 2 Utah 424.

Vermont.—Adams v. Soule, 33 Vt. 538.

In Virginia, the practice in the subject does not seem to be altogether settled. Thus, though, it is held in Grigsby v. Weaver, 5 Leigh (Va.) 212, that it is matter within the sound discretion of the chancellor whether he shall direct an issue, or decide the question of fact himself, and a like matter of discretion whether he shall set aside the verdict on the issue or not, yet in a verdict upon issues of fact framed in a chancery cause and submitted to a jury in the federal tribunals.¹

In several of the states, however, statutes, or constitutional provisions respecting the right to trial by jury, have been construed to impart to the finding of a jury upon a chancery issue

Carter v. Campbell, Gilm. (Va.) 159, it is said that in a case proper for an issue, the verdict is conclusive.

In Lee v. Boak, 11 Gratt. (Va.) 182, it is declared that where an issue is directed in a chancery cause, and a verdict is found to which no exception is taken, and a decree is rendered thereon, the facts found in the verdict must be regarded in the appellate court as established facts of the case.

This practice seems never to have been regarded in this state as resting within the arbitrary discretion of the chancellor.

In Stannard v. Graves, 2 Call (Va.) 369, it was said that the discretion of the chancellor, in disregarding the verdict of a jury upon a chancery issue, is to be exercised on sound principles, of which the appellate court may judge. And see Love v. Braxton, 5 Call (Va.) 542; Reed v. Cline, 9 Gratt. 136; Beverly v. Walden, 20 Gratt. (Va.) 147; Steptoe v. Flood, 31 Gratt. (Va.) 323; Crebs v. Jones, 79 Va. 381.

Regarding this practice, see also Plesants v. Anderson, 1 Wash. (Va.) 156; M'Rae v. Woods, 1 Hen. & M. (Va.) 547; Samuel v. Marshall, 3 Leigh (Va.) 567.

In Wisconsin, the doctrine prevails, under the decision of Callahan v. Judd, 23 Wis. 343, that the finding of a jury upon an issue of fact, in an equitable action, has only this advisory effect. Jackman Will Case, 26 Wis. 104; Chafin Will Case, 32 Wis. 557; Stahl v. Gotzenberger, 45 Wis. 121; Stanley v. Risse, 49 Wis. 219; Powers v. Large, 75 Wis. 494.

Issue out of Chancery Under Statute of Wills.—A verdict upon an issue in chancery, made up, in obedience to the Statute of Wills, to try whether the writing produced was the will of the testator or not, tried by a jury whose verdict should be final between the parties, saving to the court the power of granting a new trial for good cause as in other trials, is not like an ordinary verdict upon an issue in a chancery cause, which must satisfy the conscience of the chancellor, or be disregarded, but like a verdict in a common-law action, and can be set aside only on grounds which would be fatal to a common-law verdict. Singleton v. Singleton, 8 Dana (Ky.) 315.

1. The verdict of a jury in an issue out of chancery is in no wise binding upon the chancellor. From first to last, the proceeding is within his discretion. He may refer the issue to be tried by a jury or not, as he chooses; and when this has been done, and a verdict rendered, he may have the issue tried again, or disregard it entirely, and pronounce a decree totally variant to the verdict. U. S. v. Samperyac, 1 Hempst. (U. S.) 118.

Mr. Justice Story, in Allen v. Blunt, 3 Story (U. S.) 746, thus delivers himself: "A verdict upon an issue ordered by a court of equity is in no just sense final upon the facts it finds, or binding upon the judgment of the court. The court may, at its pleasure, set it aside and grant a new trial, or, disregarding it, may proceed to hear the cause and decide in contradiction to the verdict; or it may adopt the verdict sub modo, and give it a limited effect only."

The case of Kohn v. McNulta, 147 U. S. 238, was an appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio. In this case, a switchman brought suit against the receiver of a railroad company to recover damages for injury sustained in the performance of his duty while in the employment of the company. After the testimony had all been received, it was left to a jury to determine the amount which should be awarded, and the jury found for the claimant the sum of ten thousand dollars. The court, upon examination of the testimony, held that no cause of action was made out against the receiver, set aside the verdict of the jury, and dismissed the petition. Mr. Justice Brewer, delivering the opinion of the supreme court, said: "The intervention was a proceeding in a court of equity, and that court may direct a verdict by a jury upon any single fact, or upon all the matter in dispute; but such verdict is not binding upon the judgment of the court. It is advisory simply and the court may disregard it entirely, or adopt it either partially or in toto." He then cites Barton v. Barbour, 104 U. S. 126, and Idaho, etc., Land, etc., Co. v. Bradbury, 132 U. S. 509.

the same force and effect as a verdict rendered in an action having no connection with proceedings in equity.¹

1. Delaware.—The Delaware Rev. Stat. (1852), ch. 95, § 1, provides that where matters of fact, proper to be tried by jury, shall arise in any cause depending in chancery, the chancellor shall order such facts to trial by issues at the bar of the superior court.

Iowa.—In the Iowa Code (1851), § 1772, it is provided that issues of fact shall be tried by the court, unless one of the parties requires a jury.

It is declared, in the case of McDaniel v. Marygold, 2 Iowa 500; 65 Am. Dec. 786, that the court may decide for itself all issues in an equity cause, and refuse an issue to a jury, or in the exercise of a sound discretion, such issue may be directed, and such discretion will not be disturbed by the supreme court unless it is abused; the verdict on such issues may not bind the court to the same extent as in a law action, but every doubt should be solved in favor of it. The court observes: "In many of our state courts the exercise of the discretion by the chancellor in granting the trial of such issues by a jury is, in practice, merely nominal; that is to say, that the trial of such issues has become so frequent, under what has been esteemed a proper regard for the right of trial by jury, that the exercise of such discretion stands much upon the same basis as do all other matters referred by the law to such discretion. We entertain no doubt but that he may decide the question or questions himself, and refuse an issue to a jury. We are equally satisfied that, in the exercise of a sound discretion, he may direct such an issue, and in either event we would not disturb such order, unless such discretion should appear to have been abused and exercised in a manner unwarranted by all the circumstances. After such findings we would not say that the verdict is decisive or binding to the same extent as when rendered in a suit at law. But where the parties have, without objection, submitted such an issue to a jury, and appear to have had a full investigation, and introduced their whole testimony upon issues, which by the submission they virtually concede raise the real questions in the case, every doubt in the mind of the chancellor on such issues of facts should be solved in favor of such findings."

New Hampshire.—New Hampshire Const. (1792), pt. 1, art. 20; New Hampshire Rev. Stat. 1842, ch. 171, § 8; Marston v. Brackett, 9 N. H. 336; Dodge v. Griswold, 12 N. H. 573; Clark v. First Congregational Soc., 45 N. H. 331.

In some states, where the administration of law and equity is not separate, the distinction between the effect of a verdict in an ordinary common-law action, and on issues out of chancery, has been held to be of no practical importance. A mixed system of law and equity exists in Minnesota. In Marvin v. Dutcher, 26 Minn. 391, it is said that under the existing practice, as all issues in an equitable action directed to be tried by a jury are tried in the presence of the court, under its direction, and in the same manner in every respect, as every other issue of fact in any action is tried, that there is no good reason why such a verdict should not receive the same effect as other verdicts; and that such was the correct rule.

Nevertheless, in Montana, although the administration of law and equity is effected through the same court, and though the distinction between the pleadings and modes of procedure in common-law actions and suits in equity is abolished, the essential distinction between law and equity is held not to be changed. The relief which the law affords must be administered through the intervention of a jury, unless a jury be waived. The relief which equity affords must be applied by the court itself, and all information presented to guide its action, whether obtained through masters' reports or findings of a jury is merely advisory. Basey v. Gallagher, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 670.

In New York, before the adoption of the code, under the act of 1838 to regulate the trial by jury and the taking of testimony in chancery, it was held that the verdict of a jury upon issues out of chancery was conclusive as to facts found, unless a new trial of the issues was granted by the court of law in which such issues were tried. Griffith v. Griffith, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 314.

VERIFY.—The word “verify” sometimes means to confirm or substantiate by oath, sometimes by agreement.¹

VERILY.—(See also AFFIDAVITS, vol. 1, p. 307; BELIEVE, vol. 2, p. 164).—See note 2.

VERMIN.—See BILL OF LADING, vol. 2, p. 240.

VERSUS.—Against. The word is usually abbreviated v. or vs., and is used in legal parlance to separate the names of defendants and plaintiffs.³

1. Webster's Dict. followed in Swift v. Hosmer, 3 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 284. The court further said that when used in legal proceedings the term is generally employed in the former sense, and held, that when a statute provides, that an answer should be verified, it must be sworn to.

2. An affidavit is not bad because it states that the affiant “verily believes,” instead of using the statutory form, “has good reason to believe;” the former being the stronger form, and perjury being assignable upon it. Russell v. Ralph, 53 Wis. 328. In this case the court said: “But this court has frequently held affidavits containing such words sufficient. Beck v. Cole, 16 Wis. 95; Oliver v. Town, 28 Wis. 328. Webster defines ‘verily’ as meaning: ‘with great confidence; really; truly.’ ‘In truth; in fact; certainly.’ It seems to be synonymous with ‘verity,’ which he defines to be ‘the quality of being very true or real; consonance of a statement, proposition, or other thing to fact; truth.’ ‘Verily believes,’ therefore includes good reason in fact to believe. If we are correct in this construction, then the words import more than the statutory requirement; for while a person might have ‘good reason to believe,’ and yet disbelieve, he could not ‘verily believe,’ without also having good reason in fact to believe.”

3. Whether English.—“It is said in the argument that the plea is not wholly in the English language; that ‘vs.’ stands for ‘versus,’ and that ‘versus,’ is not an English word; that the plea should have been entitled Smith against Butler. But ‘vs.’ and ‘versus’ have been too long used in legal practice, and their meaning is too well understood, to be open to the objection stated. They have, in fact, become ingrafted upon the English language, at least so far as they are used in this country in legal proceedings. Their meaning is well understood, and their use quite as appropriate as the word ‘against’ could be.” Smith v. Butler, 25 N. H. 523.

Ads.—An affidavit of merits on the same paper with the pleas, by a defendant, entitled “C D ads. A B,” is the same in law as “A B v. C D,” and is properly entitled, and it is error to strike the pleas from the files as for want of a sufficient affidavit. The court said: “The objection to the affidavit was that it was not properly entitled in the cause, and the pleas were stricken from the files, and default of defendant entered and judgment in chief. To reverse which this appeal is taken. There is no force in this objection. It is properly entitled. Frank A. Bowen ads. 1. As to the term "very fast," see FAST, vol. 7, p. 813.

2. A steamboat has been held a "vessel," within a statute providing for the collection of claims against "vessels." Pendleton v. Franklin, 7 N. Y. 508. So also a steam canal boat. King v. Greenway, 71 N. Y. 413.

The provisions of United States Rev. Stat., § 4255, relating to the construction and occupation of berths on vessels carrying passengers from foreign ports to the United States, are not deemed applicable to steam vessels. In The Devonshire, 8 Sawy. (U. S.) 211, the court said: "Each of these sections uses the word 'vessel' without in any way limiting its application to a sail vessel. Standing alone and without qualification, they would include in their provisions a steam as well as a sail vessel. A vessel is none the less one on account of the manner of her propulsion, whether by oars, sails, or steam. And the Revised Statutes (§ 3) declare that the term 'includes every description of water craft or other artificial contrivance used or capable of being used as a means of transportation on water.'" Nevertheless, the court came to the decision above from reading the statute as a whole.

A steam dredge is a vessel within the meaning of the law, and, as such, subject to a maritime lien for supplies. The court, in Hinsmann v. The Pioneer, 30 Fed. Rep. 206, said: "As I understand it by the law of the United States, the absence from the dredge of a natural power of propulsion; the fact that she is not propelled by oars or sails; that she is flatbottomed; that she is engaged in harbors, rivers, and docks; that she has to be moved to a distance by means of a tug; that she has no power of her own to be moved; that she is not, and cannot be, a sea or lake going vessel—neither of these facts, nor all together, require the conclusion that she is not a vessel. The dredge before the court in this case is adapted to be an instrument of transportation on navigable water, and was used in naval transportation when she transported from place to place the steam shovel and engine, and maintained the same afloat on navigable water while being used for the purpose of deepening channels. She is within the definition of a vessel given by the Revised Statutes, tit. 1, ch. 1, for she is an artificial contrivance, used, or capable of being used, as a means of transportation on water. In my opinion, her legal status is that of a vessel. In the case of The Alabama, 22 Fed. Rep. 449, a dredge similar to the one here under consideration was held to be a vessel, within the meaning of the law."

Lighter.—The proprietors of a bridge were bound by statute to raise their draw for the passage of "vessels." It was held that a lighter came within the provision. Hood v. Dighton Bridge, 3 Mass. 262.

Small Boat—Open Boat.—An open boat was held not to be a "vessel," within the provision of United States statutes of 1820 prohibiting commercial intercourse from the British Colonies. U. S. v. An Open Boat, 5 Mason (U. S.) 120. The court in this case said: "There can be no doubt that in a general sense a boat is a vessel, for it is a 'vehicle in which men or goods are carried on the water,' which is one of the definitions of a vessel given in our lexicographies; and one of the definitions of a boat, given in like manner, is, that it is 'a vessel to pass the water in,' or 'a ship of a small size.' In a nautical sense, it more usually designates an open vessel, without decks. Whether the word is used in the one sense or the other in a particular statute, must depend upon the context and objects of the statute itself, which may and often do narrow down the general import to specific classes of cases. . . . The term 'vessel' is never, or at least very rarely, used to designate any water craft without a deck; but the term 'boat' is constantly used to designate such small vehicles of this nature as are without a deck. In Mortimers' Commercial Dictionary, a boat is defined to be 'a small open vessel, commonly wrought by oars.' He says that the term 'ship' is 'a general name for all large vessels.' And it appears to me that the general sense in which the word 'vessel' is used in our laws, is in contradistinction to an open boat, and excluding the latter. Such is its meaning in the Act of 1815, ch. 246, where it is declared lawful 'for any collector, etc., to enter on board, search and examine any ship, vessel, boat, or raft,' etc. And when the word is found in our laws, without anything in the context to explain or enlarge its meaning, it appears to me a sound rule of interpretation to construe it as used in that sense, which is its most common sense in maritime usage. Especially ought it to receive such an interpretation, when it interferes with no known policy of the legislature, and a different course would involve general inconvenience."

Setting fire to a small, unfinished boat, still in the builder's shop, and unfit for use, is not within a statute punishing the setting fire to a vessel. Com. v. Francis, Thach. Cr. Cas. (Mass.) 240.

A raft is not, in the ordinary contemplation of the maritime law, a vessel; but where it is insured by a "cargo policy," and is in charge of a towboat, the principles of law governing a contract of insurance are applicable to it. The court, in Moore v. Louisville Underwriters, 14 Fed. Rep. 236, said: "I have, following the counsel, treated this case as if this raft were a 'vessel,' but I think it is not. The policy is not one on a vessel, but on the cargo of a vessel, and is called by its terms a 'cargo policy.' I have not been able to find any discussions of the subject of insurance of rafts, but in an elaborate case the learned judge of the eastern district of Michigan, sitting in this court, held that a raft of logs floating unattached to any vessel, and navigated by men upon it, was not a vessel within the admiralty jurisdiction. Raft of Logs, 1 Flip. (U. S.) 543. I think it must be treated as the cargo of the towboat having it in charge, and not as a 'vessel.' But so treated, the principles of insurance law applicable to the case are the same, and the distinction is quite immaterial. It is mentioned here merely out of caution, and to explain the method of dealing with the subject."

Canal Boat—Maritime Liens.—See King v. Greenway, 71 N. Y. 417; Crawford v. Collins, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 269, where a canal boat was held to be within the provision giving a lien. The court cites with approval, Mott v. Lansing, 57 N. Y. 112, and Crawford v. Col- lins, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 269; and distinguishes Many v. Noyes, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 34.

A canal boat or scow is not a "vessel of the United States," within the meaning of the act of Congress declaring that no bill of sale, mortgage, etc., of any vessel or part of a vessel of the United States, shall be valid, unless the same shall be recorded in the office of the collector of the customs where such vessel is registered or enrolled. The court said: "And under the acts of this state authorizing, in certain cases, the attachment and seizure of 'any ship or vessel' within this state, it has been adjudged that a small undecked boat employed within a port, and not performing voyages coastwise from state to state, does not come within the description of a 'ship or vessel,' which terms are to be understood as used in common parlance and applying only to vessels of a larger class. (Farmers' Delight v. Lawrence, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 564)." Hicks v. Williams, 17 Barb. (N. Y.) 529.

Foreign Vessel.—Under the United States Embargo Act (Jan. 9, 1808), § 5, ch. 8, a foreign vessel means a vessel navigating under the flag of a foreign power, and not a vessel owned in whole or part by foreigners domiciled in the United States. The court, in The Schooner Sally, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 59, said: "The attorney for the United States contends, that the true meaning of foreign 'ship or vessel,' used in the act, is a vessel owned in whole or in part by foreigners domiciled in the United States, and he cites the Registry Act to show the effect of transferring a registered vessel to a foreigner, and also the Supplementary Act June 27, 1797, ch. 5, which declares that all registered vessels, which shall be captured and condemned and pass into the ownership of third persons, shall be deemed foreign vessels. This argument applies to registered vessels only, and does not appear to me to carry much weight with it. Undoubtedly the appellation of foreign vessels may sometimes be applied to all vessels not registered or licensed, in reference to the privileges derived from the revenue system; but it is as certain that in a variety of instances our laws also contemplate the use of the words in their appropriate sense, to wit, vessels navigating under the flag and with the papers of a foreign sovereign." See also FOREIGN ASSIGNMENTS, vol. 8, p. 281; MARITIME LIENS, vol. 14, p. 420.

VEST.—To pass to a person ; to become fixed in a person ; to give an immediate right of present enjoyment ; to give a present fixed right of future enjoyment ; to give a legal or equitable seisin.¹ The word is defined to mean "To give an immediate fixed right of present or future enjoyment."²

Louisiana Code—Commercial Partnership.—The code declares that commercial partners are those engaged in "carrying personal property for hire in ships or other vessels." In Chaffe v. Ludeling, 27 La. Ann. 611, the court said : "In this sense we understand vessel to mean any structure which is made to float upon the water, for purpose of commerce or war, whether impelled by wind, steam or oars. Vide Webster's Dictionary, verbo: vessel." Chaffe v. Ludeling, 27 La. Ann. 611.

In the Language of Conveyancers.—"The word 'to vest' has several senses which it is important to distinguish : Originally the word had reference only to real estate. As applied to estates in land, 'to vest' signifies the acquisition of a portion of the actual ownership or feudal possession of the land ; the acquisition, not of an estate in possession, but of an actual estate. The fee simple being supposed to be carved out into parts or divisions by the creation of particular estates, a grant to any person of one of these portions of the fee vested him with, or vested in him, an estate in the land. Thus 'vested' is nearly equivalent to 'possessed.' In this, its original sense, 'vested' has no reference to the absence of conditionality or contingency. If an estate tail be limited to A, with remainder to B, the estate of B is a 'vested' remainder, not because the failure of issue of A is considered as an event certain at some time or other to happen, but because such a remainder vests in B an actual portion of the fee, though the time of its falling into possession is wholly contingent and uncertain. B is invested with a portion of the ownership of the land. All remainders, not vested, are in fact contingent, not as being necessarily limited to an uncertain event, but because their taking effect depends on the contingency of their happening to vest during the continuance of the particular estate which supports them, and which may terminate at any moment. Thus 'vested' comes to mean the opposite of 'contingent' or conditional. But the word itself refers, as has been said, not to contingency, but to possession. The only definition that can be given of the word 'vested' in English law, as applied to future interests other than remainders, is, that it means 'not subject to a condition precedent ;' what amounts to a condition precedent the cases only can determine. As applied to remainders in land, the word retains its original sense denoting the actual possession of an estate in the land." Stroud's Jud. Dict.

3. Vested Estate.—"By a vested estate, in relation to interests of a freehold quality, is to be understood an interest clothed, as to legal estates, with a legal seisin, or, as to equitable estates, with an equitable seisin, which enables the person to whom the interest is limited, to exercise the right of present or future enjoyment immediately, in point of estate. A vested estate is an interest clothed with a present legal and existing right of alienation." 1 Preston on Estates 65, followed in Hayes v. Goode, 7 Leigh (Va.) 496.

"Estates are vested when there is a person in being who would have an immediate right to the possession of the lands upon the ceasing of the intermediate or precedent estate. They are contingent whilst the person to whom, or the event upon which, they are limited to take effect, remains uncertain." Taylor v. Gould, 10 Barb. (N. Y.) 396.

"An estate is vested when there is a person in being who will take if the precedent estate then terminates." Sheridan v. House, 4 Keyes (N. Y.) 587.

Vested in the Sense of Indefeasible.—M, by her will, in pursuance of a power, appointed £1,000, charged on real estate, to trustees, upon trust to invest the same, and to pay the dividends thereof to her daughter, A, for life; and from and after the decease of A, to pay, apply, and dispose of the capital and interest unto, between, or amongst all and every child and the children of A, in equal shares; and if but one, the whole to that one child, to be a vested interest, or vested interests, on their respectively attaining the age of thirty years; and if any child or children of A should die under the age of thirty without lawful issue, the share or shares of such child or children, original or accruing, should go to the survivor or survivors of them. It was held that the word "vested" meant indefeasible, so that the share of each child who attained the age of thirty was no longer to be defeasible by the executory bequest. Taylor v. Frobisher, 10 Eng. L. & Eq. 121. The court in this case said: "The question in this case depends on the meaning which, upon consideration of this will, is to be attached to the word 'vested,' as used by the testatrix. It is scarcely necessary to say, that in considering this will, the court lays out of sight the circumstance that if one construction be adopted, the disposition in favor of the children of Ann Taylor would be void for remoteness; while, if the other be taken, it would be in a great measure supported. The court in such cases, in the first instance, ascertains what are the provisions of the instrument, and whether they are opposed to the ordinary rules of construction; and then to what extent they are in accordance with the rules of law. In this will the testatrix uses the word 'vested,' not in its ordinary sense, but in the sense of not being subject to be divested, so as to be defeasible. It is only in this way that her intention could have been carried into effect in the form which was in her contemplation. The word 'vested,' though it has a technical or strictly legal meaning, especially when applied to various interests in real estate, is, in effect, used in different senses. In Barnea v. Allen, 1 Bro. C. C. 181, Lord Thurlow says: 'Contingent and executory interests may be as completely vested as if they were in possession;' obviously there using the word 'vested' in the sense of 'transmissible.' In Berkeley v. Swinburne, 16 Sim. 275, the Lord Commissioners, where the testator directed the shares to be vested interests, in sons at twenty-one, and in daughters at twenty-one or marriage, construed the word to mean indefeasible, and held that the shares vested, before the ages of twenty-one or marriage, on the death of the tenant for life, subject to be divested on their deaths under that age, and in the case of daughters without having been married. In Glanvill v. Glanvill, 2 Meriv. 38, Sir W. Grant construed the word 'vested' in its ordinary sense, observing, however, that 'there was no evidence from any part of the will that the testator did not affix to the word its precise legal meaning.'

Vested Remainder.—See also PERPETUITIES, vol. 18, p. 335; REMAINDERS, vol. 20, p. 828.

"A remainder," says Chancellor Walworth, "is vested in interest where the person is in being and ascertained, who will, if he lives, have an absolute and immediate right to the possession of the land upon the ceasing or failure of all the precedent estates, provided the estate limited to him by the remainder shall so long continue. In other words, where the remainder-man's rights to an estate in possession cannot be defeated by third persons or contingent events, or by the failure of condition precedent if he lives, and the estate limited to him by way of remainder continues till all the precedent estates are determined, his remainder is vested in interest. Hawley v. James, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 466." Quoted in Price v. Sisson, 13 N. J. Eq. 176.

Vested Rights.—See also CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, vol. 3, p. 758.

Where an act of Congress speaks of "vested rights," protecting them, it means rights lawfully vested. Hence, it does not protect a location made on public land reserved for sale. Morton v. Nebraska, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 660.

In testamentary gifts, referring to death contingently, "the proper legal meaning of the word 'vested' is vested in point of interest, Richardson v. Power, 19 C. B. N. S. 780; but its natural and etymological meaning is said to be, vested in possession, Young v. Robertson, 4 Macq. H. L. 314; 8 Jur. N. S. 825; and there are many cases of gifts over on the death of the legatee before his legacy has become 'vested,' where, upon the context the word has been held to bear the latter sense." 2

VETERAN.—See note 1.

VETERINARY SURGEONS.—A veterinary surgeon is one who is engaged in the surgical or medical treatment of domestic animals, especially horses and cattle.² The same rules are applicable generally to veterinary surgeons as apply to other physicians and surgeons;³ thus, they may be required to be registered or licensed before holding themselves out to the public as veterinary surgeons,⁴ and are liable for any injuries resulting from their negligence, or want of skill.⁵ They may recover compensation

2. See Century Dict.; Webster's Dict.

3. The same rules are applicable to the case of a veterinary surgeon bringing an action to recover for the value of his services, as apply to other physicians and surgeons. Boom v. Reed, 69 Hun (N. Y.) 426. And see PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS, vol. 18, p. 427; MALPRACTICE, vol. 14, p. 76.

4. The English Veterinary Surgeon's Act of 1881 (44 & 45 Vict., ch. 62), provides that "Whereas it is expedient that provision be made to enable persons requiring the aid of a veterinary surgeon for the cure or prevention of diseases in or injuries to horses and other animals, to distinguish between qualified and unqualified practitioners," it further provides that any person who, without the necessary qualification, "takes or uses the title of veterinary surgeon or veterinary practitioner, or any name, title, addition, or description stating that he is a veterinary surgeon, or a practitioner of veterinary surgery or of any branch thereof, or especially qualified to practice the same," shall be liable to a fine; and under this act it was held that a shoeing smith, who described his place of business as a "veterinary forge," was, when not duly qualified as therein required, liable to a fine. Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons v. Robinson (1892), 1 Q. B. Div. 557. "Nothing," said Hawkins, J., in delivering the opinion in this case, "is so likely to produce injury to a horse as unskillful treatment of his feet and improper shoeing."

But it was held that a chemist who published a book dealing with diseases of horses, recommending medicines which he kept and advising people in some cases to consult a veterinary surgeon, and who described himself in the book as a "Pharmaceutical and Veterinary Chemist," was not unlawfully using a description implying that he was a veterinary surgeon contrary to this act. Veterinary College v. Groves, 57 J. P. 505.

In Ritter v. Rodgers, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 451, it was held that the Pennsylvania Act of April 11, 1889, providing that veterinary surgeons of five years standing, who were not entitled to use the degree of veterinary surgeon, should register within six months after the passage of the said act, or be guilty of a misdemeanor in using the title thereafter, was unconstitutional, as depriving a person of property without due process of law.

But in Veterinary Surgeon's Case, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep., 185, it was held that a court of common pleas has no jurisdiction to strike from the register names of veterinary surgeons whose names were not registered within the time prescribed by Pennsylvania Act of April 11, 1889, and could not pass upon the constitutionality of that act, but that the remedy provided in the quarter sessions for violations of the act is exclusive, under Pennsylvania Act of March 31, 1860.

5. A veterinary surgeon impliedly engages and is bound to use, in the performance of his duties in his employment, such reasonable skill, diligence, and attention, as may be ordinarily expected of persons in that profession. He does not contract to use the highest degree of skill nor an extraordinary amount of diligence, nor, in the absence of special contract, to effect a cure, and negligence cannot be implied from his failure to do so. Barney v. Pinkham, 29 Neb. 350; 26 Am. St. Rep. 389.

A veterinary surgeon must possess and exercise a reasonable degree of for attendance and medicines administered;¹ and may be examined as expert witnesses concerning the diseases of horses and cattle.²

| I. Definition, 445. | III. Under Federal and State Constitutions, 446. |
| II. Origin and Purpose of the Veto Power, 446. | IV. Under Municipal Charters, 448. |

I. DEFINITION.—The word veto is of Latin extraction, and literally translated, means, "I forbid" or "I deny." By this expression is understood, in public law, the right vested in one department of government to negative the determinations and resolutions of another department; especially, in a constitutional government, the right, under constitutional restrictions, of learning and skill, and must use reasonable and ordinary care and diligence in the exercise of his skill, and the application of his knowledge; and the fact that a veterinary surgeon, called to attend a horse suffering from an impaction of the colon, treats him for inflammation of the bowels, and, having undertaken to cure him, leaves him in a critical condition promising to call early the next morning, but neglects ever to call again, constitutes a failure to exercise a reasonable degree of skill, and is such evidence of his negligence as will prevent a recovery for his services. Boom v. Reed, 69 Hun (N. Y.) 426.

It is the duty of a veterinary surgeon, after performing an operation upon a colt, to give him such continued and further attention as the necessity of the case requires, in the absence of special agreement of reasonable notice to the contrary, and an instruction to this effect is correct, although the declaration only alleges a want of care and skill with reference to the operation itself. Williams v. Gilman, 71 Me. 21.

Complaint.—In an action charging a veterinary surgeon with ignorance or want of proper care, the complaint must contain specific allegations, stating such ignorance or want of care, and not leave it to be deduced from mere inference, or the use of vague and indefinite terms. Barney v. Pinkham, 29 Neb. 350; 26 Am. St. Rep. 389.

1. Boom v. Reed, 69 Hun (N. Y.) 426. In Sewell v. Corp, 1 C. & P. 392; 11 E. C. L. 432, it was held that if there is a general usage applicable to a particular trade or profession, persons employing one in such trade or profession, will be taken to have dealt with him according to that usage, but that a usage for a veterinary surgeon to charge for his attendance, when there is little medicine required, is too uncertain; and it was left for the jury to say whether he was entitled to charge for his attendance in addition to his charge for medicines furnished, and they found for the plaintiff.

A count for work, labor, and materials will enable a plaintiff to recover for attending as a farrier for medicines administered. Clark v. Mumford, 3 Campb. 37.

Negligence & Defense.—But if a veterinary surgeon is guilty of negligence, or fails to exercise reasonable and ordinary care and diligence in the exercise of his skill and the application of his knowledge, it will prevent a recovery for his services. Boom v. Reed, 69 Hun (N. Y.) 426.

2. Riley v. Sparks, 52 Mo. App. 572. In this case it was held that a veterinary surgeon might give his opinion as to whether or not a mule, that required two men to catch and hold it after it had been penned up for several days, and which was in good flesh without any physical indication of illness, could be affected with lung fever or pleurisy.

In Missouri Pacific R. Co. v. Finley, 38 Kan. 550, it was said that where a person has been educated in a particular profession, as a physician, surgeon, or veterinarian, he is presumed to understand thoroughly questions appertaining to his profession.

the executive, as a king, a president, or a governor, to reject a measure passed by the legislature.¹

The power is either absolute or qualified, according as the effect of its exercise is either to destroy the bill finally, or to prevent its becoming a law unless again passed by a stated proportion of votes or with other formalities. Or the veto may be merely suspensive.²

The term veto is not employed in the constitutions, but seems to be of popular use only.

II. ORIGIN AND PURPOSE OF THE VETO POWER.—This power is traced to the Tribunes of ancient Rome. The salutation, "veto" ("I forbid"), pronounced by a tribune stationed at the door of the senate, meeting a bill, nullified it absolutely. In England, the crown has, likewise, an absolute veto, but it has become practically obsolete, the influence of the crown being exerted in a more gentle manner to destroy an obnoxious measure in its progress through the two Houses of Parliament.³

There are, in constitutional governments, two fundamental theories upon which the grant of the power of veto rests: First, to preserve the integrity of that branch of government in which the vetoing power is lodged, and thus maintain an equilibrium of governmental powers; second, to act as a check against the enactment of improper legislation.⁴

III. UNDER FEDERAL AND STATE CONSTITUTIONS.—The veto power of the President is conferred in the following language: "Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President. . . . If he approve, he shall sign it, but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law. . . . If any

3. 1 Kent's Com. (13 ed.), p. 241. "In practice, the veto power, although very great and exceedingly important in this country, is obsolete in Great Britain, and no king now ventures to resort to it. As the ministry must at all times be in accord with the House of Commons—except where the responsibility is taken of dissolving the Parliament and appealing to the people—it must follow that any bill which the two Houses have passed, must be approved by the monarch. The approval has become a matter of course, and the governing power in Great Britain is substantially in the House of Commons." Cooley's Const. Lim. (6th ed.), p. 186.

A notable instance of the exercise of this power in England was in 1692, when William III. refused his assent to the bill for triennial Parliaments. This prerogative was last exercised by Queen Anne, in 1707, who refused her assent to a bill for settling the militia in Scotland. 1 Cooley's Bl. (3d ed.), p. 185, notes.

4. The Federalist, No. 73 (by Alex. Hamilton).

bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sunday excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law."¹

Most of the state constitutions have a provision similar to that set forth above. But some of the states withhold the veto power from the executive;² and in others a majority vote of the whole number of members elected to the legislature, constitutes all that is required to override a veto.³

The President may exercise his negative when, in his opinion, the proposed law is unconstitutional, notwithstanding the point which is presented has in other cases been judicially examined and sustained. The President by this act overrules no decision; he merely acts upon his judgment as a legislator.⁴ The executive must treat the bill referred to him as a whole; he may not approve part, and object to part.⁵

If the executive returns a bill, stating that he cannot act upon it because of some supposed informality in its passage, which in his opinion would be fatal to the bill, even if approved, this is, in

1. United States Const., art. 1, § 7, cl. 2. And by the succeeding clause, all orders, resolutions, and votes, to which the assent of both houses may be necessary, except on a question of adjournment, must take the course of bills.

"Pocket" or "Silent" Veto.—This is a mode of veto of a bill by a president, governor, or other executive officer, employed at the end of a legislative session. If the President does not interpose the ordinary veto, a bill becomes a law at the expiration of ten days; but if the bill was passed within ten days of the adjournment of Congress, the President may retain ("pocket") the bill, which is thus killed at the end of the session without the interposition of a direct veto, and without risking the chances of its passage over the veto. Cent. Dict., tit. "Pocket."

The constitution did not contemplate that the President should purposely defeat legislation in this manner, and doubtless it has sometimes occurred through the impossibility of carefully examining the provisions of a bill submitted to him during the close of the session, in the limited time allowed. Cooley's Const. Law, p. 160.

2. North Carolina, Delaware, Ohio, Rhode Island, and perhaps others. As to the executive's functions generally in the enactment of laws, and the passage of laws over his veto, see STATUTES, vol. 23, p. 180 et seq.

3. In State v. Mounts, 36 W. Va. 179, the court, by Lucas, Pres., said: "Under the constitution of this state, the three departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, are required to be 'separate and distinct, so that neither shall exercise the powers properly belonging to either of the others.' See art. 5, § 1. The governor has no legislative functions to perform; his approval of the law passed by the legislature does, it is true, give it vitality as a law, but should he decline to approve, a bare majority in each of the two houses may pass the law over his veto, thus showing that it was not intended that he should have any legislative authority; not even the casting vote. His veto amounts to an appeal for 'reconsideration' by the legislative branch, and not to a defeasance of the passage of the bill."

4. Cooley's Const. Law, pp. 162, 163.

5. Porter v. Hughes (Arizona, 1893), 32 Pac. Rep. 165. Here the governor signed an appropriation bill, and added after his signature that he approved the same, except a specified subdivision of a specified section, and returned the bill to the house in which it originated, where the veto was sustained. It was held, however, that the bill as a whole was approved, as the governor had no power to veto a single item of it.

effect, an objection to the bill, and it can become a law only by further legislative action, even though the executive may have been mistaken as to the supposed informality.¹

The adjournment referred to, which can prevent an executive from returning a bill with his objections within the time prescribed, must be an adjournment amounting to a termination of the session, and not an adjournment from day to day.²

IV. UNDER MUNICIPAL CHARTERS.—The charters of many of the cities in the United States give a qualified negative to the executive head of municipal authority, over the resolutions and ordinances of the common council. Here, the power is given, not as essential to preserve an equilibrium of governmental powers, but for almost the sole purpose of a check upon corrupt, hasty, and ill-considered legislation. But the power must be given in terms or by necessary implication, or it does not exist.³

3. Under New York Act, April 27, 1892 (New York Laws 1892, ch. 379), amending the charter of the city of Buffalo, so as to provide that "commissioners of police shall receive such annual salary as may be fixed by the common council at a joint session thereof," and that "said common council shall immediately determine the amount of such salary," the mayor has no right to veto a resolution so fixing the same, notwithstanding that section 18, of the Act of March 27, 1891 (the Revised Charter of the city of Buffalo), provides that "every ordinance and resolution of the common council," with certain immaterial exceptions, "shall be presented to the mayor before it shall be of force," and that if he does not approve it, but returns it with his objections to the board of aldermen, that board and the board of councilmen shall pass it by the votes of two thirds of all the members elected before it shall be of force. People v. Board of Councilmen (Buffalo Super. Ct.), 20 N. Y. Supp. 51.

By the charter of the city of Minneapolis, the making or authorizing of appropriations is exclusively vested in the common council, and the mayor has no veto of the action of the council in making or authorizing the same. State v. Ames, 31 Minn. 440; 4 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 649.

Objection to a resolution appropriating money to pay a claim against the city of Newark, interposed by way of veto by the mayor having a veto power, and overcome by the requisite vote, may not be again urged by the mayor to avoid doing a mere ministerial act to effectuate such appropriation. Ahrens v. Fiedler, 43 N. J. L. 400.

In New York City, the mayor is not a member of the common council, although an officer of the corporation. The powers conferred by statute over the common council may be exercised by the aldermen and the councilmen without the cooperation of the mayor, and he has no veto power upon their exercise. And action of the mayor upon matters passed by the common council is confined to such resolves, etc., as will take effect as acts or laws of the corporation, and does not extend to resolves, etc., which operate only as acts of the common council. The form of communication adopted by the two boards in exercising powers conferred upon the common council, cannot enlarge the authority of the mayor. Achley's Case, 4 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 35.

2. In the Vicinity.—In Langley v. Barnstead, 63 N. H. 246, it was held that towns may be "situated in the vicinity" of each other, within the meaning of the phrase as used in New Hampshire Gen. Laws, ch. 68, § 10, providing for a division of the expense of highways, although not adjoining. The court said: "Etymologically and by common understanding, the phrase 'in the vicinity' means in the neighborhood, and neighborhood, as applied to place, signifies nearness as opposed to remoteness. Whether a place is in the vicinity or in the neighborhood of another place depends upon no arbitrary rule of distance or topography. One village may be said to be 'in the vicinity' of another village without being joined or incorporated with it, and one house may be said to be near, 'in the vicinity' of, or in the neighborhood of, another house, and not structurally adjoin it. Vicinity admits of a more indefinite and wider latitude in place than proximity or contiguity, and, as applied to territory, may embrace a more extended space than that lying contiguous to the place in question, and as applied to towns and other territorial divisions, may embrace those not adjacent. The chief object of the statute is to distribute with greater equality and uniformity the public burdens, and relieve those towns where the burdens are excessive and disproportionate to the benefits derived by placing them in part upon other towns more largely benefited by the improvement. Actual proximity of towns is not the statute test of a right to relief, but an 'excessively burdensome' expense upon one town for a public improvement, by which another town or other towns in the vicinity are 'greatly benefited.' A town separated by the territory of another town from that where the new highway is established, might be benefited by it immensely more than the adjacent town lying between; and a reasonable construction of the statute, as well as the requirements of justice, demands that the expense should be apportioned upon the towns in the vicinity 'greatly benefited,' disregarding contiguity of boundary lines of towns. Giving to the term 'vicinity' its natural meaning, and that lying in the common understanding and approved by common usage, and considering the leading object of the statute, the intent of the legislature must have been to apply the act to towns in the neighborhood of that in which the highway is established, and not to confine it to towns adjoining. The question of vicinity being one not fixed by technical and arbitrary rules, but depending upon reasonable nearness as contrasted with remoteness, and upon excess of burden upon one town contrasted with enlarged benefits to the neighboring town, is a question of fact, and the finding of the board of commissioners upon that subject, upon competent evidence, will not be revised here. Haley v. Dorchester, etc., Ins. Co., 12 Gray (Mass.) 545."

In Territory v. Lannon, 9 Mont. 1, the question was whether the notice of a proposed county road was posted "in the vicinity" of the road. The court said: "The appellant maintains that the posting of the notice upon the depot at Bearmouth was not in the vicinity of the proposed road, and was therefore illegal. The statute designates for this purpose public places in the vicinity of a highway. The meaning of the words 'public place,' which are found in many laws, is modified by the subjects to which they are applied." In State v. Welch, 88 Ind. 308, the court says: "The phrase, 'public place,' has received a construction by this court, and has been construed to mean a place where the public has a right to go and be." To the same effect, are State v. Sowers, 52 Ind. 311; State v. Waggoner, 52 Ind. 481. "The term 'public,' as applied to 'place,' is not an absolute, but a relative term. . . . It is used in contradistinction to the term 'private' and to signify that the notice was to be given in such way as would be likely to have the effect intended." (Cahoon v. Coe, 57 N. H. 595.) Viewed from any standpoint, they include a station upon a railroad which has been chartered by an act of Congress. In Langley v. Barnstead, 63 N. H. 246, the court says: "Etymologically, and by common understanding, the phrase 'in the vicinity' means 'in the neighborhood;' and 'neighborhood,' as applied to 'place,' signifies 'nearness,' as opposed to 'remoteness." Whether a place is in the vicinity or in the neighborhood of another place, depends upon no arbitrary rule of distance or topography." The testimony discloses the fact that the proposed road connected with the main highway about six hundred or seven hundred feet from the depot at Bearmouth, and that there was no suitable place for posting the notice at that point. We conclude from the foregoing authorities that the statute of the territory was complied with in this respect, and that the notice which was defaced and obliterated by the appellant was legally posted."

An agreement between physicians that one would not practice in a specified city and vicinity, was construed as excluding him from all territory within ten miles from the city limits. In Timmerman v. Dever, 52 Mich. 36; 50 Am. Rep. 240, the court, by Sherwood, J., said: "A discussion of the testimony is unnecessary, and could serve no useful purpose. It is sufficient to say the equity of the case is clearly shown to be with complainant, and but one thing requires further notice—the decree restrains the defendant from practicing his profession 'in the city of Hastings and vicinity.' This clause of the decree is somewhat indefinite as to the extent of territory to which it applies, and may give rise to further misunderstanding between the parties. For the purpose of obviating any difficulty of this kind, the decree made by the circuit judge should be so modified as to make certain the limits of its operation. Of course, the extent of territory included in the term 'vicinity of the city' must necessarily depend in a great measure upon the size of the city, its location and particular surroundings: and under all the circumstances, as they appear upon this record, I think the territory surrounding the city for the distance of ten miles from its corporate boundaries, a reasonable limitation, and one which may be safely regarded as within the contemplation of the parties when they made their contract. The decree at the circuit court should be modified accordingly, and thus modified must be affirmed with costs." Campbell and Cooley, JJ., concurred. Graves, C. J. said: "I agree with the court below that the case established by complainant entitled him to relief, and I also agree that the proper mode of relief is by injunction. But I think the decree ought to be more precise. It pursues the wording of the agreement, that defendant should forebear business in the city of Hastings and 'vicinity,' and fails to prescribe what territory the parties understood by this expression. They meant by it to identify the space from which the defendant was to be excluded, but they did not use it as amounting to a definite description. The word itself is entirely indefinite as a term of description of the bounds of the territory, and it fails to fix, in such manner as it should for the purpose of an injunction, the particular limits which the defendant is not to pass. The defendant is entitled to be informed, on the face of the injunction, where he is not to act under peril of attachment, and it ought not to be left as a matter of speculation or conjecture."

I. DEFINITION.—The phrases, “to wit,” “that is to say,” and not, in general, liable for an injury committed by it, unless it be shown that he had notice of its vicious propensity. Van Leuven v. Dumond, 1 N. Y. 515, and cases cited. By vicious propensity, is included a propensity to do any act that might endanger the safety of the persons and property of others in a given situation. Not such only as would impair the utility of the animal for the purpose for which it was kept. This appears from the reason of the rule. The owner is not liable, unless he has notice of the vicious propensity. If he has such notice, he is liable. That is, the owner is not liable for permitting his domestic animal to be at large when he has no reason to apprehend that any injury to others will result therefrom. If he has such reason, he is liable. In the present case the defendant had notice that his horse, when at large, was in the habit of running and kicking upon the sidewalk. These acts, he must have known, were dangerous to others.” Dickson v. McCoy, 39 N. Y. 403. See also ANIMALS, vol. 1, p. 580.

1. Charge to Jury in Homicide Case.—“In People v. Williams, 17 Cal. 146, the trial judge charged the jury, that ‘the fact that the deceased was a chinaman gave the defendant no more right to take his life than if he had been a white person; nor did the fact, if you so find, that the defendant was seeking to enforce the collection of taxes against another chinaman, or even against his victim, give the defendant any right to take his life. Our laws do not sanction the sacrifice of human life in order to enforce the collection of taxes or licenses.’ In reference to this charge the supreme court said: ‘The word victim, in the connection in which it appears, is an unguarded expression, calculated, though doubtless unintentionally, to create prejudice against the accused. It seems to assume that the deceased was wrongfully killed, when the very issue was as to the character of the killing. We are not disposed to criticise language very closely in order to reverse a judgment of this sort, but it is apparent that in the case of conflicting proofs, even an equivocal expression coming from the judge, may be fatal to the prisoner. When the deceased is referred to as a “victim,” the impression is naturally created that some unlawful power or dominion had been exerted over his person. And it was nearly equivalent, in effect, to an expression characterizing the defendant as a criminal. The court should not, directly or indirectly, assume the guilt of the accused, nor employ equivocal phrases which may leave such an impression. The experience of every lawyer shows the readiness with which a jury frequently catch at intimations of the court, and the great deference which they pay to the opinions and suggestions of the presiding judge, especially in a closely balanced case, when they can thus shift the responsibility of a decision from themselves to the court. A word, a look, or a tone may, sometimes, in such cases, be of great or even controlling influence.” Sharp v. State, 51 Ark. 156.

2. In construing the term as used in the Hawkers and Peddlers Act exempting victuals from the operation of the statute, the court, in Rex v. Hodgkinson, 10 B. & C. 76, said: “I think that the word victuals in 50 Geo. III., ch. 41, §. 23, comprises everything which constitutes an ingredient in the food of man, and all articles which mixed with others constitute food. Yeast or barm may not, perhaps, be necessarily used in the making of bread, but it is generally used, and I am, therefore, of the opinion that it is within the exempting clause.”

"namely," sometimes abbreviated to "viz.," so frequently employed in pleadings, both civil and criminal, are technically termed the videlicet or scilicet, and when any matter alleged in pleading is immediately preceded by this form of statement, it is, in the language of the law, said to be "laid under a videlicet."¹

II. OFFICE AND EFFECT.—Lord Chief Justice Hobart, speaking of the videlicet, observed, "that its use is to particularize that which was before general, or to explain that which was before doubtful or obscure, that it must not be contrary to the premises and neither increase nor diminish, but that it may work a restriction where the former words were not express and special, but so indifferent that they might receive such a restriction without apparent injury."²

When an averment is material, the intervention of a videlicet does not render it immaterial, but it is as much traversable as if the videlicet had not been inserted.³ On the other hand, the

In Com. v. Hart, 10 Gray (Mass.) 468, it was said that "the precise and legal use of a videlicet, in every species of pleading, is to enable the pleader to isolate, to distinguish, and to fix with certainty that which was before general, and which, without such explanation, might, with equal propriety, have been applied to different objects." See also U. S. v. Quincy, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 468.

A videlicet relieves the pleader of the necessity of proving a non-essential descriptive averment. State v. Heck, 23 Minn. 550; Brown v. Berry, 47 Ill. 177.

In Mallett v. Stevenson, 26 Conn. 428, the complaint and warrant, under section 12 of the Act for the Suppression of Intemperance, designated for the seizure of "certain intoxicating liquors, to wit, several casks of French brandy, containing twenty-five gallons, more or less; several casks of gin, containing twenty-five gallons, more or less; and several casks of intoxicating wines, containing twenty-five gallons, more or less." It was held that an officer serving the warrant was not justified by it in seizing any "intoxicating liquors" other than "French brandy," "gin," and "intoxicating wines." The court said that "the natural and proper use of a videlicet followed by words of special description is to restrict and limit the meaning of words of general description preceding it."

But in State v. Brennan's Liquors, 25 Conn. 278, where the complaint alleged that a certain quantity of spirituous liquors, to wit, ten gallons of brandy, ten gallons of rum, etc., was kept, etc., in violation of said act, and the officer, by virtue of a warrant which recited the complaint, seized certain vessels containing more than the quantities designated, it was held that the specification of the kinds and quantities of the liquors under the videlicet was intended as a description of them, and not to limit their quantities, and that the authority of the officer was not limited to the quantity stated in the complaint.

Where damages are laid subsequent to the commencement of the action in a case for the seduction of a daughter, or previous to the plaintiff's having any right of action, if the matter is laid under a scilicet, the court may avail itself of this circumstance to say that it is not to be intended that the jury took the evidence given into consideration. Stiles v. Tilford, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 340.

3. Whenever a videlicet contains matter that is material and necessary to be alleged, it is considered as a direct and positive averment, and as such traversable in the same manner as if no videlicet had been employed. Skinner v. Andrews, 1 Saund. 170; Stukeley v. Butler, Hobart 175; Haymon v. Rogers, 1 Str. 232; Bissex v. Bissex, 3 Burr. 1729; Knight v. Preston, 2 Wils. 332;

Rennet, 1 T. R. 656; Rex v. York, 5 T. R. 71; U. S. v. Burnham, 1 Mason (U. S.) 57; Jansen v. Ostrander, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 670; Pulford v. Johnson, 35 Conn. 32; Frank v. Morris, 57 Ill. 139; 11 Am. Pennington, 32 Me. 178. Thus, if the condition of a bond is to perform the award of I. S., to be delivered on or before the 21st of May, and the defendant pleads no award, and the plaintiff replies that, after the making of the bond and before the commencement of the action, to wit, on the 21st of May, the arbitrator made his award, here the scilicet is a positive averment that the award was made within the time limited by the condition, and may, therefore, be traversed and issue taken upon it. Gleason v. M'Vickar, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 44.

Where time is material, stating it under a videlicet will not make it immaterial. Edge v. Strafford, 1 C. & J. 394; Partridge v. Coates, R. & M. 153; Schlatter v. Rector, 1 Mo. 286.

In Bissel v. Drake, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 68, which was a case of trover for a promissory note, the declaration stated the note to be for $180, and it appeared in evidence to be for the sum of $300. The court said: "The amount of the note was material, and it being laid under a videlicet will not in such case dispense with strict proof of the allegation. . . . Where the party is incapable of stating the date and amount of the note of which he is dispossessed, the law will not require him to make such statement. It will be satisfied by an allegation that the note is of great value, to wit, of the value of a certain sum; but here the plaintiff has undertaken to state the precise amount for which the note was given, and the proof does not correspond with his statement."

In an action of debt to recover penalties for usury, the day of the usurious contract must be stated in the declaration, and must be proved as laid, even though under a videlicet, and the plaintiff will be nonsuited if he fails to give evidence of the day, although he proves that the contract was made within such a time and upon such terms that it must have been usurious. Fox v. Keeling, 2 Ad. & El. 670; 29 E. C. L. 173. See also Grimwood v. Barrit, 6 T. R. 460.

When it is necessary to state the grant of letters of administration to a plaintiff suing as administrator, if the day of the grant, though laid under a videlicet, is incorrectly stated to have been on a day subsequent to the alleged date of the promise to the intestate, it will be bad on special demurrer, although preceded by the words, that after the death of the intestate, to wit, on such repugnant day, the letters were granted. Ring v. Roxbrough, 2 Tyr. 468.

An averment in a declaration of the day of a former trial must exactly agree with the record to be produced in evidence to support it, though it be laid under a videlicet. Pope v. Foster, 4 T. R. 590.

Where, in an action upon a contract of warranty in the sale of a quantity of oil, the declaration alleged that the defendant undertook that the oil was of a "good and superior quality, to wit, prime quality winter oil," it was held that the words under the videlicet were material and traversable. Hastings v. Lovering, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 214; 13 Am. Dec. 420.

In a complaint charging a misdemeanor, the defendant is not precluded from traversing any material allegation, although made under a videlicet. State v. Phinney, 32 Me. 439.

Where matter of contract is precluded in answer to an action, and the terms of the contract are material to the defense, those terms, though stated under a videlicet, must still be proved. Robson v. Fallon, 3 Bing. N. Cas. 396; 32 E. C. L. 173.

In Paine v. Fox, 16 Mass. 133, Parker, C. J., for the court, said that the words following a videlicet in a declaration are not to be taken as an averment and are not traversable. But in Hastings v. Lovering, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 222; 13 Am. Dec. 420, the same judge, in delivering the opinion of the court, referring to this observation, said: "This was undoubtedly a mistake. It is only where the allegation so expressed is immaterial and might have been omitted that it shall not be traversed, and may be rejected as wholly useless."

want of a videlicet will, under some circumstances, make an averment material that would otherwise not be so.¹ But Chitty is inclined to the view that the omission of a videlicet should not impose upon the pleader the necessity of proving precisely as stated matter which would not require such proof, if averred under a videlicet.² And it seems that the rule has no application in criminal pleading.³ If that which comes under a videlicet is immaterial, or of mere form, its repugnancy to what precedes does not affect the pleading, but it will be discarded as superfluous and void.⁴ But it will not be rejected, if it can be reconciled and made restrictive.⁵

Enfield v. Jordan, 119 U. S. 684, was a suit against an Illinois town to recover the amount of interest coupons made by the town. The case involved an inquiry into the use of the words "town" and "village" in the Illinois statute. In this case the United States Supreme Court overruled Welch v. Post, 99 Ill. 471, and followed Martin v. People, 87 Ill. 524, and declared, in effect, that in Illinois an incorporated town and an incorporated village were one and the same thing. The court said: "This question depends upon the use of words 'town' and 'village' in the laws of Illinois. The general and popular distinction between them in English speech will not carry us far towards a solution. The dictionaries tell us that the word 'town' signifies any walled collection of houses. But that is its antique meaning. By modern use, it is said to be applied to an undefined collection of houses, or habitations; also to the inhabitants; emphatically to the metropolis. Again, a town is any collection of houses larger than a village; or any number of houses to which belongs a regular market, and which is not a city. The same authorities define a village as a small collection of houses in the country, less than a town. According to this distinction, the law, in giving power to 'any village, city, county, or township' to make donations and issue bonds to the railroad company, confers the power upon bodies of higher and lower degrees of municipal organization than towns, and leaves them out. This is an incongruity which we can hardly suppose was intended. The supreme court of Illinois, in a recent decision against the power, to which we shall presently refer, is obliged to say, 'why incorporated towns were omitted in that act cannot now be known.' In seeking aid from collateral sources, we shall probably derive more light from the political use of the terms 'town' and 'village' in this country, than from general lexicography. In New England and New York, towns are the political units of territory, into which the county is subdivided, and answer, politically, to parishes and hundreds in England, but are vested with greater powers of local government. In Delaware, the counties are divided into hundreds, the words 'town' and 'village' being indiscriminately applied to collections of houses. In Maryland and most of the Southern States, the political unit of territory is the county, though this is sometimes divided into parishes and election districts for limited purposes. The word 'town' is used in a broad sense to include all collections of houses from a city down to a village. Thus, in Virginia, by an act passed in 1778, on the death or removal of 'any one of the trustees and directors of the several towns within this state, not incorporated,' provision is made for filling the vacancy; by act of 1793, 'electors of towns entitled to representation in the House of Delegates' are authorized to vote at their respective court-houses for representatives in Congress; by the Revised Code of 1819, 'trustees of the respective unincorporated towns of this commonwealth are empowered to make by-laws to prohibit horse racing in the streets of the town; by the Revised Code of 1849, in the chapter entitled 'Of Towns,' the council and board of trustees of any town, heretofore or hereafter established, may cause to be made a survey and plan of the town, showing each lot, public street, etc., to lay out, alter, improve, and light the streets, and to adopt various municipal regulations relating to public grounds, markets, health, nuisances, supply of water, fire departments, etc. Most of these towns were nothing but villages. The close connection between Virginia and Kentucky and the early settlement of Illinois renders this use of the word 'town' in the mother state apposite to the question under consideration. In New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Illinois, the subdivisions of a county, answering to the towns of New England and New York, are called townships, though the word 'town' is also applied to them in Illinois. In these states the words 'town' and 'village' are indiscriminately applied to large collections of houses less than a city. These results are gathered from an examination of the laws and constitutions of the states named; and we should have no hesitation in saying that in Illinois, an incorporated town and an incorporated village were one and the same thing, were it not for the decision of the supreme court of that state to the contrary, in the case of Welch v. Post, 99 Ill. 471, already alluded to, which decision was made in relation to the identical bonds in question in this suit. . . . We feel compelled to say that we regard the views expressed in the case of Martin v. People, 87 Ill. 524, as the more sound and convincing of the two. It seems to us that the legislature of Illinois, in the act for the incorporation of cities and villages, intended to avoid hereafter the use of the ambiguous word 'town,' as applied to the smaller class of incorporated municipalities, and to designate them by the single term of 'village.' This conclusion is, on the whole, so obvious that we do not hesitate to adopt it, and to hold that the town of Enfield is a village within the meaning of the amending act of February 24, 1869. We may add, as a strong corroboration of what has been said, that in the 9th section of that act the word 'town' is used indiscriminately with the word 'village.' The language is: 'It shall be

I. IN GENERAL.—A common exception clause, in policies of life and accident insurance in current use, is one which purports to relieve the insurer from liability for death or injury in or while violating law. The object and purpose of this provision are not far to seek. Insurers recognize in lawless and reckless characters an undesirable risk, and hence prefer not to offer them indemnity.

lawful for the incorporate authorities of any incorporate city or village, through which said railroad shall be located, to donate or lease to said railroad company, as a right of way, the right to lay a single or double track through said city or incorporated village, or any portion of the same, or any street or highway, that the said railway company shall elect for that purpose, except at the option of the said railway company and corporate authorities of such towns or cities."

1. Russel v. Detroit, etc., Ins. Co., 80 Mich. 410, following Webster's Dict.

A town or village, within the meaning of the statute requiring railroad corporations to construct fences, may exist, although there is no plat of the same, dedicating streets, etc., in the manner pointed out by the statute in that regard. The court said: "Any small assemblage of houses, for dwellings, or business, or both, in the country, constitutes a village, whether they are situated upon regularly laid out streets and alleys or not." Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Williams, 27 Ill. 49; approved in Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Spangler, 71 Ill. 569, where it was held that a place where there was a station house, a warehouse, a store, a blacksmith shop, a post office, and five or six dwelling houses, was a village.

Village, within the Michigan Homestead Law, does not necessarily mean an incorporated "village." Bouchard v. Boura, 57 Mich. 8.

2. Wells v. Attenborough, 24 L. T. N. S. 312.

And this purpose has met the approval of some courts of high standing. It was said in one of the early cases where the clause was construed: "The company, in protecting themselves against accident or death caused by a violation of law, acted upon a wise and prudent estimate of the dangers to the person generally connected with such violations."¹ So, in a recent decision by the supreme court of Vermont,² where the violation of law was of a minor grade, it was observed: "The liability to accident must be greatly enhanced in the case of a person who, like the plaintiff, engages in hunting or traveling about the country on Sunday, in open violation of law, as compared with one who observes the law."

Nevertheless, while the purposes of this provision have received judicial sanction in some quarters, the clause on the whole can hardly be said to have been effectual, in its ordinary form, in relieving the insurer from liability for the excepted acts. The history of litigation concerning it fails to disclose a disposition, on the part of a majority of the courts, to enforce the clause, and the grounds on which enforcement is denied, have given rise to some very peculiar decisions. One explanation of this is probably the fact that the phraseology of the clause is so general and lacks the specific terms which are thought necessary in order to apprise the insured of the limitations in his contract.

The litigation upon this subject, while not so extensive as that concerning certain other clauses, presents some interesting questions, has occasioned some novel departures, and, on the whole, forms a most curious as well as important chapter in the law of insurance.

II. FIRST STAGE: "VIOLATING LAW" NOT MENTIONED.—As in the case of many other clauses of the insurance contract in its various forms, that which constitutes the subject of this treatise acquired its present condition only after passing through a stage during which it does not expressly appear in the policy at all. The existence of an implied exception having an effect substantially like that intended by this clause, seems, however, even at this early period, to have been recognized by the courts and to have received enforcement at their hands. The instances in which the rule was thus applied were exclusively cases of life insurance,

1. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Seaver, 19 Wall. (U. S.) 531. The unlawful act in that case was a horse race for money, and Miller, J., further commented upon the policy of inserting the clause as follows: "In the class of cases under consideration we have no question that the sum of money often at stake stimulates to further acts of carelessness, in the way of violence, fraud, and a disregard of the rules of fair racing, which increase largely the dangers always attendant on that sport. The class of men who collect on such occasions, and who often become the leading parties in the conduct of the affair when large sums of money are wagered, have led to its denunciation by many wise and thoughtful people, and very surely adds to the risk of personal injury to the rider or driver. It was against this general species of danger, attending nearly all infractions of the law, that the company sought to protect itself by the clause of the policy in question."

2. Duran v. Standard L., etc., Co., 63 Vt. 437; 22 Atl. Rep. 530.

but the reasoning upon which they rest is quite as applicable to accident policies, and an historical view of the development of this clause (by which alone its present import can best be understood) would clearly be incomplete without an examination of the early authorities.

In a case which came before the House of Lords in 1830,¹ the insured under a life policy had been executed for forgery, then a capital crime in England. The assignees of the policy sought recovery of its proceeds, but their right to do so was emphatically denied upon the sole ground of public policy. The reasoning of the Lord Chancellor, who delivered the opinion, shows that in the view of the eminent tribunal for which he was speaking, not only was "death from violating law" not excepted, but also that it could not lawfully be included. He observes: "Suppose in the policy itself this risk had been insured against; that is, that the party insuring had agreed to pay a sum of money year by year, upon condition that in the event of his committing a capital felony, his assignees shall receive a certain sum of money—is it possible that such a contract could be sustained? Is it not void upon the plainest principles of public policy? Would not such a contract, if available, take away one of those restraints operating on the minds of men against the commission of crimes? namely, the interest we have in the welfare and prosperity of our connections. Now, if a policy of that description, with such a form of condition inserted in it in express terms, cannot, on grounds of public policy, be sustained, how is it to be contended that in a policy expressed in such terms as the present, and after the events which have happened; we can sustain such a claim? Can we, in considering this policy, give to it the effect of that insertion, which if expressed in terms would have rendered the policy, as far as that condition went, at least, altogether void?" The conclusion thus reached by the highest authority in Great Britain has been confirmed by other expressions from the courts of that country,²

1. Amicable Soc. v. Bolland, 4 Bligh. N. S. 194; 2 Dow. & C. 1; 2 Bigelow's Life & Acc. Ins. Rep. 240. This decision in effect overrules (though it does not mention) Bolland v. Disney, 3 Russ. 351, arising out of the same circumstances and decided in the court of chancery some three years before. There the Master of the Rolls had said, speaking of the same contract: "Where the policy does not provide that the obligation to pay shall determine, if the event insured against shall happen in a certain specified manner, then, if the event does happen in that manner, the obligation to pay shall not determine, merely because the conduct of the party insured produced the event, even though such conduct was an offense against the criminal law of the country. To avoid the obligation to pay, the act of the party insured, which produced the event, must be done fraudulently, for the very purpose of producing the event."

2. Horn v. Anglo-Australian, etc., L. Ins. Co., 7 Jur. N. S. 673; 2 Bigelow's Life & Acc. Ins. Rep. 602, where Vice Chancellor Wood cites Amicable Soc. v. Bolland, 4 Bligh. N. S. 194; 2 Dow. & C. 1, and observes: "Although nothing was said in the policy one way or the other, the law would infer as a condition that the execution of the insured, in consequence of a crime committed by him, was not one of the cases in respect of which the policy would become payable." Com-

and the doctrine has received judicial sanction in America.¹

III. SECOND STAGE: DEATH IN "VIOLATING LAW" EXPRESSLY EXCEPTED.—It was hardly to be expected, however, that insurers would long rely for immunity from this cause of death, upon the doctrine of public policy which the history of analogous clauses in the policy had shown to be insecure.² Accordingly, from almost the first, accident policies were expressly so written as to relieve the insurer from death in "violating law." The phraseology has varied much, but in all its forms the clause has contained these essential words or their equivalents, and the history of litigation concerning it, is largely one of conflict between strict and liberal theories of interpretation, as applied to the scope of the clause. This is generally true of all the litigated questions which have arisen concerning the clause; it is particularly true of that which arises at the outset, viz.:

1. What Is Meant by the Term "Law"—a. APPLIED TO ALL LAW.—

There is some authority for the doctrine that the words "violating law" are comprehensive enough to include any breach of positive law, regardless of whether or not it constitutes a crime. In an Indiana case, after an exhaustive discussion of this point, the conclusion was summed up as follows: "A known violation of a positive law, whether the law is a civil or a criminal one, avoids the policy if the natural and reasonable consequences of the violation are to increase the risk; a violation of law, whether the law is a civil or a criminal one, does not avoid the policy if the natural and reasonable consequence of the act does not increase the risk."³ And previous to this, it was observed: "Suppose the death occurred from injury received while the assured was attempting to obtain, by force, the possession of a chattel of which another was in peaceable possession, the title to which was claimed by both, but which was really in the assured, the case would come pare Moore v. Woolsey, 4 El. & Bl. 243; 3 Bigelow's Life & Acc. Ins. Cas. 138, where the doctrine is again recognized through Lord Campbell, who refused to extend it to policies which have been assigned.

1. Hatch v. Mutual L. Ins. Co., 120 Mass. 550, where the insured died from the effects of an illegal operation voluntarily submitted to for the purpose of producing abortion. While the policy in this case contained the express exception of death "in consequence of . . . the violation of laws," the court does not found its decision upon the clause only, but says: "We are of opinion that no recovery can be had in this case, because the act on the part of the assured causing death was of such a character that public policy would preclude the defendant from insuring her against its consequences; for we can have no question that a contract to insure a woman against the risk of her dying under or in consequence of an illegal operation for abortion would be contrary to public policy, and could not be enforced in the courts of this commonwealth."

"It was long ago decided that, in the absence of any provision to that effect, a felonious act resulting in death avoids a policy of life insurance." Wolff v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co., 5 Mo. App. 243, citing Amicable Soc. v. Bolland, 2 Dow. & C. 1.

2. E. g., the clause excepting suicide.

within the proviso, for the reason that the risk was increased; and the death caused by the violation of law by the assured, although such law was the civil only, the deceased having committed no breach of the peace or any indictable offense."¹

b. APPLIED TO CRIMINAL LAW ONLY.—A view quite contrary to the above was thus expressed by the supreme court of Massachusetts: "The condition that the policy should be null and void, among other grounds, in case the insured should die 'by the hands of justice or in the known violation of any law' of the state or country where he resided or which he was permitted to visit, must be construed to refer to a voluntary criminal act on the part of the assured, known by him at the time to be a crime against the law of such state or country. Applying the maxim noscitur a sociis, and remembering that such a clause ought not to be so interpreted as to work a forfeiture unless that intention is apparent, as well as from the natural import of the words 'known violation of law,' we conclude that they do not extend to mere trespasses against property or other infringements of civil laws to which no criminal consequences are attached."² In accordance with this view the clause was held not to apply where the insured was killed while attempting to seize property of the slayer in payment of a debt,³ or in a rencounter with pistols, where the insured fired in self-defense,⁴ or in a quarrel provoked by the insured but which he had abandoned and retreated from when he was slain.⁵

c. NOT LIMITED TO FELONIES.—In an early Missouri case,⁶ the view is expressed that the clause excepting, with other clauses, "death in the known violation of any law of the state," should, under the maxim noscitur a sociis, "be construed only to extend

1. Grover, J., in delivering the dissenting opinion in Bradley v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co., 45 N. Y. 422; 6 Am. Rep. 115. The majority opinion passes this point without deciding it, Rapallo, J., merely remarking that a difference of opinion thereon existed among the members of the court. Compare Accident Ins. Co. v. Bennett, 90 Tenn. 256, where the court mentions the conflict of authority on this point, but expresses no opinion.

2. Cluff v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co., 13 Allen (Mass.) 308; 1 Bigelow's Life & Acc. Ins. Rep. 208.

3. Cluff v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co., 13 Allen (Mass.) 316; 1 Bigelow's Life & Acc. Ins. Rep. 208; 99 Mass. 317; 1 Bigelow's Life & Acc. Ins. Rep. 265. This case arose out of the same circumstances as Bradley v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co., 45 N. Y. 422; 6 Am. Rep. 115, where, in a dissenting opinion, Grover, J., takes the opposite view.

4. In Overton v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co., 39 Mo. 122; 90 Am. Dec. 455; 1 Bigelow's Life & Acc. Ins. Rep. 313, the court said: "To exonerate Overton from criminal agency, or to preclude a forfeiture of the policy, it must be shown by the evidence that when he fired his pistol he had reasonable cause to apprehend a design on the part of Williams to do him a great personal injury, and also that he apprehended imminent danger of such design being accomplished. A killing under such circumstances, under the statute of this state, would be justifiable homicide, and not a violation of the law within the meaning of the policy."

5. Harper v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 18 Mo. 109; 19 Mo. 506; 1 Bigelow's Life & Acc. Ins. Rep. 300-301.

to instances in which the party died in the commission of a felony." The reasoning upon which this decision is based is unsatisfactory,¹ and has not only not been followed elsewhere, but has been expressly departed from in the jurisdiction where it was rendered.² There are authorities in which, while the doctrine is not stated in haec verbis, death while committing crimes below the grade of felony has been held to avoid the policy. Thus, where the insured was killed while driving in a trotting race for money, which was a misdemeanor, this was declared to be a "breach of law" within the meaning of the exception clause.³ A violation of the Sunday law is usually, if not always, a misdemeanor, yet it has been held sufficient to constitute a breach of the clause.⁴

1. Both because of the sweeping language of the clause, and in view of the fact that one of the other exceptions with which it was connected was "death in consequence of a duel" when dueling might not be a felony.

2. Wolff v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co., 5 Mo. App. 236, where the insured was killed while committing an unprovoked assault, and the policy was held to be forfeited though the act was not a felony. The court cites the earlier Missouri cases, especially Harper v. Phoenix Ins. Co., and in effect refuses to follow it, though as an inferior court it could not, of course, overrule the prior decision.

3. Horse Racing.—Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Seaver, 19 Wall. (U. S.) 531. This was the view of the circuit court as embodied in an introduction. The supreme court considers the point no further than to notice that no exception was taken to the charge. The ruling, it should be observed, is directly contrary to the dictum in Harper v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 19 Mo. 506, that if the insured "is riding a race in a public highway, which is forbidden, and his horse falls, and he is thrown, and his neck broken, he does not die in the known violation of a law of the land, within the meaning of the terms of the condition."

4. Violating Sunday Law.—Duran v. Standard L., etc., Ins. Co., 63 Vt. 437; New York Accident Ins. Co. v. Clayton, 59 Fed. Rep. 559. In the first named case, Duncan, the insured, started off one Sunday morning, gun in hand, for a hunt. After spending part of the day in that sport, he turned homeward across a plowed and frozen field, upon whose surface he slipped and fell and his knee was injured. Solely on the ground that he had been hunting on Sunday, it was held that he could not recover on his accident policy. In the course of its opinion the court said: "At the time of the accident the plaintiff was engaged in hunting. He had his gun with him, and was ready to shoot any game he might see, whether in the field or on the highway on his way home. He started out to secure game wherever he might find it, and it does not appear that at the time of the accident, had abandoned this purpose. In hunting he was violating the law of this state. The traveling of the plaintiff was as much a part of his act of hunting as carrying his gun and ammunition, or shooting or capturing game when the opportunity occurred in the course of the hunt. Without walking the plaintiff could not have engaged in his hunt."

. . . Every step he took in making that trip was in and of itself a violation of law. In taking one of these steps he slipped and was injured. . . . The liability to accident must be greatly enhanced in the case of a person who, like the plaintiff, engages in hunting or traveling about the country on Sunday, in open violation of law, as compared with one who observes the law. The defendant had a right to say that it would not assume such increased risks. The defendant, not having contracted to indemnify the plaintiff for the injury which he received, he cannot recover."

There is a dictum of Judge Elliott, in Bloom v. Franklin L. Ins. Co., 97 Ind. 478; 49 Am. Rep. 469, which is opposed to the above. He said: "It is not every violation of law which would absolve the company, even though the law be a criminal one. Suppose a man violates our law against profanity, and he is shot while doing it, should that absolve the company from liability?"

d. DOES NOT INCLUDE SUICIDE.—In the primitive stage of the history of this clause it seems to have been taken for granted that suicide of the insured, inasmuch as it was a crime, would, like other crimes, prevent recovery even without an express provision therefor. In one of the early English authorities,¹ Vice Chancellor Wood, after speaking of the implied exception of death from unlawful acts, observes: "So the argument might be pursued, although I do not know that any case has so decided, to the same extent, in the case of a person committing suicide while in a sane state of mind, thus committing a felony, and losing his life thereby." But the doctrine thus indicated has passed away and the almost universal rule now is that suicide will not avoid a policy without an express provision of that import.² And in considering the effect of the particular clause before us, the courts have been practically unanimous in denying to it any application to cases of suicide. At common law self-murder was not only an offense against the law; it was a high grade felony, punishable by forfeiture of the offender's possessions.³ Yet, in the first accident insurance case where the question seems to have been presented, the court held, in effect, that death in the mode characterized with such unsparing severity by Blackstone was not "in the known violation of the law of any state."⁴ In a later New York decision, the court reasons that since the penal code of that state makes a felony of attempted suicide, and fails to specify the completed act, the insured's death from self-administered poison cannot be shown in a suit on a policy which excepts death "in violation of or attempt to violate any criminal law of the United States, or of any state or country in which the member herein named may be."⁵ And even Again, suppose a man violates our Sunday law by fishing, and while committing the offense is shot and killed, would that relieve the company?"

2. See Cooke on Life Ins., § 41.

3. 4 Bl. Com., 189-190*, where the author also says: "The law has therefore ranked this among the highest crimes, making it a peculiar species of felony, a felony committed on one's self; and this admits of accessories before the fact, as well as other felonies."

4. Patrick v. Excelsior L. Ins. Co., 4 Hun (N. Y.) 263; 67 Barb. (N. Y.) 202. There is no discussion of the question upon principle in the opinion. Judge Learned merely observed: "I do not think that the expression 'in the known violation of the law of any state' can be construed to include suicide, although suicide has been called a felony."

5. Darrow v. Family Fund Soc., 116 N. Y. 537; 15 Am. St. Rep. 430, affirming 42 Hun (N. Y.) 245. The court's discussion of this point was as follows: "While the attempt to commit suicide is a crime, the accomplishment of the purpose to do so is not. It is with much force urged on the part of the defendant that the criminally unlawful attempt preceded the death, and that it was no less a violation of law because such was the result or consequence of it; that, whether successful or unsuccessful, there was an attempt, within the statute. Although that may be so in some sense in common parlance, an attempt to commit crime imports a purpose, not fully accomplished, to commit it. It is the attempt to commit suicide that is the crime, while the taking one's life is no violation of the criminal law.

where the crime, as defined by statute, is not confined to attempted suicide, and there is no room for this distinction, it still seems that the act will not avoid the policy under a clause similar to the foregoing.¹

c. SCIENTER.—In some of the policies, especially those construed in the earlier cases, the exception clause read "in the known violation of law,"² but the presence of the additional member in the clause apparently had little significance. No case appears to have been determined by virtue of any peculiar force

The attempt, in such case, to commit crime would be merely an unaccomplished purpose to attempt suicide, and, therefore, the peculiarity of the offense referred to is such that it cannot come within the provision of the statute that 'a person may be convicted of an attempt to commit crime, although it appears on the trial that the crime was consummated, unless the court, in its discretion, discharges the jury and directs the defendant to be tried for the crime itself.' As the attempt to commit suicide is the only crime involved in the purpose and act of the party having in view the taking his own life, it is not seen how there can, in the law, be recognized an attempt to commit the crime; for whatever may be done with the intent and purpose of suicide is involved in the attempt to do it, and thus constitutes an ingredient of the main and only offense. It must, for the purpose of question here, be assumed that Darrow had the purpose of taking his own life, and that he fully accomplished such purpose. The result of his act, influenced by such intent, then, was his death. By the act of taking his own life he violated no criminal law, unless the attempt to do it may be distinguished from the act accomplished. An act is characterized by the purpose, when ascertained, of the party doing it, or by its result. If the act fail to accomplish its purpose, it constitutes an attempt; but, if the result of it is the consummation of the purpose, the act is not commonly designated as an attempt. The common acceptance of terms used, and which do not necessarily have a technical meaning, is entitled to some consideration in the construction of contracts, where the intention of the parties is sought for, as it must be, in the language employed. For the purpose of upholding the contract of insurance, its provisions will be strictly construed as against the insurer."

See, to the same effect, Meacham v. New York State Mut. Ben. Assoc., 120 N. Y. 237; Freeman v. New York Nat. Ben. Soc., 42 Hun (N. Y.) 252.

1. Kerr v. Minnesota Mut. Ben. Assoc., 39 Minn. 174; 12 Am. St. Rep. 631. The exception clause contained the words "in consequence of the violation." The court observed: "The defendant offered to prove on the trial that Kerr, in order to escape arrest for the crime of forgery in this state, fled to Canada, where he was discovered and apprehended by detectives, and thereupon, to avoid being brought back to Minnesota for trial, shot and killed himself; that the Criminal Code of Canada forbade self-murder; and that his suicide was a violation thereof. We think this evidence was properly rejected. His death in Canada cannot be treated as the proximate result of his crime in Minnesota. Cluff v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co., 13 Allen (Mass.) 319. In the law of insurance, suicide is not, as a rule, recognized as a ground of exemption from liability, or for forfeiture of a policy issued for the benefit of a third person, unless it is expressly so provided in the policy. Mills v. Restock, 29 Minn. 383. And under the general language here used, which must be construed favorably to the assured and strictly as against the company, the violation of law referred to in the policy ought not, we think, be construed to mean or include suicide. Suicide, though strictly a crime, is not reckoned among offenses or violations of law, such as the language of the policy would commonly be understood to refer to."

given to the word "known," and in most of the cases, knowledge of the law alleged to have been violated was legally imputable to the insured. As was said in construing this clause: "There are many things of which no man can be ignorant, and among the things of which no man can be ignorant is, that it is against the law to commit murder, to steal, or to violently beat another."¹

2. Closeness of Connection Between Prohibited Act and Death or Injury—a. MUST BE CAUSAL.—Probably the most difficult question with which the courts have been called upon to deal, in the construction of this clause, is the determination of whether the insured's death was so sufficiently connected with the alleged unlawful act as to be within the exceptions of the policy. And at the threshold of a discussion of this question, there arises the subsidiary question whether the unlawful act and the death must stand in the relation to each other of cause and effect.

The language used in some of the policies appears to leave little room for question on this point. Such qualifying phrases, e. g., as "caused by"² or "in consequence of,"³ plainly require that the prohibited act should be causal. And so strong is the influence of the latter of these two phrases that the same causal relation has been held necessary even where death or injury "while engaged in" any criminal⁴ or unlawful⁵ act was also excepted.

In policies where the exception clause is not qualified by the phrase "in consequence of" or its equivalent, no different rule seems to have been recognized. "There must, in all cases, whether the law violated be a criminal or a civil one, be some causative connection between the act which constituted the violation of law and the death of the insured."⁶ Even where only

⁵ Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 65 Mich. 545. In this case the insured, who was a deserter from the army, was shot by an arresting officer in a house of ill fame. The court observed: "Nor can it be held, as a matter of law, that Utter was engaged in an unlawful act, within the meaning of this policy. If he had been shot in the act of deserting, this claim might be made with some reason and propriety, but such was not the case here. Neither was he shot because he was a deserter, nor because he was in a house of ill fame."

⁶ Causal Relation Required.—Bloom v. Franklin L. Ins. Co., 97 Ind. 478; 49 Am. Rep. 469. Here the exception was of death merely "in the known violation of law." See, to the same effect, Cluff v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co., 13 Allen (Mass.) 308; 1 Bigelow's Life & Acc. Ins. Co. 208. In Bradley v. Mut. Ben. L. Ins. Co., 45 N. Y. 422; 6 Am. Rep. 115, the court said: "Whatever be the nature of the violation of law urged by the insurance company, as avoiding the policy, it seems to be clear that a relation must exist between the violation of law and the death, to make good the defense; that the death must have been caused by the violation of law, to exempt the coma remote connection is required, the doctrine of a necessary causal relation seems to be preserved at least in theory.¹

b. APPLICATIONS OF RULE.—But while the rule seems to have been generally adopted that the prohibited act must cause the death or injury, in order to constitute a breach of the provision, there is much uncertainty, not to say confusion, in the cases where the rule is applied. When does death or injury occur in or while the insured is violating law? How great must be the degree of proximity between the unlawful act and the result? These are the questions which have most perplexed the courts, and the answers to them vary according as the minds of judges incline to a strict or liberal construction of the clause.

(1) Instances of Liberal Construction.—In some quarters the exception clause has been given a wide application, and has been extended to a great variety of acts whose connection in time or otherwise was but remote. The federal supreme court² held that an insured's death had been "caused by a breach of the law," for the reason that he had been engaged in an illegal horse race, although the jury found that he had alighted from the racing sulky "upright and uninjured" and was killed while attempting to stop his horse by once more grasping the reins. The justice who delivered the opinion, while recognizing the rule that the unlawful act must have been proximate, said: "The leap from the sulky and securing the reins, and the subsequent fall and injury to Seaver, are so close and immediate in their relation to his racing, and all so manifestly part of one continuous transaction, that we cannot, as this finding presents it, say there was a new and controlling influence to which the disaster should be attributed." So an injury incurred while the insured was walking home from a hunting expedition on Sunday, was held to have been "caused directly by plaintiff's violation of the law,"³ i. e., the Sunday statute, although the accident was one which would as naturally have taken place on any other day. Death of the insured from an assault which he wrongfully provoked,⁴ or while,⁵ pany from liability. It cannot be the true meaning of the proviso that the policy is to be avoided by the mere fact that, at the time of the death, the assured was violating the law, if the death occurred from some cause other than such violation." Compare National Ben. Assoc. v. Bowman, 110 Ind. 355; Murray v. New York L. Ins. Co., 96 N. Y. 614; Accident Ins. Co. v. Bennett, 90 Tenn. 256; Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 65 Mich. 545.

1. Causal Connection Remote.—See Duran v. Standard L., etc., Ins. Co., 63 Vt. 437, where the insured, while returning from a hunt on Sunday, slipped on the frozen ground and was injured. The court found the causal connection as follows: "Without walking the plaintiff could not have engaged in his hunt. Thus the accident was caused directly by plaintiff's violation of the law in hunting."

or immediately after,¹ he was assaulting another without justification, has been adjudged to be "in violation of the law," though the insured was intoxicated,² and though the slayer did not intend to kill him.³

(2) Instances of Strict Construction.—On the other hand, there are cases, hardly reconcilable with the foregoing, in which the clause has received only the most restricted and literal interpretation. One of the most notable examples is a decision of the supreme court of Nebraska. There the insured, in pursuance of a prearranged plot to rob the state treasury, entered that institution, drew a revolver upon the treasurer and demanded and received money from that official. The insured then started to effect his escape, and while passing through the hallway, with his ill-gotten gains yet in his possession, was shot and killed by a watchman who was lying in wait. The court held that this was not death "while violating any law," because the act of the insured, "in obtaining money from the treasury, had been completed and he was then endeavoring to make his escape."⁴ In Missouri, at an early day, it was considered that though the insured had provoked an assault during which he was killed, the fact that he had desisted and retreated when slain precluded the idea that he died in the commission of a felony.⁵ So, in Massachusetts, the court took the view that there could be a recovery if the insured, though he had committed an assault upon his slayer, was killed when he had in fact desisted from the affray.⁶ Where the

J., in delivering the opinion, said: "It will be observed that the condition named is 'if a member shall die while violating any law,' etc. that is, in the actual violation of law. Now suppose Griffin had robbed the state treasury, and had left it, and was about to emerge from the building when he was killed, can it be said that at the time of his death he was violating any law of the state? We think not. Suppose that instead of robbing the treasury he had made an assault upon the treasurer in his office, or committed a battery upon him and had left the treasury department and nearly reached the outer door of the capitol when he was killed, it will not be contended that at the time of his death he was violating the law." In this opinion no authorities are cited, and the decision seems difficult to harmonize with Bloom v. Franklin L. Ins. Co., 97 Ind. 478; 49 Am. Rep. 469; 14 Ins. L. J. 17, which was decided only a couple of years previous, or with Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Seaver, 19 Wall. (U. S.) 531, though it is hardly more unlike them than other cases discussed below. It will be observed, also, that while the act of receiving the money had been completed, the act of deportation and detention had not, and it may well be questioned if these were not links in a single chain of crime, or were at least not a "violation of law." Compare the language of Thompson, J., in Duran v. Standard L., etc., Ins. Co., 63 Vt. 437, used of one who had been hunting on Sunday: "Every step he took in making that trip was in and of itself a violation of law."

tion of any law." The court said: "Assuming that Cluff did commit a criminal assault, it may not necessarily follow that he died in the known violation of law. If he was shot while the assault continued, such would be the case. But if it had ceased, and Cluff was not threatening to renew it, and Cox had withdrawn out of his reach and then shot him, not in the course of the affray, but merely to revenge himself for what had been done, or to prevent the seizure of the horses, then at the time he was killed Cluff was not engaged in a known violation of the law, within the meaning of the policy; for he must have received the mortal wound during and while engaged in the commission of a crime, not merely in the consequence of it afterwards. But the jury, upon all the evidence, should consider whether, if he is proved to their satisfaction to have once engaged in a criminal assault, he can be deemed to have desisted from it, while persisting continuously in the very act in the course of which the affray occurred. Their attention should be called distinctly to the question whether, if Cluff had committed a criminal assault, it was so far ended when he was fired upon that the fatal shot is to be regarded as a new and independent event, rather than a mere continuation of the original affray. If Cluff committed a criminal assault upon Cox, which the latter immediately returned by a fatal blow, then the death would have been occasioned in a known violation of law, although the jury might believe that Cluff was not at the moment intending to commit any further assault. The question to be considered is, were the two acts—the assault by Cluff and the firing of the pistol by Cox—a part of one conflict for the possession of the horses, or had Cox abandoned his attempt to retain the custody of the horses, and had Cluff desisted from his assault? Was the fight over or had Cox merely retired to a more advantageous position." See also Bradley v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co., 45 N. Y. 422; 6 Am. Rep. 115.

Ins. Co., 3 Hun (N. Y.) 515; 5 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 572; 5 Bigelow's Life & Acc. Ins. Rep. 328. The court said: "Assuming that the act of adultery was a violation of law, within the meaning of the parties to the contract of insurance, we are of opinion that the assured did not die in consequence of it. The undisputed facts show that he was killed, not in the act of adultery, nor in the defense of person or property. The offense had been completed, and the assured was about to go away. He was not, therefore, at the time he was killed, violating any law, or even committing a trespass, for he was in the house by the license of the wife, from whom the husband had separated. Our law plainly denounces an act like that perpetrated by Hesler as a crime, and we can conceive of no principle upon which it could be properly treated in courts of justice as a natural or legitimate effect of the cause stated. It would be more reasonable to conclude from the evidence that Hesler assassinated the assured in cold blood, lying in wait for that purpose, and that he was actuated by jealousy, or a wish for revenge. The fact that the interval between the injury and the killing is short was not, in this instance material. If the assured had been killed a week or a year after the injury for the same cause, it would have been quite as direct a result thereof as when it was done. In short, the proposition that a man who has been thus wantonly killed by another, without necessity or lawful excuse, died in consequence of his own act, is logically contradictory, unless it be admitted that the killing of an adulterer follows his offense in the ordinary sequence of events. That admission we are not prepared to make."

2. In Accident Ins. Co. v. Bennett, 90 Tenn. 256, the court discusses the question as follows: "It is averred in the assignment that fornication is an unlawful act, and the policy is correctly stated to provide that no recovery can be had upon it when the injury may have happened while the insured was engaged in, or in consequence of,

IV. THIRD STAGE: SPECIFIC VIOLATIONS OF LAW PROHIBITED.—

The use of language enumerating, by name, certain illegal acts which, as causes of death or injury, are not insured against, may, perhaps, be regarded as an advanced stage in the development of the clause excepting results of the violation of law. This form of the clause has not, as yet, been the subject of extensive litigation, but has proved proportionately more effective than the phraseology previously in use.

A common provision in accident policies is that which excepts death or injury "caused, directly or indirectly, wholly or in part, by fighting." This language was held sufficiently explicit to include an injury received by one of the parties to an altercation, who, even though after it had terminated, fell and caught his thumb in a chair;¹ likewise death from shooting after the close of a personal encounter.² It was also said to apply, though the insured was not the aggressor,³ but the doctrine has been qualified so as to exclude "a faultless and unwilling conflict by the insured—one which he neither provoked nor invited; one which he did not accept when formally or informally tendered; one in which he was forced to engage for self-defense alone, and from which he withdrew, or endeavored in good faith to withdraw, when his defense was accomplished."⁴ And under these circumstances whether some unlawful act. A complete answer to this is that it states no legal proposition. Fornication or 'being in a state of fornication,' however immoral and wrong, must be accompanied with circumstances of notoriety or publicity to make it an unlawful act. The law takes no cognizance of the offense until it becomes open and notorious lewdness. Brooks v. State, 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 482; State v. Moore, 1 Swan (Tenn.) 136; Mynatt v. State, 8 Lea (Tenn.) 47. Such a cohabitation, therefore, only becomes a recognized unlawful act, when it is open and notorious, and of this there is no assumption in the request, or proof in the record. But again, passing this question, if it were true that such association per se was an unlawful act, it would not follow that plaintiff could not recover. In order to defeat a recovery because of such provision, there must appear a connecting link between the unlawful act and the death. It is not sufficient that there was an unlawful act committed by the insured, and that death occurred during the time he was engaged in its commission."

2. Gresham v. Equitable Accident Ins. Co., 87 Ga. 497.

3. In U. S. Mut. Accident Assoc. v. Millard, 43 Ill. App. 148, the court said: "The fact that the insured engaged in a fight, though he himself was not the assaulting party, is clearly within the meaning of the terms of the policy as excluding injuries so received from its operation and insurance, as being caused by fighting." See also Gresham v. Equitable Accident Ins. Co., 87 Ga. 497, where the insured took up an insulting challenge and was killed by the challenger. No recovery was allowed.

4. Bleckley, C. J., in Gresham v. Equitable Accident Ins. Co., 87 Ga. 497. Continuing, the learned judge observes: "To protect his life from destruction or his person from injury, might be as much a matter of duty to the insurance company as of interest to himself. Means of resistance which it would be reasonable for him to employ for his own safety, he could not be excused for neglecting, if an efficient use of them were shown to be within his power. It would be no objection to their use that they involved 'fighting back' in order to repel the violence of an assailant. The stipulation against liability for injuries caused by fighting, refers to voluntary fighting by the insured, or involuntary fighting brought on wholly or partially by his fault or the insured's antagonist was sane or insane has been held to be immaterial.¹
